In order to avoid these difficulties it is necessary to fall back onto the "differential effect"—that the moon exerts a greater influence in producing the tides, because it is claimed that does not depend upon the entire attraction of either, but upon the difference between their attraction upon the earth's center and the earth's nearest surface. For the moon, on account of her nearness, the proportion of the distance of those parts is treble that of the sun, and hence her greater effect. But how this overcomes the difficulty is not made clear. For, from the law of universal gravitation and a mathematical demonstration, the sun exerts a greater influence upon the center of the earth, or upon any point of the earth's surface, than the moon.

To say that the moon exerts three times the attractiv force of the sun in producing the tides, and yet declare that the sun exerts one hundred and twenty times the greater attractiv force, is a flat contradiction.

If the moon, by her attractiv force, draws the water from the earth on the side adjacent to the moon, and the earth from the water on the side opposit the moon, heaping up the water on opposit sides of the earth, then we should expect the entire amount of water on the earth to be drawn to the moon. For, from the law of inverse squares, when the moon has drawn the water from the earth to produce a wave fifty feet in hight, then the earth's attraction for the water has diminished, and the moon's attraction for the water has increased.

It will no doubt be urged that the earth's superior attractiv force is sufficient to prevent any such catastrophe, which I am willing to accept, and I further believe it sufficient to prevent a mass of matter the size and distance of the moon from drawing the water from the earth, or the earth from the water, in the slightest degree. But if we once admit that the moon does produce such a tidal wave, there is no reason why we should not expect to see all the water on the earth drawn at once to the moon. For if the attractiv force increases as the square of the distance decreases, and conversely, the attractiv force decreases as the square of the distance increases, then the earth's attraction for the water decreases just in proportion to the increase of the moon's attraction.

True, fifty feet is but an infinitesimal part of the distance from the earth to the moon, but if fifty feet would make no difference in the relativ energy of the two bodies, neither would two hundred and forty thousand miles produce any difference in their attractiv energy.

If the moon attracts the water of the ocean so strongly, why should it not do the same in the case of rivers and lakes? Now, that the moon should pull the water from the earth, and the earth from the water on the side opposit the moon, seems very much of an absurdity.

Aside from the evidence that the conjoint action of the sun and moon produce the highest tides, the fact that the moon rises about fifty minutes later each day, and that there is, therefore, a corresponding difference in the rising of the tides, is the strongest proof in support of the theory.

The tides do not occur at any place when the moon is on the meridian of that place—not until she has passed several degrees. From this it would seem that the moon has much falling force but very little lifting force. A reason which might be given why the moon does not continually pull the water of the oceans around the world with her is that she is unable to lift the water over the hills and mountains.

The attractiv force of any body acts instantly, that is, if there were a new planet created but a thousand miles from the earth, its influence would be felt instantly by the earth, but just as instantly by the remotest star in the heavens. Why is it, then, if this be true, that the tides should not rise when the moon is on the meridian where the tides occur? We are either compelled to say that the law is false, or that that which is considered a cause is a mere coincidence.

It is a well-known fact that high headlands jutting into the ocean greatly diminish the tides; as for instance, off Cape Florida; but that a deep bay extending into the land like a funnel converges the waves, making them roll to a great hight, as in the Bay of Fundy.

Now, if the tidal wave is caused by the attraction of the moon, why should the coast line make any difference? And as the moon must be several degrees to the westward of Nova Scotia, there should really be no tide in the Bay of Fundy, for the wave should follow the moon. The Bay of Fundy lies nearly in an easterly and westerly direction, with the western end opening into the ocean; then the wave must flow in an easterly direction to enter the bay, or in a direction opposed to the moon's attractiv force.

In this discussion I hav endeavored to be fair, giving due credit to those facts which seem to support the prevalent theory. My only desire in this case, as in religion, is to get the truth. GEO. H. DAWES.

McArthur to Mrs. Slenker and Mr. Baker.

I hav found you an argument; I am not obliged to find you an understanding.—Johnson.

I was in hopes that a writer of your distinction, holding such extreme Materialistic opinions, would hav a better appreciation of the subject under consideration than your letter of January 26th would seem to indicate.

The solution of the question: "If a man die, shall he liv again?" has agitated humanity for countless generations, and I regret to find that your objection to the affirmativ side is purely sentimental and not philosophical.

Those "believers and mediums" who in their "kindly correspondence" with you no doubt are earnestly trying to satisfy your scruples, can now concentrate on one idea, and I hope their joint efforts may enable you to arrive at a satisfactory solution.

But, as far as I am concerned, life is too short to debate a question such as you propose, and determin, if a man should marry five wives here, whether he would be obliged to liv with them consecutivly or en masse "over there."

So, bidding you a kindly farewell, I will now turn my attentions to Mr. J. K. P. Baker.

MC'ARTHUR TO J. K. P. BAKER.

In argument with men, a woman ever
Goes by the worse, whatever be her cause.

When I invited Mrs. Slenker to debate the subject of Spiritualism, I heartily disagreed with the above words of the "blind poet," but, I think, sir, that you will agree with me that the time has arrived when, to make my promis good, she should be dropped and you invited to take her place.

As, in your last article, you frankly admit that "Materialism does not certainly insure the mind against error and superstition," I accept it as a concession and an acceptance of one of my propositions.

But, in this my first letter to you, I propose dealing in facts—theories will naturally follow. So let me call your especial attention to the following.

On Thursday, January 17th, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Eugene M. Macdonald, Prof. Henry Kiddle, Isaac B. Rich, publisher of the Banner of Light, and myself, paid a visit to Dr. Slade, the medium, at his residence, 58 East 9th street, New York city.

We critically examined the table at which we were to sit, and all of us pronounced it as being of the ordinary kind, with no accessories.

We had the usual raps, etc., and then the medium took two slates and placing between them a small piece of pencil, and joining them together, held them beneath the table with his right hand.

The thumb and wrist of the right hand, and possibly one-third of the upper slate, were nearly always in view, and the left hand touched ours on top of the table.

In a few minutes writing was heard, and when the noise ceased the slates were opened before us, and on the inner side was found the following:

MY FRIENDS: The Apostle John declares that no man hath seen God at any time. Paul says: He dwelleth in the light which no man can approach unto, that no man hath or can see. Yet it is recorded in the Old Testament that Moses, Aaron chief of the seventy elders, and the nobles of the children of Israel, all saw God. Doubtless it was a spirit they saw, which they mistook for the great creator of the universe, in the same way that John did in the Isle of Patmos, when he fell at the feet of the spirit of one of his brethren, the prophets, and was about to worship him. The angel stating who he was, forbade John, and told him to worship God only. So you see in those days people could be deceived as well as nowadays. It was proof, however, that spirits did return. (Signed) DR. DAVIS.

From the number of words (152) in this message you will perceive that the slate was not a small one.

After this we had several other manifestations, which, though somewhat remarkable in themselvs, I will reserve for another occasion.

Then two more slates were carefully cleaned, and on being joined together were placed on top of the table, and Professor Kiddle leaned his arm on them and we then joined hands.

Writing was distinctly heard, and by way of experiment, Dr. Slade would withdraw his hands from ours and the noise would instantly cease. On his completing the circle, it recommenced. The following was the result, written on the inside of the slates, which you will please remember had been cleaned before our eyes, were on top of the table, and had Professor Kiddle's arm resting on them:

MY FRIENDS: Spiritualism indorses what is true and good in all religions. It frees humanity from those foul aspersions with which a false theology has too long disfigured it. It vindicates the omnipotent ruler from those horrible things which the Bible and Christianity, both distorted as they are, hav attributed to him. It exalts reason over superstition, science over faith, and it unfolds a future state alike worthy of God and man, while it demonstratcs by incontrovertible evidence the immortality of the human soul, the eternal fatherhood of God, and the universal brotherhood of man. Now, who can object to this? May all mankind know more of this that they may learn to love God but not to fear him.

I am very truly,

[Signed] DR. DAVIS.

This message, though not so lengthy as the first, contains one hundred and twenty-five words. We will not discuss their sentiments—simply the facts as above stated.

The séance then ended, and I made an arrangement for a sitting for Brother Macdonald and myself for the following Saturday, January 19th.

We were promptly on time, and two slates being cleaned and a small piece of pencil placed between them, Dr. Slade placed them on Brother Macdonald's shoulder. Writing was instantly heard, and on examination the following message was found written on the inside of one of them:

MY FRIENDS: The cry of fraud, humbug, and doubt can not hinder the progress and investigation of this subject. It has been in all ages in the past, and it will be in the future, as it is a law of God and not of man. So man cannot stop its progress by doubts. I am very truly,

[Signed] DR. DAVIS.

The medium then stated that he thought Brother Macdonald possessed mediumistic qualities, and that he, unassisted, could obtain slate-writing. Mr. Macdonald then took two slates and held them under the table, and the medium placed another slate on his head and asked the spirits if they would try to write on Mr. Macdonald's slate. Back came the answer: "We will try to do so."

Remember, please, the slate on which this was written was in plain sight.

Not being able to obtain writing under the table, Mr. Macdonald laid the slates on top of it, placed his hand over them, and shortly after writing was heard. The message was as follows:

MY FRIENDS: Spiritualism comes to man to cheer his soul and to giv him hope. It comes and tells all mankind they are the children of God. So many are taught to fear God. While there is fear there is no love. So love God and do not fear him. DR. DAVIS.

Mr. Macdonald then said that he would like to write to a friend who was dead. He took a slate and wrote a private message. This slate was then placed under the table by the medium. In a short time writing was heard.

The question was, "Will S. P. A. write here?" and the answer, "S. P. A. will." These initials were intended for Stephen Pearl Andrews.

Now we come to a very important part. Some of these slates belonged to the medium and others had been carried to the house by Mr. Macdonald, and, as I observed before, each one was cleaned in our presence before using.

Two of Mr. Macdonald's slates were then cleaned, a small piece of pencil placed between them, and the medium held them under the table in his right hand, his thumb being always in sight. The power was so very great that the medium withdrew the slates, and tied them together with the same cord that came with the original bundle.

The slates were then placed on Mr. Macdonald's chair, and he sat on them. Writing was heard, and on opening the slates the following message was found:

Never doubt this power. We do and can return. Try us.

[Signed] S. P. A.

Now, I claim, sir, that these experiments prove:

1. A force.
2. That this force is intelligent.

Let me hear from you at your earliest convenience.

McARTHUR.

Discuss Principles—Not Persons.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If Christianity could hav seen this truth, which I hav been trying to maintain for thirty years, and presenting through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER at sundry times for the past few months, the horrors of the Inquisition would never hav been; thousands would hav escaped pious massacres in Europe and America; Quakers would hav been permitted to liv their usual humdrum and peaceful lives, and Roger Williams would not hav been compelled to tear himself away from the society of saints and take up his abode among savages for the sake of quiet.

Says the veteran editor of the Investigator, "We will fight bigotry, priestcraft, tyranny, and intolerance." "Our warfare is against doctrins and principles rather than men."

That is it exactly. Liberals in their controversies should take higher ground than Christians—as much higher as Liberalism is superior. A Liberal should be what the good name implies—refined; should lead a life befitting a freeman or gentleman; should be a person not narrow or contracted in mind; independent in opinion; kind; courteous. In my debates with the clergy I hav endeavored to keep these high principles of Liberalism before me, still never forgetting the "warfare," as our Horace Seaver so happily terms it, "against doctrins and principles."

In my last debate with Elder Dungan, while the people on both sides exhibited a great deal of feeling, the elder and myself were placid. An earnest friend of mine, an energetic Liberal, suggested to me that I was too gentle with the elder, and intimated that I ought to giv him more "grape and canister"—not just these words, but that was the meaning. In some localities I hav been advised to be less severe. What shall one do in such cases? Years ago I settled that in my own mind, to govern myself by our Liberal principles; to treat opponents with Liberal politeness, but to make no compromise with error, or, what is the same to me, with what I think is error.

While engaged in the late debate, assailing opinions deemed sacred by millions about God, heaven, hell, saviors, religions, the looks of anguish depicted on the faces of some Christian ladies made me feel that it would be downright cruelty to add abuse to logic. In fact, to do so is to confess that our logic is lame. Herein is where Christianity is weak. We need to avoid this mistake. But shall we make another kind of mistake? Shall we withhold unwelcome truth because its avowal will cause some individuals to suffer?

In the endeavor to ascertain in what manner we should present our teachings to the world, I perceive that some think "sarcasm, wit, and ridicule" should be omitted. In my view they are the shining, flashing weapons in the arsenal of truth. They are what we need to parry the thrusts of personal abuse heaped upon us by the church. True, all are not by nature fitted to use them to advantage. Let each be true to himself. W. F. JAMIESON.

France.—The Pope.

How the poor old pope of Rome must groan over the sad fate of his dear French children! In utter darkness, spiritually blinded by the light of science and philosophy, the destructiv advances of the nineteenth century hurling them remorselessly against the rock of eternal perdition. Science, O Science! that thou shouldst thus lead my babies away from the light of my counsel, from the bosom of my church! How that clique of soul-mongers and fire-spitters called cardinals must deplore, ah, yes, sadly deplore, the miserable condition of their misguided French brethren! And think of the opportunities lost for advancing the church interests!

Eight million Infidels in France! Impossible! Horrors! And all Catholic Infidels! Much worse than if they were derived from Protestant sources. The priests made the first Infidels of France, and philosophy has but hastened the ball that has rolled up so tremendously.

France occupies to-day the most unique position in the philosophical scale among nations. Notice that her Atheists hav been produced directly from Catholicism, whereas the rule is, from Catholicism to a milder form, or to Protestantism, and then to Liberalism. Perhaps, when a Frenchman gets sick of religion, it's an all-fired malady, and he spews up all he ever had, with the seeds to boot.

Well, a man who doesn't prefer nothing to priestcraft isn't much of a man anyway. Do you want to tingle the ears of a good Infidel and make him grin and feel like throwing up his hat with hurrahs? Just talk to him about ancient days when honest men ruled France; when Marat and Mirabeau, etc., steered her course; when twenty-eight thousand sleek-coated, honey-mouthed friars and priests hied themselvs over the channel and through the continent like Chinese with a Wyoming mob after them. But the general reader's mind is apt to be clouded over the bright picture of modern France as she struggles higher and higher up the ladder of civilization, when confronted with the fact that the contribution of the government toward the support of the Catholic church is fifty-five million francs per annum. It is not given with a view to support, but to hold her down. It is worth more than $11,000,000 per annum to the French people to keep these fellows under control. Their monasteries are rigidly inspected; pastoral duties regulated and limited, and civil functions and privileges exactly prescribed, so that where all was confusion, interference, and arrogance, when not subject to state control, now is found peace, tolerable chastity, humility, and *dis*satisfaction. For when priests are satisfied woe unto the race amongst whom they dwell.

When the pope meditates on his great dominions, and views with his mental eye those countries that enjoy his most special and holy blessing, and which are held up constantly as specimens of virtue and filial obedience, such as Spain, Mexico, Portugal, etc., how poor France must suffer in comparison! The pope sent out recently an encyclical to his numerous head wolves, I mean leading shepherds, expressing his deep regret for the unhappy condition of his children, surrounded, as it were, by a world of Infidelity, indifference, and Materialism. The pope does not like the tendencies of the times. Perhaps they tend too much away from his treasure. M. Jules Simon, a correspondent of a London daily, in sketching the religious condition of the French people, declares that the sole support of Catholicism among city populations is from the women. The men are religiously reckless and indifferent among themselvs—in their politics, in their affairs. And nothing but family considerations restrain them from activ opposition to church interests.

The best evidence and the most irrefragable testimony in support of this, is found in the attitude of the chamber of deputies when legislating on religious affairs. Though a pretense of friendship toward Catholicism is maintained for policy's sake, yet their individual attitude is such as, if practiced by politicians in America, would secure their complete overthrow at next election. It is probably for this reason, among others, that republicanism is so distasteful to the Vatican.

Papal policy has always been opposed to negotiating with electiv assemblies, for men who feel that their responsibilities are immediate and revocativ are generally slow to barter away, for personal benefit, the liberties of their fellow-men with whom they must daily associate. Much different is it with high hereditary functionaries who liv by bribe and intrigue, for the great may associate with the great, and feel not the shame and dishonor cast over an unsuspecting land by their blunders or their crimes.

The power of Rome has come and gone over the soil of France. The sons of Voltaire scorn the advice of Italian despotism, and ridicule the clerical coat in the streets of Paris.

The relics of patriotism now draw admiring gaze, while the bones of doubtful saints repose in obscurity and decay. H. W. HAMMOND.

Interrogativ.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mrs. Humphrey Ward has just written a letter protesting against the dramatization of her "Robert Elsmere," in which she says, "I cannot believe that an American, or, in fact, any other public, would bear to hear the most intimate and sacred speculativ problems discussed behind the footlights."

I hope you will not think I am like the little girl who came home from Sunday-school and wanted to know what kind of a bear was a consecrated, cross-eyed bear, but I really would like to be informed what kind of a speculativ problem is an intimate and sacred speculativ problem, and why a speculativ problem should be either intimate or sacred. Can you tell me? ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Monasteries and Mental Diseases.

Prof. Andrew D. White, in Popular Science Monthly.

The monasteries were frequent sources of that form of mental disease which was supposed to be caused by bewitchment. From the earliest period it is evident that monastic life tended to develop insanity. Such cases as those of St. Anthony and St. Augustine are typical of its effects upon the strongest minds; but it was especially the convents for women that became the great breeding-beds of this disease. Among the large number of women and girls thus assembled, many of them forced into confinement against their will, for the reason that their families could giv them no dower, subjected to the unsatisfied longings, suspicions, bickerings, petty jealousies, envies, and hatreds, so notorious in convent-life, mental disease was not unlikely to be developed at any moment. Hysterical excitement in nunneries took shapes sometimes comical, but more generally tragical. Noteworthy is it that the last places where executions for witchcraft took place were mainly in the neighborhood of great nunneries, and the last famous victim—of the hundreds of thousands executed in Germany for this imaginary crime—was Sister Anna Renata Sänger, sub-prioress of a nunnery near Würzburg. The same thing was seen among young women exposed to sundry fanatical Protestant preachers: insanity, both temporary and permanent, was thus frequently developed among the Huguenots of France, and has been thus produced in America, from the days of the Salem persecution down to the "camp-meetings" of the present time.

New York's Great Pietist.

From the World.

Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.—From the Mail and Express, the day after Christmas.

When the Mail and Express composing-room was "unionized" for political reasons last fall the stereotypers thought they might as well come in for a share of the good things, but the colonel induced them to wait until after election. Since that event the stereotypers hav again importuned Colonel Shepard to pay union wages, but without avail, and last Thursday the members of the union in that office struck at a critical time of the day. The manager of the paper promised to agree to the union's terms. Last Saturday, however, every stereotyper and helper found a note in his pay envelope discharging him. One of the helpers was notified that if he would work for $11 a week (the union price is $16) he could return to work to-day. The union scale for stereotypers on an afternoon paper is $4.50 a day. The Mail and Express has been paying $22 a week.

Here is a quotation Colonel Shepard probably will not use at the head of his editorial columns to-day:

Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy whether he be of thy brethren, or of the strangers that are in thy land within thy gates.—Deut. xxiv, 14.

The Best Pens of Liberalism.

Saladin's Agnostic Journal.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889 is to hand. This popular, but cultured and solid, contribution to Antichristian literature is published yearly in connection with our excellent contemporary, THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York. We think we trace in it the guiding hand of our able and indefatigable fellow-worker, E. M. Macdonald; but he is always as modest as he is loyal, and is apparently anxious that the public should be benefited by his work rather than dazzled by his name. The conspicuous feature of the ANNUAL is a Symposium on a number of the burning questions which affect American "Liberalism," a tour de force by the best pens in the service of Heresy of which the New World can boast. Colonel Ingersoll appears to advantage, and another strong and eloquent man, L. K. Washburn, and Helen H. Gardener, and our old colleague on this journal, Charles Watts, who is struggling along bravely in the land of his adoption, and meriting a success which we trust he will win. Among the excellent full-page illustrations, a tragic interest attaches to that of the statue of Giordano Bruno at Rome.

"The Limitations of Toleration."

The edition of THE TRUTH SEEKER in which this discussion between

Colonel ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
Hon. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, and
General STEWART L. WOODFORD,

appeared is exhausted, and we hav put the matter into pamphlet form. It makes a handsome appearance with cover, and can be had for TEN CENTS PER COPY.

It should be extensivly circulated, as it teaches the doctrins of Liberalism on the most important subject of the world—the right to think and speak and write. The superiority of our doctrins on Liberty over the creeds of Catholicism and Protestantism was never better set forth, and must be manifest to any Christian who possesses the power to reason.

Sources of Moral Inspiration.

In Hugh O. Pentecost's Twentieth Century of last week he runs over a list of papers he reads, and among them we find THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is what he says of it:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER is certainly 'Liberal' enough to suit the most radical taste, and as zealous in its iconoclastic work as the War Cry of the Salvation Army is in its way. But there are many Liberal-minded readers who do not find moral inspiration in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it is far more interested in demolishing Calvinism than the causes of poverty. It is doing, no doubt, a good work among those who subscribe for and enjoy it, but there are multitudes whom it can never influence."

Mr. Pentecost, our readers will recollect, is a young and able preacher who a year or two ago shed the garments of orthodox Christianity and assumed the mantle of a prophet of the Henry George period. He is doing splendid work, and is growing all the time. When he arrives at that stature that he can forget he ever was preacher, we predict for him an exalted station in Infidelity.

We hav it on no less an authority than St. Paul that "it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing," and therefore we shall not quarrel with Mr. Pentecost for finding us zealous in our work. But why he should quotatiously insinuate that our Liberalism is not real Liberalism is inexplicable. Surely THE TRUTH SEEKER is liberal in allowing space for all issues to be discussed, even the Christian finding welcome and courteous treatment in its columns. Mr. Pentecost's own theories of taxation hav time and time again been exploited therein.

We admit that we are greatly interested in destroying Calvinism, and one of the main reasons for the interest is that Calvinism perpetuates poverty, by leading men to be satisfied with their poor condition in this world, which will be recompensed by additional riches in another. One of the Presbyterian representativs of wealth, monopoly, and Christianity said in his paper the other day that to alleviate the condition of the poor would be to discredit scripture, which says the poor ye hav always with you, and before that the same sentiment had been editorially uttered by the chief Presbyterian organ in the country. Mr. Pentecost himself had to leave the church of Christ when he began his labors for the poor by advocating the new-old land theory. We consider that in demolishing Calvinism we are doing quite as effectiv work toward removing the causes of poverty as is the able editor of the Twentieth Century in pushing the sale of a social remedy which after all may not be sufficiently heroic in its composition to cure a patient who is rapidly approaching that condition which the church describes as "in extremis." We judge from a pretty close perusal of Mr. George's paper that his theories find little favor in orthodox circles.

If Mr. Pentecost and others can find no moral inspiration in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the fault, it seems to us, lies with them rather than with the paper. Our main work is for justice, for liberty, for equality of all men before the law, regardless of religious belief. We ask for justice for the Jews, for the Adventists, for every little sect, and for every person whose rights are now ignored by the dominant religion. Is seeking justice no source of moral inspiration?

We work for liberty, for the opportunity for every Christian to worship as he chooses as well as for the Infidel to not worship if he doesn't choose. We stand for Mr. Pentecost's right to be a heretic, and Mike Corrigan's right to be a Catholic. We stand for absolute liberty, for a perfectly unfettered freedom of the human mind, which is now so cramped and chained by custom and creed. Is there no moral inspiration in working for such a condition? To us there surely is.

We work for equality. When one man can build a church and make another pay for its support, there is no equality between them. When one man does as he likes on one day in the week and forces his neighbor to do as he does also, then equality ceases, and we hav tyrant and slave. When the tyrant takes the education of the other man's children into his care and keeping, the equality still further disappears. And just so long as we find one man enslaving his neighbor, either by statute or force, just so long will THE TRUTH SEEKER be found demolishing that man's power in the most zealous manner it knows how to use. And in doing it we find, if others do not, a good deal of moral inspiration. The highest morality man can practice is justice, honesty, and the giving to others every right he claims for himself.

That there are multitudes whom we can never influence we know too well. We cannot reach a Presbyterian so long as he remains in that church. We cannot influence the mentally dead, nor the idiotic nor the Methodists—the insane nor the Catholics. We cannot influence the despot nor the bigot—the fanatic nor the grasping churchman who loves power for the pelf and satisfaction it givs him. We do not expect to influence those who think that somehow two and two may be five, if it should be so stated in scripture; nor those who are always casting anchors to windward of the devil, to kedge off with for fear that that scarecrow of the church may become animated with life; nor those who are eternally straddling the fence, afraid to put a foot down on either side, hesitating, hanging back, trembling for a soul it's a thousand to one they havn't got. Neither do we anticipate influencing the unreasoning. And the hater of justice, the despiser of liberty, the destroyer of equality, will always oppose. But we suspect that Mr. Pentecost will also find difficulty in converting these to his economic scheme. The church will never yield to soft words, nor is she deceived by low bows and profound reverence for her great personages. It is a square fight between Liberty and Ecclesiasticism that is upon us, and when Liberty swings her troops into battle line, one of the things she will say is, He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad.

We sincerely trust that we shall not be found scattering abroad.

Work for Western Liberals.

Last week both houses of Congress agreed to admit four new states to the Union—North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington—and by these names. By the law passed, and which the president has signed, the people of the four territories are to elect delegates to constitutional conventions on the 7th of May. The conventions are to meet on the 4th of July, with authority to form constitutions and state governments, and if the work of the conventions is ratified by the people at an election to be held in October, then it is made the duty of the president to admit the four states by proclamation.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 9th ult., Mr. W. S. Bush, who was formerly in Colonel Ingersoll's law office in Washington, called attention to the forthcoming convention to formulate a state constitution, and urged upon Liberals of Washington territory the necessity of action. We hope his words hav been heeded; if not, we earnestly urge Liberals in that soon-to-be state to bestir themselvs. In Northern and Southern Dakota, as well as in Montana, prompt efforts should be made to secure a constitution which shall tax the churches and forbid the appropriation of money to religious institutions.

California's constitution is a good model of an organic instrument which secures the equitable taxation of all property. But in forbidding the appropriation of money or property to religious institutions the word "religious" instead of "sectarian" should be used. Many states now forbid giving money to sectarian institutions or charities, but this provision is no bar at all to the churches, which maintain on the state's funds ostensible *un*sectarian eelemonysary homes and asylums. This should be stopped.

The Liberals of the new states should also see to it that no recognition of God or the Christian religion, or of Sunday as a religious institution, is allowed in the constitutions. They should watch the proceedings, and hav an influential and able speaker ready to oppose the ministers who are as sure to be at the constitutional conventions as buzzards are to hover over a field wherein they hope to find material for a feast. It will require vigilance to defeat the church, but a few months of hard work now will insure liberty for years to come. The constitutions should provide also that the legislatures cannot hire preachers from the state funds to open proceedings with prayer. And in converting the territorial laws into state enactments, blasphemy and Sunday laws should be eliminated. In providing for the public schools, care should be taken to see that the education obtained therein should be only on known matters, and not on speculativ subjects. Religion and the Bible should be left out. In short, the Nine Demands should be insisted upon.

All this can be done if the Liberals will unite and work heartily together on these points, no matter what their political differences may be, and whether they agree on other subjects or not. A few dollars spent now will save thousands for the future. It is an opportunity of a lifetime for the friends of freedom and justice in the great Northwest. "The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot may shrink from the service of his country, but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman." These thrilling words, written by Paine in the crisis of our nation's life, splendidly fit the case of liberty's friends in the proposed new states. What are a few months of work—what the few dollars necessary to be spent—compared with the inestimable privilege of living in a state where complete liberty of thought and expression, perfect equality in all things, is forever guaranteed by a constitution irrevocable except by the will of the people! The prize is worth a a mighty struggle to obtain. Let the Liberals of these territories communicate with each other, select their representativs, and prepare for the battle. We feel sure there are enough Freethinkers in each of the four territories to carry their points. All they need is to find each other out and work together.

Up, guards, and at 'em!

The Design Argument.

Freethinkers trying to convert Christians find that one of the arguments most difficult to remove from the minds of the latter, and the one affording their religion its most substantial support, is the argument that there is a design in nature evidencing an intelligent personal creator. Even some who hav rejected the Christian revelation still halt as Deists, and though denying Jehovah affirm a superintending, beneficent personal god. But the argument from design has been totally exploded in a dozen different ways. It is well that Freethinkers should familiarize themselvs with these refutations for use against Christian neighbors.

When the child who was told that "God made everything," asked, "Who made God?" there was asked a question sufficient to silence every Christian in the world. This question has never been answered. It cannot be answered. After hearing it once every Christian should close his mouth in silence and never be heard to speak on religion again. No further argument should be required. Consider it. We find a watch and we say: "So curious and wonderful a thing must hav had a maker." We find the watchmaker, and we say: "So curious and wonderful a thing as man must hav had a maker." We find God and we then say: "So curious and wonderful a thing must not hav had a maker." What kind of reasoning is this? If it is the wonder of the thing that first suggests the necessity of a creator, must not that necessity for a creator increase just as the wonder increases? This is precisely the reasoning of the Hindoo in accounting for the position of the earth. "Whatever exists," said he, "must hav some support; the earth exists, and is therefore supported." So he said that it rested on the back of an elephant. The elephant needing support, he said that it rested on a tortoise. Then he forgot that according to his own premis, that whatever exists must hav some support, the tortoise must hav something upon which to rest. Just as the Hindoo stopped reasoning when he got to the tortoise, the theologian stops when he gets to his God. The Christian generally uses the words, order, harmony, in describing that in the universe which he says evidences a God. Order, harmony—these must equally exist in the divine nature to enable him to reflect and design. Or suppose the Christian affirms—though where on earth he arrives at his knowledge about it nobody can tell—that his deity does not reflect, reason, cogitate, but perceives truth without the labor of investigation and contrivance, then two more words appear. Adaptation, fitness. Deity must still possess an adaptation or fitness, thus to perceive and to execute his designs. And this adaptation and fitness would presuppose another intelligent designer capable of producing that adaptation and fitness. This one would necessitate another. This one another. And so on. An endless succession of Gods in the logical consequence. The common-sense decision is simply to confine ourselvs to the affirmation of a universe, for we hav daily evidence of it and know that it is here; as for any creating, designing, self-existent God, he is disproved by the very argument by which it is attempted to prove his existence.

Another argument establishes that if such a God did exist, he could not be a beneficent God, such as the Christians are forever prating about. What effrontery is it that talks about the mercy and goodness of a nature in which all animals devour animals, in which every mouth is a slaughter-house and every stomach a tomb! "Observe," said the minister to his son, "with what beneficent design is the crane so fashioned, in legs, bill, and feet, as to catch fish with ease and provide its means of subsistence." "Yes," replied the boy, "I think I see the beneficence of God, at least so far as the crane is concerned, but don't you think the arrangement a little tough on the fish?" What about that wonderful adaptation of means to ends, that exquisitly contrived mechanism, by which the cancer fastens and feeds upon the body of the loving and beautiful girl?

Let us ask another question. If, when we perceive results similar to those that might be due to a wise man, we conclude that they hav been produced by a being similar to a wise man, then, when we see results similar to those that might be due to an idiot, shall we not conclude that they hav been produced by a being similar to an idiot? Proceedings such as if seen in a man would be pronounced idiotic, may be seen to constitute almost the whole workings of nature. We will mention a few.

An egregious slowness of process is found to hav characterized the production of things as they are. "Suppose," says Colonel Ingersoll, "that upon some island we should find a man a million years of age, and suppose that we should find him in the possession of a most beautiful carriage, constructed upon the most perfect model. And suppose, further, that he should tell us that it was the result of several hundred thousand years of labor and of thought; that for fifty thousand years he used as flat a log as he could find before it occurred to him that by splitting the log he could hav the same surface with only half the weight; that it took him many thousand years to invent wheels for this log; that the wheels he first used were solid, and that fifty thousand years of thought suggested the use of spokes and tire; that for many centuries he used the wheels without linch-pins; that it took a hundred thousand years more to think of using four wheels instead of two; that for ages he walked behind the carriage when going down hill in order to hold it back, and that only by a lucky chance he invented the tongue; would we conclude that this man, from the very first, had been an infinitly ingenious and perfect mechanic? Suppose we found him living in an elegant mansion, and he should inform us that he lived in that house for five hundred thousand years before he thought of putting on a roof, and that he had but recently invented windows and doors; would we say that from the beginning he had been an infinitly accomplished and scientific architect?"

Again. To make a machine adapted to serve a purpose and then to wantonly destroy it without allowing it to fulfill its functions, would be conduct such as we could expect only from a fool. Now, in nature we see the immense majority of the seeds of plants produced but to perish, and the immense majority of the young of animals formed but to die. A thousand are born where one livs; where one attains perfection a thousand are wretched miscreations. What shall we say of this stupendous prodigality of waste? What should we say of a like waste in a man? If we say that success in nature is the work of a man-like intelligent being, why not say that failure in nature is the work of a man-like idiot?

Again. Many animals hav what are called purposeless organs—some rudimentary and never developed sufficiently for use, others suppressed and degenerated, others aimless and inactiv, others positivly injurious to their possessors. What kind of design is this? Why do some animals, like the dugong, hav tusks that never cut through the gums? Why has the guinea-pig teeth that are shed before it is born? Why has the whale teeth that it never uses? Why has man in his eye a remnant of the membrana nictitans, or third eyelid of birds and reptils, not of the slightest use to the human being? Why has man that useless organ—about which so much has been said lately in this paper—the vermiform appendix? Evolution shows us that these are remnants of a former state which once served a purpose, and are not yet eliminated from succeeding forms of life. Theology requires us to believe that a God of omniscience made all these animals just as they are now.

But of the creatures that hav got here at last after all the eons of slow striving at production, of those that hav survived the frightful carnage of life on life in which thousands perish and one escapes, of the organs on these creatures which are not rudimentary, or degenerated, or aimless, or hurtful—of the organs, that is, that now perform functions, in a manner mainly helpful, not one is perfectly adapted to its environment and performs its function perfectly. The eye, upon which Christians lavish so much admiration, is an extremely imperfect instrument. The number of persons seen with eye-glasses and other devices to aid vision shows how easily the organ is disordered. In mechanical construction it is inferior to the cheapest optical instrument in the market. The ear is as imperfect as the eye. In the structure of the external ear, and attached to it, are ten muscles all in a rudimentary condition and all absolutely useless. Indeed, all of the ear visible to the eye, except a small shell-shaped depression immediately around the opening, is completely useless. For what purpose was this mass of useless material formed? To get frozen, is the only answer we can think of just now. The internal construction of the ear, testifies Professor Garrison, is quite as faulty as that of the eye. Hardly has a child got its first set of teeth when they hav to be removed to make room for the next, which are called the "permanent" set. How permanent, probably many readers know. As a matter of fact, the dentist furnishes the only permanent and reliable set we ever hav. In the throat we find the tonsils, which serve no earthly use but to get inflamed. Every bit of food and drop of liquid on its way to the stomach must pass over the opening of the trachea, or windpipe. Thus the life is endangered every time a mouthful of food is swallowed. Sometimes the result is merely the spasmodic coughing we may notice in ourselvs every day caused by the entrance of small crumbs or drops of water. Sometimes the person is choked to death. Space will not permit mention of the misconstruction and misarrangement of the great organs of the trunk, and of the whole body.

But, finally, there is this argument, irresistible and conclusiv, which supersedes and renders unnecessary all the preceding. We simply deny design. Adaptation, fitness, is one thing. Design is another. The adaptation we admit; the design we deny. When two organs or functions are so constituted that each has reference to, and assists in, the working of the other, we hav adaptation. Design is this with the addition of something else—the addition of the fact that this adaptation was antecedently set up as an end by some intelligent being. A thing done is not necessarily a thing designed to be done. When design is affirmed of an action, it must be shown that the agent in that action had the result in view at the beginning of the action. The fact that things exist as they now are proves simply—that things exist as they now are. Unless we can first examin the volitions of some being at the beginning of the course of nature, and discover that he had in view the present constitution of things, we hav no means of guessing whether this constitution came about by negligence of his, or through mistake, or in direct opposition to his wishes, or that there is such a being. All that can be said of present nature is that it is; to an affirmation of its design the first datum, that a being had it in view, is utterly lacking. The fact that any object is constituted in a highly complicated manner does not tend to prove that it was designed. The reason why we believe on finding a watch that it was designed is not, as has been commonly held, its complication and adaptation. The reason why we believe that it had a designer is solely that we hav had a previous experience of similar mechanisms being designed by men. Experience is in this as in everything else our only source of knowledge; and as to the contemplation of the present order of the universe by any pre-existing being, experience is totally lacking. The judgment, says Hume, which infers a designing cause from adjustments adapted to effect an end rests wholly upon experience; and as we hav no experience of world-making, we hav no right in such a case to infer a world-maker. There still linger in our habits of thinking remains of that old egotism of considering ourselvs the end of all creation, and so seeing design in all the processes that hav led up to the production of us and the establishment of our sovereignty over creation. But this is unfounded; it would hav suited nature just as well, as far as we can see, to hav produced an intelligent elephant, or an intelligent cat, as an intelligent ape; and in that case the intelligent cat would hav looked back and egotistically discovered the same designs to produce and exalt him that we discover now. Of complicated reciprocity of action, organic action, there is in the world very little. Nearly all matter is inorganic. Inorganic matter has for inconceivable time been worked and reworked by that energy inherent in matter which both Christians and Freethinkers recognize, they under the name of God and we under the name of Force. Among the endlessly varied combinations and recombinations of matter some combinations hav become highly concatenated. Such masses of matter exhibit a lengthened concatenation of varieties of matter and of combination each of which varieties or divisions in its workings has a bearing upon all the others. This concatenation of forms of matter we call organisms, life. Such a concatenation does not necessarily carry in itself an implication of a previous design. Of such combination there is very little; the endless permutations of inorganic matter must necessarily hav produced some; the only wonder is that there is not more. And from these concatenations of forms and activities we are no more to infer design than we are to infer, when a man taking a blind backward step overthrows some object which falling causes the successiv fall of a long row or concatenation of objects which chanced to be behind him, that that man designed that concatenation—that chain of causes and effects.

The manner in which complicated organisms are produced from simple beginnings, priest-hated evolution fully shows. We cannot giv it here; we recommend an exhaustiv study of the literature of evolution.

To summarize: (1) The design argument vitiates itself by necessitating an infinit series of designers; (2) if there be a designing deity he cannot be beneficent; (3) if there be one he cannot be wise, for (a) his processes are egregiously slow; (b) they are egregiously wasteful; (c) they are often purposeless, and (d) thay hav produced at the present day wretchedly imperfect mechanisms; (4) finally, adaptation must be distinguished from design: the continual workings of a simple force must in time necessarily produce complicated interacting combinations of matter and forms of matter, which we call organic life, as explained by evolution, and any assumption of design is totally unnecessary, baseless, and illogical.

Letters from Friends.

MOLINE, ILL., Jan. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose renewal. Mr. Heston gives us the countenances and style of dress, even to the shoes, of the people in the old times when the Lord made a business of talking to men, thus making the matter vivid and distinctly realized. Y. E. MCCLENDON.

MILL GROVE, MICH., Jan. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A great religious revival has been going on all around this point the last ninety days. All the howlers intend coming together right here in a week or so and making a combined attack to whip the devil or bust, as this spot of earth is looked upon as a powerful satanic stronghold. Irishman would say, "Be the powers of Moll Kelly," there is going to be fun galore, if those church galoots go to crowding too much. W. J. SHIRLEY.

Jan. 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I was very much pleased with the suggestion of Dr. Westbrook, that the American Secular Union offer a prize for a manual containing the purest principles of morality, freed from superstition of any kind.

I will head the subscription list with $25 provided the $1,000 is raised this year and the essays are published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that Col. Robert G. Ingersoll and Dr. Westbrook will consent to be a committee of two out of three to pass upon the said composition. J. B. ELLIOTT.

CHICAGO, ILL., Jan. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Disbelief in what is termed "holy scriptures" is to remove from the mind of man, tearing down, as it is called, the idea of an imaginary kingdom of a personal and revengeful God, dwelling in the biblical heavens, a situation altogether incomprehensible, and is the building up of the real kingdom of man, of humanity, morality, culture, education, sense, and reason, things comprehensible.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Jan. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Charles Watts lectured in Monte Vista on the 25th inst. His discourse was fine—acknowledged so by all. He is a nice, genteel man. I don't like his hurry-skurry style of getting through life, however.

The brave general, H. F. Sickles, introduced him similarly to this: "We regret that the distinguished gentleman is met by such a small audience. The people's minds hav been polluted by priestly theology, and they are not to blame. Those of us, however, who hav been liberated from the thralldom of priestly dominancy think it a great intellectual treat to hear Mr. Watts."

Success to you, Mr. Watts, but do not hurry through life, because it will be a long time before another Watts is born into the world. JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

BRISTOL, WIS., Jan. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5.25, for which please send me your ANNUAL for 1889, and send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for the next two years. It has been my custom to renew my subscription and pay two years in advance, but this must come to a close before long, as old age and infirmities are creeping upon me. If I close my career before the two years roll around, I shall hav the satisfaction of knowing that I hav contributed to extend the life of one of the grandest, freest, and most enlightened Liberal papers published on this planet. I am proud that my name was enrolled on its list from its first number to the present, and want to continue with it to the end of my time. Had I the means I would endow it and make it free to all mankind, and put it out of the reach of superstition's grasp. I want no Paine Hall or Girard College in mine to quarrel over, but I would like an absolutely free paper to reach every poor man's home. A. D. CORNWELL.

MIDDLE FALLS, N. Y., Feb. 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Will Mr. Parkhurst kindly inform me through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER what explanation is given by scientists for the orbits of the planets being ellipses instead of perfect circles? I asked the question of the Sun some time since and was answered: "The shape of an orbit depends upon the direction of the original impulse, and in the case of the planets this was such as to produce revolution in ellipses instead of in circles." Now, this reply, to my mind, is just no answer at all. It is the same as to say, "The planets revolve in ellipses because they commenced going in that way." I would like to get beyond this "original impulse" theory, if possible, and find if an ellipse is invariably the shape of every planet's orbit, and why it is so. If I revolve rapidly a ball attached to a string, holding the hand stationary, it moves in a circle. Why should not a planet? Will Mr. Parkhurst please giv me a little light?

PLATTSVILLE, O., Jan. 22, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: This village has been thrown into considerable excitement in the past few days on account of the sudden insanity of one of the prominent members of the Methodist church. The Methodists are holding a series of meetings here and hav been trying hard to get up a revival, using the usual material—hell fire and the wrath to come. The teachings of the Holy Queer were held up in such rigorous terms that one of the members, John Metz, became erratic in his talk and wild with excitement. He forced his two small children to the mourner's bench, and from that time on he gradually grew worse. The next day he paraded the streets with a tin horn asserting that the judgment day had come and that he was the angel Gabriel. He was very noisy and fancied that the people of the town and vicinity were going to hell while he was going to heaven. He was placed in jail at Sidney, the county seat, where he became very profane and vulgar. He was subsequently adjudged insane and afterward taken to an insane asylum. Thus orthodoxy in this section has received a death-blow. The meetings are still in progress, but little interest is being taken.

FRANK WOODMANCY.

VINELAND, N. J., Jan. 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I renew my subscription, not that I feel the need of the articles in the paper, but I know the world at large needs THE TRUTH SEEKER. Husband and myself are getting advanced in years. We read but little, and hav all of our years been battling for the right of everybody to seek truth according to their own conscience; but so long as men will send such bigots as Blair, of New Hampshire, to make laws, and feel the necessity of flooding Congress with petitions to prevent other bigots or knaves from enacting Blair bills into laws, there must be a "counter-irritant," and THE TRUTH SEEKER is as good as any I know of. I coincide with J. Hacker in the idea that Liberals (if any such could be found) should hav a home, or homes, for such as Mr. and Mrs. Hacker. Their declining years must be very lonely and destitute, and as they gave all the best part of their lives trying to improve humanity, humanity should care for them now in a pleasant, comfortable home. After reading Mr. Hacker's letter in the December TRUTH SEEKER, instead of making Christmas presents to A, B, C, and D, who needed nothing, I sent what I had to spare to Mr. and Mrs. Hacker, and enjoyed my Christmas much better for having done so.

Yours truly, PORTIA GAGE.

PITTSVILLE, WIS., Jan. 20, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I left Friend Crafts home at Grantfork, Ill., Friday, December 28th, and stopped at Greenville, and called on a few of the Liberals of that place, but nothing could be done in the way of lectures, so I shook the dust off my feet from the early home of R. G. Ingersoll and came on to Paxton, Ill., and visited a few days with Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Newkirk and Dr. Farrer and wife. New Year's day Mr. and Mrs. George Newkirk, from Ludlow, Dr. Farrer and family, and myself were the guests of Reuben and Sophie Newkirk. I enjoyed myself with these stanch friends of Freethought. My visit with them made my heart lighter, and my—well, they did not forget that the Liberal lecturer cannot travel on wind.

When I arrived in Chicago I was suffering severely with headache, but thought it only a temporary attack that would pass off as soon as I could get a short rest. I called on Friend Stevens, but before I had been with him two hours 16 Union Park place had very much the appearance of a hospital. But by good nursing I was able to resume my journey home the next day. Having about recovered from my bilious attack, I shall soon, "the Lord willing," take the field again. My next engagement is Mather, Wis., and I shall probably visit Evansville, Wis., but dates are not fixed.

GEORGE H. DAWES.

MOUND CITY, MINN, Jan. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The ANNUALS arrived all right, and, after reading, I find myself impelled to write you a letter.

I hav a large circle of acquaintances who are Spiritualists, and comparativly few of them hav any use for TRUTH SEEKER literature, and I want to tell you the reason why; it is the eternal iteration and reiteration of the phrase "Liberals and Spiritualists" which is found in said literature. Common sense would seem to teach that a "Liberal" is one who is heartily in favor of enforcing the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and I hav never seen nor heard of a Spiritualist who did not wish for the establishment of said Demands. Why not ask your correspondents to use the phrase Agnostics and Spiritualists? No one could object to that, and it would greatly please large numbers.

You cannot deny that the Spiritualists hav the numbers, and, admitting that the Agnostics hav the brains, they will scarcely enforce the Demands until they swell their ranks numerically, and surely the Spiritualists are the most available material at present.

One thing is quite certain, and that is: The Nine Demands will never be obtained until all their friends unite and work. They are fully united now, in thought, and only fail to work together because of their quarrels on outside issues.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Jan. 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and admire the bold and fearless way in which it defends truth and liberty. Heston's cartoons speak volumes for the cause of liberty and truth. In this city, at the foot of grand old Lookout mountain, dwell some as stanch Liberals as can be found anywhere, but no organized society. If some good Liberal lecturer would come here I think he would meet with good success. The harvest is ripe. In Vol. 16, No. 2, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, page 26, I notice an article from "D," complaining or taking you to task for prostituting (as he is pleased to call it) so much space for "superstition"—that is, Spiritualism. He calls Spiritualists humbugs, cranks, and fools. Will "D" please tell me how he knows that Spiritualism is a humbug? How does he know that Spiritualists are cranks? Were Denton, Parker, Robert Dale Owen, Tennyson, and Byron cranks? Read Longfellow's poem entitled, "Haunted Houses." Galileo was called a crank because he said the world was round and did move. Columbus was a crank because he said there was a western hemisphere. Now, "D," there are some cranks in the ranks of Spiritualists as well as some Liberal cranks. Spiritualists are for the Nine Demands and will fight theological Catholicism to the bitter end. "D," your saying that Spiritualists are cranks proves nothing. Calling honest people cranks and fools proves nothing. Calling Spiritualism an exploded demonology does not any more explode Spiritual philosophy than a bumblebee buzzing in a jug explodes the jug. Now, "D," buy a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, read it, and next time giv us facts. Remember, pet names prove nothing, and if your brain is too small and you are too bigoted to grasp after grand and noble truths, don't heap up abuse on others who are more progressiv than yourself. INVESTIGATOR.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Jan. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1 for the ANNUAL and the "Age of Reason," by Thomas Paine, and "Romanism, or Danger Ahead," by A. J. Grover. I send you a clipping from our daily Times of Sunday. The editor is a Jew, consequently a half Liberal as far as his bread and butter allow him. Chattanooga is cosmopolitan. It would be a good field for Liberalism if we could hav good speakers occasionally that are better than our home talent. I resided for two years in Nashville and found there the three extreme elements—gamblers, church riders, and harlots. While there I agitated through the medium of the Liberal, the organ of the Liberal Club. It existed three months and died of senility.

I remain yours for mental liberty, J. P. MULLER.

One city pastor objects to the Sunday newspaper, as will be seen from the following letter received at this office last week:

"MY DEAR Times: I surely appreciate your kindness in offering to publish a column of 'Religious News.' I am by no means insensible to the value of the press in giving information to the people it reaches of the doings of the churches. There is only one thing that has prevented my hearty response to your solicitations for news—that is, that you desire to publish them in your Sunday edition. I hav studied and prayed over the matter carefully and hav come to the conclusion that I can in no way discharge my obligation to God and patronize a Sunday paper or take the advantages offered by it.

"If you will publish the news growing out of our church life on Saturday morning I will gladly furnish you with items of interest as they may occur.

"Whether you see fit to do this or not, I prefer that you leave all mention of the church of which I hav the honor to be pastor out of your Sunday columns.

"Thanking you for your many past favors and requesting you to discontinue your Sunday editions altogether, I am,

"Very respectfully yours, A. B. RIKER."

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Jan. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 19, 1889, J. Hacker tries to convey a wrong idea to the readers of your valuable paper, by saying that I "expressed the belief that witnesses could choose to swear or affirm." If he will read my letter over again, he will find that I only gave my experience with the courts, which I found to be contrary to the law quoted in your paper, and certainly more liberal. To further show you the liberality of our judges and lawyers in court, I will relate that I was present at the trial of a murderer before Judge Hare on Jan. 22, 1889, and found that, out of fourteen witnesses, six or eight affirmed, by saying, "I do most solemnly and sincerely and truly declare and affirm." Not one of these witnesses was asked any question regarding his belief or disbelief in a deity, nor were they requested to lift up their hands. What happened "some years ago" does not concern us now. "Some years ago" it was an offense punishable by a fine or imprisonment to kiss a wife on Sunday. The present and future is all we hav to look after, and if there are any laws in existence which are not practiced, we certainly should be Liberal enough to acknowledge it and "giv the devil his due." I find that many Liberals of to-day will exaggerate their statements and thereby impress a wrong idea on the public. Such a case came under my observation lately, when I listened to a lecture on Girard College. The lecturer remarked that one of the directors, a Roman Catholic, was the head and instigator of all the theological movements in the college. After the lecture his statement was contradicted, and it was proved that the gentleman referred to was a very Liberal man and never had anything to do with the movement. A. ROLLÉ.

CLEVELAND, O., Jan. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I read every line in THE TRUTH SEEKER each week with unflagging interest and increasing profit, and the more so as the subjects presented were a few months ago entirely new to me, and as my mind becomes developed I bless anew the haud that placed the first copy within my reach. It is my Bible, and of whether there is or is not any other holy writ I know nothing. I am not made of the despicable material which will cringe before a stronger mind or toady to any opinion—in fact, I hav the spirit within me which will not kneel—still, I can speak upon a proper occasion those three hardest words in the English language, I was mistaken. Accordingly I acknowledge that the reproof contained in R. B. Jackson's letter in yesterday's TRUTH SEEKER was richly deserved, concerning my suggestion that gospel songs might be sung in Liberal meetings. To do myself justice, though, it did not take me until now to see the inconsistency of it. When I wrote it I knew nothing of any Liberal song-books, and thought it all right to sing gospel songs, as the music and words are familiar to all; but some weeks later, when I saw my words in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I blushed at my own folly, as just three evenings before it came out I had raised considerable of a breeze by refusing to sing "Just as I Am, Without One Plea," around a parlor organ at my boarding-place. At the time I wrote my letter of December 3d, I had just attended a meeting of the Secular Union, and listened to an address, which was an answer to the ranting Dr. Robinson. In it the speaker courteously refuted the charges made against Infidels, defined and defended his own position, scoring some points, and downing his adversary, all without clubs. My business brings me into contact with all classes, and I bought twenty copies of the paper containing the address and gave them away. I heard it afterward favorably commented upon by business men, and I thought and still think that many Infidel writers and speakers defeat themselvs by rough language and too much ill-timed ranting and bigotry.

I want to thank John M. Bradford for giving his opinion of the article, "Here It Is," by Milleson, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 26th. His opinion of it is an exact echo of my own. It was a revelation to me. It swept out of my brain—a small one, by the way—the last remnants of my former belief in the creation of the world, and settled for me the then puzzling question of how the worlds came to exist unless God did strike them into existence. I am glad my opinion is confirmed by good authority. I love Ingersoll; he and Editor Macdonald are writers after my own heart. Twice an opportunity to hear Ingersoll was given me, but I refused; now, when I so desire to see and hear him, I cannot.

MRS. MILDRED HERMANN.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Feb. 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to confess that I hav not read the truths which Mr. J. H. Wood thinks of such vital importance. I am sorry I hav not. A man with truths of vital importance is liable to be a crank. I hav a profound respect for cranks. The universe is turned by cranks, as was long ago perceived by Ptolemy. My only reasons for not reading all the vital truths propounded by this meritorious but ill-requited class of people are, first, that life is too short to read them all, and secondly, that, being myself one of the crankiest of cranks, I hav quite a lot of the same ware to dispose of in my own shop. But Mr. Wood's last contains reflections on my vital truths which impel me to rise and explain. Mr. Wood says he never knew an Anarchist who could show how the application of his theories would benefit the people. I am just the Anarchist Mr. Wood wants. The application of our theories ninety-seven years ago would hav prevented this glorious government from taking that $40,000,000,000 out of the dear people in taxes. The application of our principles now will prevent this glorious government from taking $40,000,000,000 more out of the dear people during the next ninety-seven years. This, together with the discontinuance of war, Comstockery, priestcraft, and a few other evils of the same type, is how the application of our principles will benefit the people.

NEW BEDFORD, PA., Jan. 30, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I am surprised that one so intelligent as Lizzie Collier seems to be should find fault with you for introducing a little spelling reform into THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The orthography of the English language is most absurd, unphilosophical, and, in its effects, a curse to us all. Of all the one hundred thousand English words, scarcely one in one thousand is spelled as it is pronounced. Our letters hav no fixed sound. Different sounds are represented by the same letter, and by combinations of letters in the most arbitrary manner, and in accordance with no law or natural fitness. The result is that our children hav to spend years laboriously learning to spell the words of our language in common use. If they could comprehend fully the magnitude of the task allotted to them, and know that it might easily and with great ultimate advantage to all be avoided, they would rebel. There should be letters enough to represent every elementary sound in the language, and each letter should invariably represent one and the same sound. Then, when the alphabet is mastered, the orthography of each word is exactly indicated by its pronunciation, and the learner can devote the years now spent in learning to spell to useful scientific studies. What sense is there in writing pph for f in sapphire? or eigh for a in eight, sleigh, etc.? or phth for t in phthisic? According to these examples, it would be correct to spell the word fate thus: ppheighphth—fate. How absurd! And it is so, more or less, with nearly every word in the language. It is astonishing that the intelligent English-speaking race has tolerated this folly so long.

It shows how hard it is for mankind to leave the old ruts, even where it is a manifest advantage to do so. I hope you will soon be able to introduce all the changes recommended by the philological societies. THE TRUTH SEEKER should, as far as possible, lead in all reforms.

P.S.—For the inclosed $1 please send me this year's ANNUAL and the balance send to Father Hacker.

W. W. W.

STRASBURG, ILL., Jan. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: President Westbrook's annual message has an encouraging ring in it. We ought to organize for the purpose of buying books and papers, and then an organization of ten or more could, and I think would, contribute twenty-five or fifty cents apiece for the Secular Union, while as it is there is no leader, and a great many do not feel like sending a dollar. It appears we are all "going it alone." We buy a few books and pamphlets and loan them, and that is very often the last of them; sometimes they are kept going until worn out. Another reason for organization is, that where there is a half dozen Liberals, some one has to take the whole discharge of theological mud, and that intimidates a good many that are in sympathy with the Liberal cause from taking part with us. The Christians hav no love for Liberals, no interest in their welfare, and would leave them alone, only they are afraid that they will say something that will offend God, and cause him to send a cyclone or earthquake that will hurry them off to that "better land."

I will giv you a bird's-eye view of Strasburg. The parson with his flock corraled in a pen; the fence seven feet high; gate closed and barred; enemy outside. Parson hears a noise but cannot tell if it is Watts, Remsburg, or the devil. He tells his sheep not to be frightened. "See what David did with a sling; and see, I hav a whole tubful of mud to fire into the enemy's camp." But his aim is too low, and he falls in the arms of a comrade saying, "I'm wounded." And when the smoke and mud hav cleared away, he thanks God that it is no worse than it is. But when he turns to his flock one has jumped out and is gone, and six more are on the fence. Moral.—Liberalism is progressing beyond our most sanguin expectation. They used to laugh and say, How is your congregation? But it has become too solemn, as my members never backslide.

Find inclosed money for four more ANNUALS for 1889, and "For Her Daily Bread."

A. YORK.

CHICAGO, ILL., Feb. 4, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am more than pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER editorials. On receiving the paper I first glance at the front-page cartoon, then I skip everything else and read the editorials. Next come the "Letters from Friends." After that I look for the spiciest articles, and so on until it is all read. I also take Secular Thought, of Toronto, and am highly pleased with it.

I don't know whether Watson Heston regards my rhymes on his cartoons as being helpful or hindering, but they are, many of them, so good that I cannot refrain. Here are a few verses on his "Sunday law" cartoon:

I come before you, Uncle Sam;
I think you all know who I am
Throughout this Yankee nation.
My Sunday plug I'll guarantee
Will stop that wicked, busy bee
From Sabbath desecration.

I know that those who don't believe
Will not at once this plug receive,
But then we'll use coercion;
This "Christian nation" never can
Be prosperous so long as man
On Sunday makes exertion.

These Sunday papers I would stop,
The pulpit then would hav the drop
On working people Sunday.
Poor men, they work hard all the week,
On Sabbath day the preachers speak,
And they can rest on Monday.

And all these women come to you
(They are the W. C. T. U.)
To present their petition.
Six million children hav it signed;
All these, you'll please to bear in mind,
Are under our tuition.

Our Mumbo Jumbo's here behind;
If you refuse us you will find
That you hav made a blunder.
Our Mumbo Jumbo cannot fail;
He's filled with wind from head to tail,
Damnation, hell, and thunder.

JOHN HUDSON.

FREDONIA, N. Y., Jan. 21, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money for the paper and the ANNUAL.

I dare not ask a furlough, or straggle from the veteran fort of the invincible TRUTH SEEKER. If I fail to keep step with the already organized soldiers of Freethought, just so soon I begin to weaken. Despair begins to loom up in the distance as I chance to turn my mental vision from the flag still waving above the cross. The hordes with their money and influence besieging Congress to legalize the handcuffs, chains, stocks, and dungeons masked within the Sunday Blair bill form a menacing foe that should warn every liberty-loving man and woman who has not yet enlisted somewhere under freedom's banner to do so at once. The vantage-ground already gained is too precious to be lost to the genius of our Constitution even for a short period of time. We hav no spare time for reconquering lost ground. Then let us rally as never before around the flag of freedom and keep it waving above the cross.

Single-handed and alone I can do but little, but organized under some free press I can be heard around the world, imparting courage and hope to my almost desponding brother and sister who perchance hav been less favored than myself, in helping in so organizing and uniting our efforts on this Sunday Blair bill that sufficient timely knowledge may by voice and pen be brought to bear to consign the bill to ignominious defeat, that we may breathe the air of freedom as never before. As I said before, I cannot stand upon the rostrum and go from place to place in calm or storm, sunshine or cloud, to meet the jeers of the superstitious, or take up the pen and move the press and silently rap on every door throughout the inquiring land. But I can contribute the sinews of war, money, to THE TRUTH SEEKER garrison to cheer them on to still "hold the fort"—for we are coming, coming! up the steps of time from all the hills and vales of our beautiful land, to save from sectarian bigotry. United, we are invincible to all oppressions.

PLINY SMITH.

PITMAN GROVE, PA., Jan. 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In taking the stand that I always hav in the field of Freethought, I hav argued that it was not essential for my well-being to allow a priest to dictate to me, or to hav him do my thinking for me. At one time I lived in Salt Lake City, and anyone who is acquainted with that locality is well aware that Spiritualism abounds to an enormous extent, as those who apostatize from the Mormon church, with very few exceptions, become Spiritualists. Once I, being at that time young, and at all times of a Liberal turn, was easily persuaded to attend séances. I did so frequently. It was there that I saw my first wife—in flesh, I mean. This may not appear to hav any bearing on the subject in question, but it has, my object being to show that mediums are just as arrogant as the Bible-pounders. All the business of spirits is conducted through them. Now, my wife was told that she was not a good subject, as through her indifference she interfered with the working of the spirits, so the medium ruled her out on several occasions. I pretended to believe, for I was ready to be convinced the same as I am to-day, but I never received any manifestation of note. And if I had, no argument of mine could convince anybody else that they had. So the discussion between Mr. McArthur and Mrs. Slenker could go on until doomsday and no one be the least bit benefited, for the only result will be that McArthur did see spirits and Mrs. Slenker did not.

Now, Spiritualism in thought is simply grand, for to be able to converse or communicate with the spirits of departed friends is, to my mind, one of the most inspiring and pleasing prospects ever conceived by the mind of mortal man. And I hav tried hard to talk with my friends, but no such privilege has ever been accorded me, therefore I fear that I am in some way handicapped, and leave it all a mystery, the same as any other system of belief founded on somebody else's say-so. It is a sort of a second-hand revelation, and I repudiate it on those grounds. I ignore the teachings of the Holy Queer on the same grounds. If I cannot see Spiritualism, no man can possibly make me see it. And if it is only a belief that can be enjoyed by a few chosen ones, either as whoopers-up or paid mediums, then I say it is poor shucks, and does not compare favorably with Methodist orthodoxy, as one can slip in on the back seat of the gospel shop and get salvation's inspiration at much less cost. "D." is not very Liberal when he calls Spiritualism a humbug simply because he cannot see it as others do. McArthur no doubt is sincere in his belief, but he is off, terribly off, when he tries to show Mrs. Slenker physically what he claims to hav spiritually. When he succeeds in doing that he can lift himself by his bootstraps. Nor is it fair or just in "D." when he calls Spiritualists cranks. Simply because people differ with us is no plausible excuse for calling them bad names. We all hav our faults, and we should hav thought very much more of "D." had he signed his full name.

J. G. JOHNSON.

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARK., Jan. 23, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Before leaving Van Buren I promised Secretary Stevens that I would do what I could toward organizing a Secular Union in Eureka Springs when I came up here. I hav kept my promis. "There is only one Eureka Springs, and one railroad to it." Yes, only one Eureka Springs, with its forty-odd springs—within a radius of two miles—its gorges and cliffs, its pine-clad hills, and its quarries of fine building-stone, marble, and onyx. Pleasant home-like cottages dot the hills, and oak and chinquipin brush patches are rapidly being transformed into gardens filled with all kinds of small fruits—peaches, apples, plums, cherries, and grapes. It is indeed pleasing to see the gardens terraced one above the other with neat cottages peeping out from their aerial perches amidst the verdure of fruitful trees and fragrant flowers, and one cannot help thinking with Dr. Fellows—the Congregational preacher here—"what a pity it would be to burn this world!" It would be hard to imagin a better place for the worn and jaded business man to visit. A few weeks among the hills of Eureka with its health-giving waters, its pure and bracing air—absolutely free from malaria—and its romantic scenery, ever varying as the position of the beholder is changed, and the numerous places of interest, will send the sluggish blood, vitiated by overwork, bad water, and poisoned air, coursing through the veins, bringing renewed vitality and energy to body and brain that had become nervous and weak through suffering, anxiety, and pain; filling one with such renewed vigor and exhilaration as to make mere existence a pleasure.

Immediately upon my arrival I went to work to get up an interest in the organization of a Union. I found quite a number who expressed a willingness to join, and would hav had an organization effected had I been able to procure the use of a building to meet in. I am still hopeful of organizing. Yesterday I started out with a petition against the Sunday Blair bill, and found that some one else had been around with a similar petition. I then started to hunt him up and, finding where he lived, called in and found that he was an Adventist. His wife said he was then out with his petition. Well, I made up my mind that the Adventist should not beat the Secular Union in this work if I could help it, so I started to work and in about four hours I had received sixty-four signatures out of between ninety and one hundred persons that I "struck." I ran across two or three teetotal fanatics, a few who would not sign because they did not want to work on Sunday, and quite a number who said it would not become a law, and some who were indifferent. I strike them all alike, preachers and all, but hav not secured the signature of any sky-pilot yet. It rained all day to-day, but I met the Adventist and we "joined drives," and he is going to help me secure a building in which to organize a Union and hold our meetings.

Let us let the hen and a half go for a while, and "stir our stumps" with these petitions for a few weeks and see if more good is not accomplished. One very encouraging feature that I see is the large number of female signatures that I obtain. In Eureka the women are not so very much more badly under the preachers' thumbs than the men. Catholics are scarce, there being a very small percentage of foreign-born persons here. Several of the churches hav been holding "big meetings" since the first of the year, which hav, in reality, been small meetings, and what few "converts" they hav had hav been, generally, very young children. I hav attended the north Methodist meetings most of the time, and kept the preacher "hoodooed" by sitting "away up front" and keeping my eyes fastened on his. He soon "got onto" me and wanted me to join the church, bringing my Infidelity along with me if I could not leave it behind. That is their game these days. Get them into the church, no matter what they believe. I am going to ask him to sign my petition.

Yours for the cause, HENRY ADDIS.

P.S.—Just returned from church. They got all, except myself and one other, on the "men's side," up around the altar. Not so on the women's side. Most of the "experience" was given in by men. If the attendants of all the churches "size up" that way, it is truly a fine showing for the ladies.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

We Hav a Little Baby.

We hav a little baby
To cheer our hearth and home,
To fill our hearts with gladness,
And cause us not to roam.
Its eyes do glitter fondly—
In sweet affection shine;
We see the image plainly
Of beauty most divine.
They hold a hidden magic
In every look and stare,
Compelling pure devotion,
Unceasing love and care.

We hav a little baby
Our leisure to employ;
It drives away all sorrow
And fills our lives with joy.
The clouds hav southly drifted,
The sky is bright and clear,
Then comes the tiny tendril
To draw our hearts so near;
And like the gentle zephyr
That wooes the morning sun,
It brings to us the emblem
Of heaven here begun.

We hav a little baby
So sweet, so pure, so fair,
To bear our name and fortune,
To drive away dull care.
It is a little fairy,
Bedewed with winsome smiles,
And 'neath its little dimples
We see its gleeful wiles.
Just like the morning roses,
Just like the morning dove,
It is a little blessing
To link our lives in love.

Baby and the Sunbeam.

Crawling round in Santa's circus,
Just as jolly as a grig,
Is our precious Tootsy Wootsy,
Where he runs a lively rig

In the midst of lambs and lions,
Among mastodons and mice,
Among mooly-cows and monsters
That look naughty and yet nice.

He is cuddling up a camel,
When all goldenly does glance
Through the pane a splendid sunbeam,
And upon the carpet dance.

"It's more Christmas!" thinks the crawler,
"Something Santa Claus forgot;"
And he scuttles for the shining
And too tantalizing spot.

"Pretty, pretty," gently gurgles
From the lips by angels kissed,
As he tries to grab the glory
In his greedy little fist.

Now the pinky palm so pudgy
Closes tight; but see him stare
When he opens it, next minute,
And the sunbeam isn't there!

The dear little hand is empty,
And there, dancing on the floor,
Is the sunbeam in the self-same
Perverse fashion as before.

Baby claws the air and clutches—
Nothing—till his heart is sore.
Then collapses on the carpet,
And sets up a royal roar

Such as came from Homer's heroes
In the Trojan war's fierce tug!
Baby cannot catch his Christmas
That is dancing on the rug!

While we laugh, our heartstrings tighten;
For we know how surely Joy
To the Man must prove elusiv
As the sunbeam to the Boy! M. N. B.

Correspondence.

BONHAM, TEX., Feb. 6, 1889.

DEAR MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: As I hav not seen any letters from this part of Texas, I thought I would write one. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner. I am going to school. I learn very fast. I study arithmetic, grammar, geography, dictionary, Swinton's Word Book and Fifth Reader. Well, as this is my first letter, I will close, hoping to see this in print. I remain, Your Freethought friend,

SARAH WHITE.

CANTON, DAK., Feb. 11, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As this is my first letter to the Children's Corner I will try and make it satisfactory. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I always look at the pictures. I hav one sister older than I am. She will be fifteen this month. I am ten years old, and my birthday comes in March. I go to school and a lady by the name of Miss Kennedy is my teacher. I would like to see you ever so much; and I would like to know some of the little girls that write to the Children's Corner. I liv in town, not far from the schoolhouse. I hav not been to school much this term because I hav been sick so much. I hav had scarlet fever, a cold, and a lame leg, and, you see, all those in succession made me stay out of school quite a little while. If you ever come to Canton stop and see me, for I would like to see you very much. My little playmates that I go with most are named Beryl Fosdick, Laura Christensen, Hattie May Flory, and Maud Shufelt. I study arithmetic, geography, language, spelling, and reading. My grandma is visiting us now, but she thinks she will go home next week. I read the Children's Corner every week, and like it very much. It is very near Valentine's day, and I think that I shall send some valentines.

I think this is all I can say now, so with much love I remain,

Your friend, BUD AVERILL.

[We would like to see Bud as much as she would like to see us. Should we ever come to Dakota, we shall certainly try to find her as well as other friends in that territory.—ED. C. C.]

DAVENPORT, WASH. TERR., Feb. 1, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My mother sent you a letter in December, and inclosed $2.25—$1.25 for the "Apples of Gold," and $1 for the Casey fund. We received the return card, but didn't get the book. We thought you didn't hav any at present, so we would like to get it as soon as convenient. We had a grand time when Putnam was here. We expect W. S. Bell to lecture here in July, and if he can ring his bell as well as Putnam can blow his horn, we shall hav a good time.

Very respectfully yours, HENRY SELDE.

[The book was sent as ordered. It is a long distance to Davenport, and it may yet come to hand.—ED. C. C.]

ROSCOE, MO., Feb. 15, 1889.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: You requested in your last that the children would giv reason why Freethought should be tolerated; and as my pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought I would try and answer it with verses in our Children's Corner.

It is because Freethought means liberty of mind,
Therefore to suppress Freethought would be unkind.
And mankind would become mentally blind,
And the why and wherefore of things would never find.
People hav just found out that negro slavery was a curse,
They hav yet to learn that mental slavery is ten times worse.
Men are endowed with both mental and physical nature,
And mental slavery is as far worse than physical as it is greater.

From your little Liberal friend,

CHARLEY IRWIN HOLMES.

BENNINGTON, N. H., Feb. 8, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will try to write you a letter, as I am much interested in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER. My papa has taken the paper several years and likes it very much. He is an earnest Freethinker, and I do not know of any other one around here. I enjoy looking at the pictures and reading the children's letters. I do not go to school, as I should hav to walk two miles to school, but I study at home. Papa has a steam sawmill, and I can tend the engin and take away boards. I hav two sisters and a brother and two little nephews; for pets, a dog named Rover and a cat. I should be pleased to hear from the little readers of the Children's Corner. I will now close, for fear my letter is now too long and may find its way to that dreaded wastebasket. Your little Freethinker friend,

LILLA D. LAKIN (age 10 years).

Cosy Chats with Correspondents.

J. L. TOMPKINS, Lake City, Ia.—Yours received, and your donation of $1 forwarded to Mr. Casey.

JOHN PECK, Naples, N. Y.—Your article is safe, and will appear soon. We hav the best correspondents and friends, and with their aid our Corner does not lack for variety and interest. Please accept our kindest thanks for your most excellent contribution.

HANNAH B., Chicago, Ill.—All reforms hav to struggle against popular customs and fixed opinions. But we must not weary in well doing on that account. Keep to the right as conscience directs, and you cannot be sorry.

LOIS BAKER, San Francisco, Cal.—Woman's wages are, as a rule, about half of that which a man receives for the same work—in many cases, one-third, and often less even than that. Were women equal with men before the law this state of affairs would be remedied. Even men who profess to be the friends of women, are slow to be just to them.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I think your Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER is splendid for the little readers, and not uninteresting to the grown-up children of the paper. The collections of innocently bright sayings by little folks is a fine feature, and I hope the sparks of wit will keep falling onto your table in sufficient quantities to make this feature permanent. Here is a genuin incident: Little Orland is three years old, very bright and inquisitiv. His mother has taught him that "God is everywhere." She has taken great care to hav this impressed on his mind. I had been away for several days, and on returning stepped suddenly into the room where Orland was playing. He looked up in surprise and asked: "Where you been?" I answered, "Oh, everywhere!" His eyes opened wide, snapped, and sparkled as he asked in a voice of innocent wonder, "Be-e yo-ou God?" M. A. B.

The Baby King of Spain.

The only monarch in the world of whom absolutely nothing disagreeable is said, his majesty King Alfonso of Spain, is getting on toward his third birthday, and preparations for that event are being made and written about, though it is still several months off. A great many industrious writers and correspondents continue to pour out information regarding this important baby. One full-grown scribbler declares with the utmost seriousness that the little king is modest and unassuming and givs no thought to his exalted position or his future destiny—a truly remarkable thing in a boy thirty months old. It seems, too, that his long list of names, and the fact that he is officially known as the well-beloved son of the pope, brother of all gentlemen who wear crowns and cousin to all Spanish grandees, has not inflated him with pride. The principal misfortune of Alfonso's life appears to be that he has no one to play with him. No child could be allowed to play with him unless it were old enough to understand how careful it would hav to be not to infringe the royal dignity, and besides, the queen is afraid of causing jealousy by conferring upon any great lady the honor of having her children play with the king. The hardest work to which this young monarch is subjected is that of receiving his ministers, dignitaries of state, generals, grandees, and so forth, while sitting on the throne in his nurse's lap, a ceremony which entails his sitting still while all these things pass before him. At a late reception two thousand great men of various kinds turned up to see the king and bowed to him. One precious advantage this royal baby has over ordinary ones, which cannot be exaggerated, is that everybody who comes along and admires his yellow curls has not the right to kiss him.—Philadelphia Press.

About the Beaver.

Yesterday was Carrie's birthday, and I determined to present her with a new muff, as her old one had seen much service. I desired to please her, and so let her go with me to purchase it. After looking at many, she at last selected one of a rich dark brown color, of fur that was of very fine texture. She is very proud of it, and last evening, while displaying it among some of her little friends, who had come to spend the evening with her, she said: "Papa, please tell us all about my muff and what it is made of." I replied: "I will, if you will all sit down and pay attention." They drew their stools to the fire and I began. I told Carrie that the muff which she has is made from the skin of a beaver. You hav probably seen the beaver pictured in your books as having a short, thick-set body, and a flat, scale-covered tail. You will find it fully described in your natural histories. But in many of the accounts of its mode of life and its habits there is a mixture of exaggeration and fiction.

A full-grown beaver has a body nearly thirty inches long, over ten in width, and less in depth, and sometimes weighs sixty pounds.

The beaver's forepaws are small, and disproportionate in comparison with its hind ones. The hind feet are much larger and more powerful, and are webbed to the nails something after the pattern of a duck's foot, and furnish its chief power in swimming.

I remember a beaver that my grandfather caught near the old dam back of his house many years ago. This animal's fur was composed of two kinds of hair—one close-set, very silky, and of a grayish color, the other much coarser and longer and of a reddish brown. And then he had an odd-looking tail, which attracted the most attention. One of the largest beaver tails is a foot long, nearly five inches in width, and less than half an inch thick in the middle. It is a deep black in color, quite free from hair, and looks as if it were covered on both sides with scales a third of an inch and less in size. The beaver's tail is muscular and manifestly for a purpose. And what? It does not, as is often stated, serve as a mud-scow upon which to move building materials, nor is it a trowel, which it resembles. It serves as a rudder in swimming, and aids the animal in diving. It also serves as a prop when the animal is standing on its hind legs and working.

The beaver never travels by land unless it is necessary and unavoidable. And sometimes while swimming he makes a noise by striking on the surface of the water violently with his tail, a noise so loud that one would not think it possibly could hav been made by him.

The chief food of the beaver is the bark of the birch, poplar, and willow, though he sometimes varies his diet by roots and grass.

During the summer the beavers leave the ancestral mansion and take life rather easily. They go to their burrows in the banks, of which there are many in every range of land and water occupied by a settlement of beavers. The burrows open into the water at some depth below the surface, sometimes under the roots of trees where the bank is very steep. If the water is not deep enough so that the opening would come below the ice in the winter, they improve by digging a canal back from the deep water to the burrow. Their burrows are usually a dozen feet or more in length, and rise up gradually almost to the surface of the water, and end in a chamber, often under the roots of a tree, where there is more security and better ventilation.

The beaver is very intelligent, and he is very ingenious in the construction of his houses.

The house of the beavers looks something like a pile of old brushwood, but when we come to examin it, we see it is made with some design. They place a number of poles together so as to form a sort of a wigwam; then they pile short sticks—the remains of former meals, and from which they hav gnawed the bark—and mud and grass upon them to a thickness of two or three feet, over which they pile more poles; and this they cover over every autumn with fresh mud, which freezes hard as stone when winter comes, and serves them as a protection against wolves and other marauders.

It requires great skill to trap these wary little animals, but there are many men who make it a business.

Just at this moment mamma rang the bell, and the story of the beaver and his habits, which had interested the youngsters, sank into insignificance before the prospect of a steaming supper which was awaiting us.

This book shows that many Christians might learn much from these ancient heathen.—American Bookseller.

One of the most valuable helps for those who would understand the character of human progress in all ages.—National Quarterly Review.

The author has shown himself a diligent student, an ardent admirer, and a faithful interpreter, of some of the most remarkable monuments of ancient thinking.—New York Tribune.

Reading this book, we find the doctrins of the Stoics to be almost identical with the views held by the broadest and most enlightened minds of the present day.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Lecky says of Marcus Aurelius: "The purest and gentlest spirit of all the pagan world." Merivale says: "Of all the line the noblest and dearest." Taine says: "The noblest soul that ever lived." John Stuart Mill says: "He preserved through life not only the most unblemished justice, but the tenderest heart."

Chips Thrown to Hit.

Long ago, in an academy debating society, it was resolved that "putty won't explode." The Editor, by heading an article of mine, "Mr. Guild's Explosiv Notions," thus acknowledges that they are not putty, whatever else he may think them, for which honor he has my many thanks. I open my batteries designing to do execution, and if the enemy cries that my bombshells burst, why, that satisfies me that they are effecting the purpose for which they were prepared. I do not intend to agree with everyone, and should be sorry to learn that everybody agreed with me, for then I should think that I were a bigger fool than I believe I am. I subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but not to the infallibility of its Editor.

AN AROH "ANGELL."

Says Mr. George T. Angell: "We want no French Revolutions here, with barricades and guillotins, and the streets red with blood. We think the best way to avoid such things is through widespread, merciful, and humane education in our schools. How can you better reach the Anarchist father and mother who never enters the door of a church, or uses the name of the supreme being except in blasphemy, than through his or her child in the public schools? And how can you better reach the heart of the child than by teaching it kindness to the weakest and most defenseless of God's creatures, with such other merciful teachings as may be added? For this purpose was founded in Boston, on the 28th of July, 1882, the American Band of Mercy, whose badge I wear."

No, we want no French Revolutions here, and neither do we want a St. Bartholomew's day massacre. The Anarchists are not confined to those who bear the name, neither are all those thus designated the devils they are represented. The way to avoid repetitions of the French Revolution is not to invite them by the Christian conditions which produced the first. The Red Terror was the outcome of the White Terror. Priestcraft and statecraft combined to crush the people, and the people kicked back to save themselvs. The worm will turn when it is pressed. To drive men mad with starvation wages and then prate to them of mercy to dogs and horses is cruel mockery. Preaching to children about a God of wrath will not make them gentle. To worship the maker of hell will not inspire them to be humane.

TARIFF IN A THIMBLE.

The tariff is not a question of theoretical principle, but a matter of expedient practice The right to tax commerce is the same as that to tax any other trade. The best economical plan of taxation is to lay the levy where it will be least felt, and incidentally promote business.

There will be no need of tariff when: (1) the government lends money at interest, instead of borrowing, and thus supplies its revenue; (2) when the intelligence of the people enables them to compete with ignorant labor abroad—machinery must outdo cheap manual work; (3) when the people of foreign countries gain their independence from kings and priests, and so raise themselvs that they furnish a home market for their own wares. These are all conditions morally to be wished, and some time may occur, but will be a mighty long time coming. Meanwhile we must wriggle along the best way we can.

Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Brooklyn, Mass., says in a sermon: "If we had been at Calvary and stopped the crucifixion of Christ, we would hav helped to do the worst thing that could hav been done for the world. By that death there came into the world a new order of thinking; joy and gladness to hundreds of thousands of souls."

Dr. Thomas does not seem to see that if that affair had been prevented, the prevention would hav been on account of a correct order of thinking which ought to hav been in the world, and would hav long before prevailed but for the preaching of a bloodthirsty God. Whilst the world thinks that such a God-designed murder was a mercy to mankind, there is greatest need of a new order of thinking. The theory that it is good to cut your toe off so as to hav it feel better after it has done aching is infinit wisdom compared with the notion that a loving God ordained the slaughter of his own son to satisfy his own wrath. The best thing that thinkers can do to-day is to denounce that kind of thinking, for until it is done with the world will not know what loving-kindness is.

SONNET TO SOLOMON.

[With compliments to Si Slokum, author of a "Sonnet to David."]

Go, Solomon! Sun-god is thy name,
Thou hast been counted of all men most wise;
Can any tell whence is such flaunting fame,
Or why on thee there were no foolish flies?
Thou triedst all the follies known to kings,
Had all the trouble, toil, and pain
Which chasing passing pleasure brings;
Thyself owned up that all was vain.
And that is where, I ween, you got the bulge
On other mortals, much like thee inclined,
Who lawless passion may too free indulge,
But not the error of the evil find.
The world to-day is full of fools, 'tis true,
Who'll never know their blunders, as did you.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Tyngsboro, Mass.

Pre-Columbian Discovery of America.

From the Home Journal.

The ancient lore of the Icelandic sagas furnishes proof of the early colonization of the American continent in the tenth century by the Scandinavians. The sagas and songs upon which ancient Scandinavian history is founded, and those containing the history of America by the Northmen, were originally intrusted to the memory, and these verbal traditions formed historical narrativs. In the early part of the twelfth century, when the Icelanders had become familiar with the Latin chirography, they were committed to writing. Manuscripts found in Iceland during the year 1650 make record of an expedition to Greenland, led in 986 by Eric Red, of Iceland. His son Lief, who accompanied him, enlisted a crew of thirty-five men, and set sail from Greenland on another voyage of exploration. In due time they came to a well-wooded land to the southwest of Greenland, where day and night seemed more equal than in Greenland and Iceland.

After a short sojourn in this newly found country, Lief, in company with his followers, returned to Greenland, and the fame acquired by this expedition encouraged his brother Thorwald to embark in the same vessel in 1002 for the recently discovered territory, to which was given the name of Wineland (Vineland). Thorwald and his crew, having safely reached their destination, spent the winter in the booths which Lief had erected. In the spring he explored the western coast, and found the land not only attractiv, but rich in vines and forest. No evidences of human habitations were visible, nor did he find the lairs of animals. Afterward sailing eastward, they came to a cape, upon whose sandy beach they landed. Having crossed a projection, to their surprise they saw three boats made of skins, partially buried in the sand, beneath which nine men lay hidden, eight of whom were caught and killed, one managing to escape. Later these Northmen were attacked by the Esquimaux, to whom the eight so recently killed probably belonged. Thorwald, fatally wounded in the encounter, was buried on the promontory where he fell; his crew returned to Greenland with a rich cargo of timber.

The sagas make mention of another expedition, undertaken by Thorfin Karlsfue, who enlisted as his associates sixty men and five women. Sailing from Iceland in a southerly direction, they arrived at the place where Lief had built his huts. After landing the cows and a bull to graze, which they had brought with them, Karlsfue ordered his men to fell trees and prepare timber for the ship's cargo, and while thus engaged they saw emerging from the woods many Skraelings. They happening to appear where the bull was feeding, he, being rather of a ferocious spirit, bellowed loudly, and made an attack upon them, which led them immediately to retreat. After securing reinforcements they returned, and although they were not able to make themselvs understood to the Northmen, by means of signs they were enabled to barter furs for such other commodities as the Northmen were willing to sell. When the nativs had withdrawn, Karlsfue caused a strong wooden fence to be placed around his booths, which proved to be a wise precaution, as a short time afterward the Skraelings returned, when a fierce fight ensued, in which many of the Esquimaux fell. The Northmen, soon becoming weary of their abode in so strange a country, and exposed to the frequent attacks of the nativs, in the spring returned to Greenland.

The third expedition was undertaken in 1011 by Freydissa, a daughter of Eric Red, in company with two hundred Icelandic traders, but as no further exploration of this country was entered upon no new facts were obtained.

The theory of the population of America by Irish colonists has been founded on the mention of a saga writer, who observes that Wineland must hav been Flvittramannaland, or the Great Ireland. It is not improbable that a similarity in the sound of the language of the people caused the name of a smaller body of land in the eastern hemisphere to be given to a part of the country by its first discoverers. Be this as it may, it is certain that the theory has never been authenticated.

Thus we become acquainted with the Icelandic history of certain portions of the western hemisphere, as given by the sagas of the Icelanders.

The discovery by Christopher Columbus of the West Indies in 1492 was perhaps the result of a trip made by him to Iceland in 1477, at which time the discovery of unknown lands to the southwest of Greenland and Iceland was made known to him by the sagas of the people of Iceland.—C. W. Darling.

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

With References to the most Plain and Striking Self-Contradictions of the so-called Inspired Scriptures.

BY A. JACOBSON.

Third edition, carefully revised and enlarged.

Read the following extract from a letter by Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds:

"The 'Bible Inquirer' is better than a Concordance as a reference, to speedily find the teaching of the Bible, on any subject. It is a sledge-hammer in demolishing error, yet the most devout Bible-worshiper can find no cause of offense. Using no word of argument, it simply permits the Bible to destroy all faith in the Bible, by giving chapter and verse—word for word—showing its palpable absurdities and contradictions."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

News of the Week.

China is having famins.

The Pinkertons employ 5,000 men.

North Carolina seems in danger of a race war.

Wisconsin has 34,000 children in parochial schools.

The pope eulogizes the activity of American Catholics.

Japan has secured a constitutional in place of an absolute monarchy.

An extremely cold wave was felt all over the country about last Sunday.

It is wished to merge in one the great labor organizations of the Union.

Several international Socialist congresses will be held at Paris during the year.

Henry George will go to England again, and expects to start a great movement.

The Japanese minister of education has been assassinated by a religious fanatic.

Chicago's parochial schools contain 42,500 children, or one for every two families in the city.

Within a few months 213 clubs of women to study political economy hav been organized.

The Indiana senate has passed a bill adopting the principal features of the Australian system of voting.

The New Jersey bureau of labor has ascertained that the child-labor law is being violated in 8,000 cases.

A Milwaukee preacher will be brought before a church committee for buying chewing tobacco on Sunday.

Catholic revenues from Quebec, recently estimated at $8,000,000 yearly, are now stated to be $12,000,000.

A reformed system of balloting modeled after the Australian system has been declared constitutional for Louisville.

There seem prospects of an actual war in Canada between Catholics and Protestants, quite like the good old times.

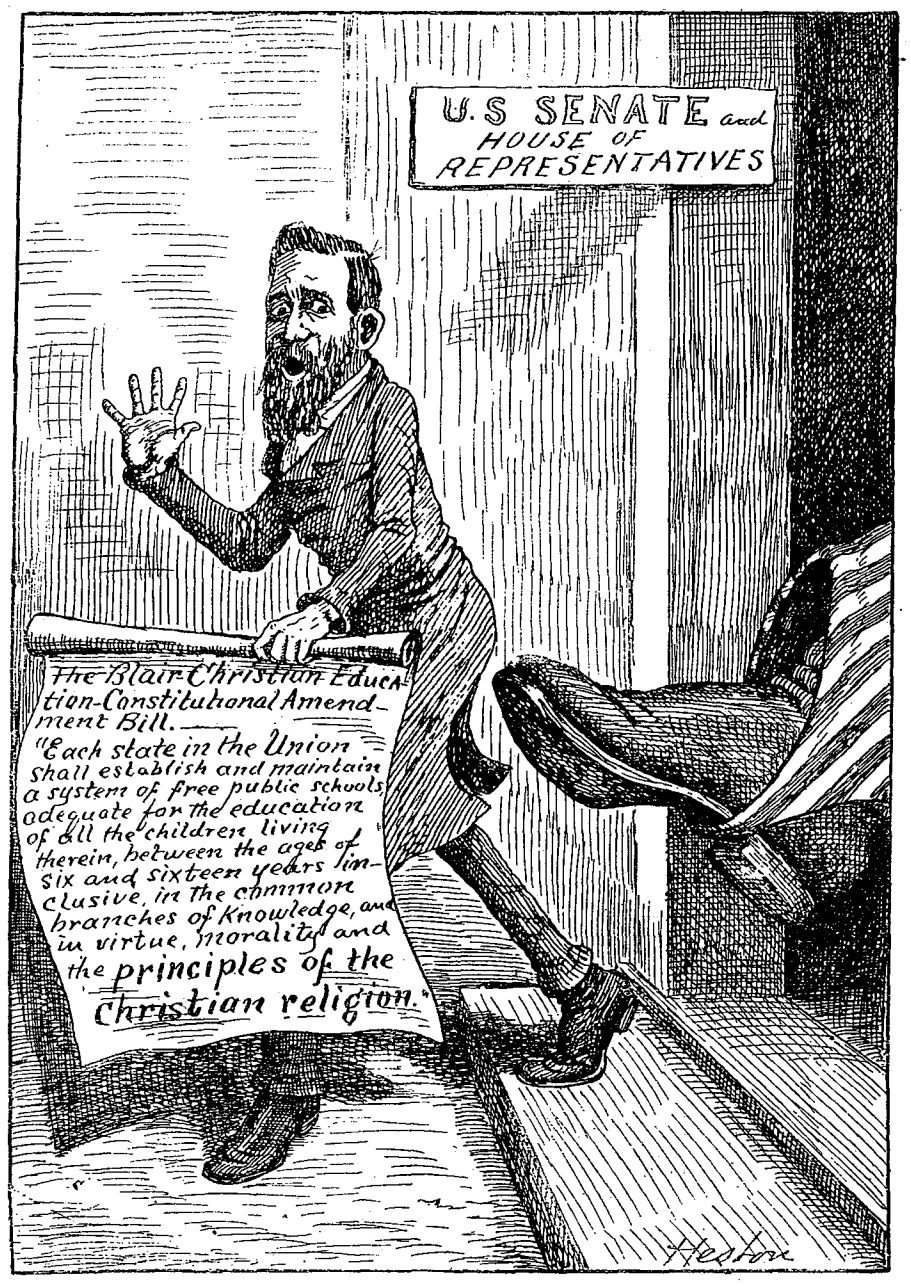
The Pennsylvania Railway officials hav ordered that all freight trains except those carrying perishable goods be discontinued Sundays.

Cardinal Gibbons said on the 12th: "Nowhere do we enjoy greater liberty than in this country, and nowhere does the church make greater progress." True.

The great New York cathedral is being connected by special signals with headquarters of the fire department, toward supporting which it pays no cent of taxes.

At Newark, N. J., Sunday evening concerts hav been opened at a theater, and the bigots, feeling the effect on their church contribution-box, are casting about for excuses to suppress them.

Dr. McGlynn in his lecture last Sunday described the parochial schools as taught by ignorant persons "who sandwiched bad grammar with the catechism in ill-ventilated rooms in church basements."



Premier Salisbury hopes "that the day is not far distant when women will hav their share in determining the policy of the country. Their influence will weigh in the direction of morality and religion."

Governor Lee says: "The whole thing," that is, the settlement of sectional trouble, "depends upon the South being recognized as a white-governed portion, and that there shall exist no African sovereignty."

The people of highly Christian Servia are having a desperate struggle to keep down their equally Christian brigands. Recently all the girls in the village of Graditz were captured and carried to the mountains.

Rev. Dr. Eaton of an aristocratic Fifth avenue church devoted a recent sermon to denunciation of workingmen's organizations and their proceedings. He says that workingmen are "the ignorant dupes of selfish leaders," angry, no doubt, that they do not adopt as leaders himself and the clergy.

The pope's encyclical which was read in all churches on a recent Sunday condemns the public schools, and says of them: "There is no ecclesiastical authority left in them; and during the years when it is most fitting for tender minds to be carefully trained in Christian virtue, the precepts of religion are for the most part unheard."

MOSES EVIDENTLY REFERS TO THE BLAIR BILL.

Neither shalt thou bring an abomination into thy house, lest thou be a cursed thing like it: but thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it; for it is a cursed thing.—Deut. vii, 26.

Odds and Ends.

New York girl: "Why do you dislike 'Macbeth,' Miss Lakeside?" Chicago girl: "Because tragedy seems so commonplace to me. You know my papa has a slaughter-house."

Yes, Alcibiades, your ancestors believed that Venus rose from the sea; but it wasn't from Anthony C. That would hav been too much of a temptation for Saint Anthony.

Jack: "Gus, giv me a cigaret." Gus: "Well, I havn't but one left, Jack. Would you take a man's last cigaret?" Jack (taking the cigaret): "Oh, yes, Gus; I can't smoke but one at a time, you know."

Stranger: "Ah, yours is indeed a model city. I see all the ladies remove their hats at the theater." Manager: "Yes, it is a matinee for ladies and children. Each is afraid of the others' criticisms."

Disappointed author: "And there is one person whose manuscript is never returned, you say?" Editor: "Oh, yes." "Would you mind telling me who he is?" "Oh, no! He's the fellow who fails to inclose a stamped and directed envelope."

New girl: "An' how long should I leave this thing called a 'blower' tight up agin the open fireplace?" Experienced girl: "Lave it until it do be hot enough to take the skin off y'r fingers when yez touch it. Thin lift it off."

Miss Bracer: "It must be his mother, he's so attentiv to her." Miss Frenshaw: "Or possibly that rich aunt of his." Mollycule: "I think we'll walk, Penelope. There don't seem to be a cab in sight." Both listeners (in a breath): "Mercy sake! It's his wife!"

Bobbie (returning from school after a history lesson): "Mamma, was Charles II. an Episcopalian?" Mamma: "No, my son. Why do you ask that?" "Well, the history says he did things he ought not to hav done, and left undone things he ought to hav done, and so I supposed he must be."

"Well, William," said Mr. Hardhead to his new confidential clerk, "you are in a first-class position now at a good salary. I shall expect you to be faithful and diligent; in fact, to make all my interests your own. It won't be necessary, however, for you to make love to the typewriter. I'll attend to her myself."

Darling, I hav often thought
That I'd put my racket in,
But I've had to listen on
To the music of your chin.
Will you love me when I'm old,
And my locks are turned to gray?
Will you buzz into my ear
With your grand and flowery play?
When I weigh two hundred pounds
Will you keep your love for me?
Will you promis, cross your heart,
That you'll hold me on your knee?
Shall we be the same as now
After we hav older grown?
When you're troubled with a boil,
Will you be my ownest own?
When my hair is dapple-gray
And I cannot make it curl,
Shall I be your solid pard,
More so than the hired girl?
Will you hover o'er my head
When I'm going up the flume?
Will you weep and paw the ground
When I'm planted in the tomb?
Will you watch the lowly spot
Where your loved one's dust is laid,
With your shot-gun cocked and primed,
For the student with his spade?
Will you shoot him full of holes
If he digs around my tomb?
Will you send him by express
To his long, eternal home?

"Marriage a failure! I should say not!" remarked an Oregon farmer, whose opinion was desired on one of the great questions of the day. "Why, there's Lucindy gits in up the mornin', milks six cows, gits brekfas', starts four children to skewl, looks arter the other three, feeds the hens, likewise the hogs, likewise some motherless sheep, skims twenty pans o' milk, washes the clothes, gits dinner, et cetery, et cetery. Think I could hire anybody to do it fur what she gits? Not much. Marriage, sir, is a success, sir; a great success!"

A cannibal lived on a cannibal isle,
And was thinner than thin could be,
His legs were as lean as the tail of a rat,
His head rattled round in his No. 5 hat,
And he left no mark on the sand where he sat,
Oh, a woeful sight was he!
So he was—
A dismal sight was he.
Now, there came to this island from over the main
A laudable missionaree,
His weight was three hundred and forty-three pound,
His paunch and his jowls and his tonsure were round,
And he left a mark when he sat on the ground
Just two and a half feet by three,
So he did—
Just two and a half feet by three.
But the moral I'm trying to teach in my song
You soon will be able to see,
For the Christian proved docil and teachable quite;
He learnt from the heathen the thing that was right,
And one Sunday morning, as soon as 'twas light,
He ate up the cannibalee!
Yes he did—
He ate up the cannibalee.

Gems of Thought.

Metaphysics: A most important and sublime science, by the help of which a man is enabled to arrive at a thorough knowledge of things of which his senses will not permit him to form an idea. All Christians are profound metaphysicians. Any p'ous prude will explain to you with imperturbable coolness what is the nature of a pure spirit, of an immaterial soul, and the grace that sufficeth to itself.—Voltaire's Pocket Theology.

The course of philosophy was stopped from its first introduction by an error at that time indeed excusable. This was the fixing the attention upon questions incapable, perhaps forever, of being solved; suffering the mind to be led away by the importance or sublimity of objects, without thinking whether the means existed of compassing them; wishing to establish theories before facts had been collected, and to frame the universe before it was yet known how to survey it.—Condorcet.

The whole literature of the church was absorbed in foolish, metaphysical questions and theological disquisitions, with no bearing on the science and the concerns of life. The subject of the trinity was fertil in dispute. The nature of spirit caused long, learned, and ridiculous disquisitions. It was gravely debated: "How many spirits could dance on the point of a needle," and the remnants of this learning still hang about our churches. Piety (praying, psalms, and charity, especially to the church, or for God) was at a premium over knowledge and morality. Knowledge was depreciated, history called profane, and nature interpreted by the scriptures, or by church authority. On such authority man was a degraded being; and life a brief period for sorrow, repentance, and abasement (except the church).—Gilbert Vale.

In the final, the Positiv state, the mind has given over the vain search after Absolute notions, the origin and destination of the universe, and the causes of phenomena, and applies itself to the study of their laws—that is, their invariable relations of succession and resemblance.—Comte.

We now see the use of science. Science discovers the order of facts—the laws of nature. With this knowledge we gain the gift of prophecy, the order of nature being invariable. The forces of nature are manifested under certain conditions, and, under those conditions, always in the same manner. Science, by discovering these conditions, places it in the power of man to command the forces of nature, to call them into activity at any time and set them to work to fulfil his desires. All man has to do is to bring about the conditions, placing things by transfer in certain relativ positions, and the forces of nature leap into activity to do his work. Science thus givs to man, in relation to these forces, the position of a monarch. A monarch, as a man, has no more personal power than any other man; his power as a monarch is his ability to bring to his aid his mighty hosts—to command his servants "to do this, and they do it." Exactly similar is the sovereignty with which science has invested man: she has subjected to his service the forces of nature—converting them, it may be, from enemies into friends; and so has rendered him not only the most powerful of living creatures, but the veritable master of the world. —John Wilson, M.A., in Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

People imagin that if the thieves are sent to the penitentiary that is the last of the thieves; that if those who kill others are hanged society is on a safe and enduring basis. But the trouble is here: A man comes to your front door and you drive him away. You hav an idea that that man's case is settled. You are mistaken. He goes to the back door. He is again driven away. But the case is not settled. The next thing you know he enters at night. He is a burglar. He is caught; he is convicted; he is sent to the penitentiary, and you imagin that the case is settled. But it is not. You must remember that you hav to keep all the agencies alive for the purpose of taking care of these people. You hav to build and maintain your penitentiaries, your courts of justice; you hav to pay your judges, your district attorneys, your juries, your witnesses, your detectivs, your police—all these people must be paid. So that, after all, it is a very expensiv way of settling this question. You could hav done it far more cheaply had you found this burglar when he was a child, had you taken his father and mother from the tenement house, or had you compelled the owners to keep the tenement clean; or if you had widened the streets, if you had planted a few trees, if you had had plenty of baths, if you had had a school in the neighborhood. If you had taken some interest in this family—some interest in this child—instead of breaking into houses, he might hav been a builder of houses.—Ingersoll.

A third means of promoting morality is ethical culture. Let pure modern morals be taught in the schools in place of biblical instruction. Teach children that morality is wholly independent of theology, and its claims are enforced, not by Sinai, but by usefulness.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

It is the Christian who can consistently commit unmanly deeds and be guilty of immoral conduct, for he does not expect to be saved by his own merits, or to be damned for his misdeeds; it is faith in the blood of Jesus that takes him to heaven. No matter how much vile conduct he may be guilty of, if he only has "faith," he is all safe. Let him contract ever so many debts, Jesus "pays it all." If Christian doctrins are true, morality is wholly unnecessary. Morality cannot save the world, but the blood of Christ can.—D. M. Bennett.

The church says that the sinner is in debt to God, and that the obligation is discharged by the savior. The best that can possibly be said of such a transaction is, that the debt is transferred, not paid. The truth is, that a sinner is in debt to the person he has injured. If a man injures his neighbor, it is not enough for him to get the forgivness of God, but he must hav the forgivness of his neighbor.—Ingersoll.

A NEW APPLICATION OF AN OLD TEXT.

Notes and Clippings.

A DASHING Utah brakeman has eloped with all three of the wives of a prominent Mormon. Thus do the customs of the occident meet with an accident, and the wives of the orient take a levant.

CONGRESS last week appropriated $20,000 "for the relief of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School in Virginia." No explanation of what the money is for was given.

THE latest society formed to run other people is in New Haven. It was started by a preacher, and is composed of church-members. The idea is to make the city warm for all who do not come up to their notions of "morality." The report says: "Their investigations will be carried on secretly, and as far as possible without any publicity whatever. If necessary, a professional detectiv, or a force of them, will be employed. Nothing will be done to bring discredit upon the city. The society will ask itself the question, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' and will answer it in the affirmativ."

WHEN the agitation was begun by the Secular Union for the opening of the museums in this city on Sunday, one of the objections of the trustees was the expense. The World now makes it publicly known for the first time that Mr. W. T. Walters, of Baltimore, offered to giv the trustees $10,000 to pay the estimated expense for three years. He would hav made further contributions if the amount fell short. He is hopeful that the desired end will soon be gained, saying that he feels "sure we shall not be required to wait much longer until greater enlightenment through public sentiment will make itself felt."

IT is estimated that the present population of the United States is 64.000,000. The total increase is said to be 100,000 a month, exclusiv of immigration, and last year the increase by immigration was 518,000. At this rate the next census, which will be taken in July, 1890, will show about 67,000,000.

BISHOP HUNTINGTON gave this warning to his Episcopal brethren last week: "Intense political and commercial forces are ready to push their way into the church, to magnify its material aspects in commercial and political centers, and to match the wealth, official pageantry, and corporate power of the world with hierarchical and other like distinctions of the kingdom of God." That is to say, we shall hav medievalism back again, when cardinals marched with kings and priests with politicians (nobles, they called them then) and the pope led the crowd. It wouldn't surprise us to see it. In fact, we shall see it on the anniversary of Washington's inauguration, right here in New York.

DR. AUSTIN PHELPS, in the Congregationalist, givs rules for the preaching of the hell-fire doctrin. "It is," he says, "one of the difficult arts," and for its successful application he givs eighteen rules. "The art requires a 'still force,' the elocutionary utterances should be in 'low and gentle tones'—'vociferation' would be 'burlesque,' the gesture should be not with the 'fist,' but with the 'open palm' and so on. We are told that 'in sermons on endless punishment more evil than good is done by prolonged descriptiv painting,' that 'a restrictiv principle underlies the argument in defense of endless punishment, which the pulpit often ignores, to its own hurt,' that 'in treating the doctrin of endless punishment for endless sin, preachers should adjust discourse to the condition of minds under the enervating experience of sin.'" That is seriously written, for serious consideration, and shows to what depths of idiocy a complete belief in the Christian religion can reduce a man otherwise sane.

THE Woman's Journal, published at Beatrice, Neb., has a little catechism of interest to clergymen. It runs this wise: "Who inculcate purity of heart, and yet are so confined to the sentiment of sex that they decide from the shape of the body, instead of attributes of the soul, in admitting candidates for the ministry? Ans. Clergymen. Who are so obstinate in their self-conceit, and so fond of doing all the talking, that they will not allow a word from any representativ of the majority of the church? Ans. Clergymen. Who require women to promis obedience in the marriage service? Ans. Clergymen (except among the Methodists). Who point the way of humility, courtesy, and self-denial to women, but refuse to lead the march? Ans. Clergymen. Who love the topmost seats in every place? Ans. Clergymen."

THE Rev. Mr. Sprecher, of Cleveland, O., propounds a hypothesis reconciling the Genesis account of man's creation with the explanation offered by evolution which has the merit of uniqueness, if not of truth. If it should be scientifically demonstrated, he says, that the body of man was included in the chain of nature reaching back to protoplasm, why, then, we should "know that God took from the soulless creatures with bodies like men, one whom he endowed with a human soul, and by whom he began the Adamic race." But what was God doing before he made a grab for that soulless link and "breathed the breath of life" into it? Did he stand an idle spectator watching the procession go by till a fellow came along that he thought would make a good Adam, and then drag him out of the ranks and put him into the garden of Eden? And what becomes of the statement that God made the earth and the animals, as well as man? We fear Mr. Sprecher's reconciliation of the Bible and science will stretch no farther than other attempts in the same line.

SOME wonderful stories are coming from the Congo about missionary success in that region, and over a thousand converts are reported from one station in the cataract region. It is to be hoped, says the Sun, that these fortunate natives are more firmly established in their new faith than the youth whom the Catholic fathers at Bagamoyo nurtured for years, and finally sent out with the Ramaeckers expedition to Central Africa. This young black man shot himself in the foot on the shore of Tanganyika. Several Europeans were the first to reach him. They found him more scared than hurt, and calling in loud tones upon the savior, Mary, and Joseph to help him. Then some porters carried him to his hut, and as he was borne through the camp of the Zanzibar carriers, all Mohammedans, he kept shouting at the top of his voice: "There is no God but Allah, and Mohammed is his prophet." He had been baptized by his Roman Catholic teachers as Boniface, but after the shooting incident he became known to the European contingent as Doubleface.

Agnosticism.

From the Nineteenth Century.

Within the last few months the public has received much and varied information on the subject of agnostics, their tenets, and even their future. Agnosticism exercised the orators of the church congress at Manchester. (See the official report of the church congress held at Manchester, Oct., 1888, pp. 253–4.) It has been furnished with a set of "articles," fewer, but not less rigid, and certainly not less consistent than the Thirty-nine; its nature has been analyzed, and its future severely predicted by the most eloquent of that prophetical school whose Samuel is Auguste Comte. It may still be a question, however, whether the public is as much the wiser as might be expected, considering all the trouble that has been taken to enlighten it. Not only are the three accounts of the agnostic position sadly out of harmony with one another, but I propose to show cause for my belief that all three must be seriously questioned by anyone who employs the term "agnostic" in the sense in which it was originally used. The learned principal of King's College, who brought the topic of Agnosticism before the church congress, took a short and easy way of settling the business:

> But if this be so, for a man to urge, as an escape from this article of belief, that he has no means of a scientific knowledge of the unseen world, or of the future, is irrelevant. His difference from Christians lies not in the fact that he has no knowledge of these things, but that he does not believe the authority on which they are stated. He may prefer to call himself an Agnostic; but his real name is an older one—he is an Infidel—that is to say, an unbeliever. The word Infidel, perhaps, carries an unpleasant significance. Perhaps it is right that it should. It is, and it ought to be, an unpleasant thing for a man to hav to say plainly that he does not believe in Jesus Christ.

And in the course of the discussion which followed, the bishop of Peterborough departed so far from his customary courtesy and self-respect as to speak of "cowardly agnosticism" (p. 262).

So much of Dr. Wace's address either explicitly or implicitly concerns me, that I take upon myself to deal with it; but, in so doing, it must be understood that I speak for myself alone. I am not aware that there is any sect of Agnostics; and if there be, I am not its acknowledged prophet or pope. I desire to leave to the Comtists the entire monopoly of the manufacture of imitation ecclesiasticism.

Let us calmly and dispassionately consider Dr. Wace's appreciation of agnosticism. The agnostic, according to his view, is a person who says he has no means of attaining a scientific knowledge of the unseen world or of the future; by which somewhat loose phraseology Dr. Wace presumably means the theological unseen world and future. I cannot think this description happy either in form or substance, but for the present it may pass. Dr. Wace continues, that is not "his difference from Christians." Are there then any Christians who say that they know nothing about the unseen world and the future? I was ignorant of the fact, but I am ready to accept it on the authority of a professional theologian, and I proceed to Dr. Wace's next proposition.

The real state of the case, then, is that the agnostic "does not believe the authority" on which "these things" are stated, which authority is Jesus Christ. He is simply an old-fashioned "infidel" who is afraid to own to his right name. As "presbyter is priest writ large," so is "agnostic" the mere Greek equivalent for the Latin "infidel." There is an attractiv simplicity about this solution of the problem; and it has that advantage of being somewhat offensiv to the persons attacked, which is so dear to the less refined sort of controversialist. The agnostic says, "I can not find good evidence that so and so is true." "Ah," says his adversary, seizing his opportunity, "then you declare that Jesus Christ was untruthful, for he said so and so;" a very telling method of rousing prejudice. But suppose that the value of the evidence as to what Jesus may hav said and done, and as to the exact nature and scope of his authority, is just that which the agnostic finds it most difficult to determin? If I venture to doubt that the duke of Wellington gave the command "Up, guards, and at 'em!" at Waterloo, I do not think that even Dr. Wace would accuse me of disbelieving the duke. Yet it would be just as reasonable to do this as to accuse anyone of denying what Jesus said before the preliminary question as to what he did say is settled.

Now, the question as to what Jesus really said and did is strictly a scientific problem, which is capable of solution by no other methods than those practiced by the historian and the literary critic. It is a problem of immense difficulty, which has occupied some of the best heads in Europe for the last century; and it is only of late years that their investigations hav begun to converge toward one conclusion.*

That kind of faith which Dr. Wace describes and lauds is of no use here. Indeed, he himself takes pains to destroy its evidential value.

"What made the Mohammedan world? Trust and faith in the declarations and assurances of Mohammed. And what made the Christian world? Trust and faith in the declarations and assurances of Jesus Christ and his apostles" (l. c. p. 253). The triumphant tone of this imaginary catechism leads me to suspect that its author has hardly appreciated its full import. Presumably, Dr. Wace regards Mohammed as an unbeliever, or, to use the term which he prefers, infidel; and considers that his assurances hav given rise to a vast delusion, which has led, and is leading, millions of men straight to everlasting punishment. And this being so, the "Trust and faith" which hav "made the Mohammedan world," in just the same sense as they hav "made the Christian world," must be trust and faith in falsehood. No man who has studied history, or even attended to the occurrences of every-day life, can doubt the enormous practical value of trust and faith; but as little will he be inclined to deny that this practical value has not the least relation to the reality of the objects of that trust and faith. In examples of patient constancy of faith and of unswerving trust the "Acta Martyrum" do not excel the annals of Babism.

The discussion upon which we hav now entered goes so thoroughly to the root of the whole matter; the question of the day is so completely, as the author of "Robert Elsmere" says, the value of testimony, that I shall offer no apology for following it out somewhat in detail; and, by way of giving substance to the argument, I shall base what I hav to say upon a case, the consideration of which lies strictly within the province of natural science, and of that particular part of it known as the physiology and pathology of the nervous system.

I find, in the second gospel (chap. v), a statement, to all appearance intended to hav the same evidential value as any other contained in that history. It is the well-known story of the devils who were cast out of a man, and ordered, or permitted, to enter into a herd of swine, to the great loss and damage of the innocent Gerasene, or Gadarene, pig-owners. There can be no doubt that the narrator intends to convey to his readers his own conviction that this casting out and entering in were effected by the agency of Jesus of Nazareth; that, by speech and action, Jesus enforced this conviction; nor does any inkling of the legal and moral difficulties of the case manifest itself.

On the other hand, everything that I know of physiological and pathological science leads me to entertain a very strong conviction that the phenomena ascribed to possession are as purely natural as those which constitute small-pox; everything that I know of anthropology leads me to think that the belief in demons and demoniacal possession is a mere survival of a once universal superstition, and that its persistence at the present time is pretty much in the inverse ratio of the general instruction, intelligence, and sound judgment of the population among whom it prevails. Everything that I know of law and justice convinces me that the wanton destruction of other people's property is a misdemeanor of evil example. Again, the study of history, and especially of that of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, leaves no shadow of doubt on my mind that the belief in the reality of possession and of witchcraft, justly based, alike by Catholics and Protestants, upon this and innumerable other passages in both the Old and New Testaments, gave rise, through the special influence of Christian ecclesiastics, to the most horrible persecutions and judicial murders of thousands upon thousands of innocent men, women, and children. And when I reflect that the record of a plain and simple declaration upon such an occasion as this, that the belief in witchcraft and possession is wicked nonsense, would hav rendered the long agony of medieval humanity impossible, I am prompted to reject, as dishonoring, the supposition that such declaration was withheld out of condescension to popular error.

"Come forth, thou unclean spirit, out of the man" (Mark v, 8),* are the words attributed to Jesus. If I declare, as I hav no hesitation in doing, that I utterly disbelieve in the existence of "unclean spirits," and, consequently, in the possibility of their "coming forth" out of a man, I suppose that Dr. Wace will tell me I am disregarding the testimony "of our Lord" (l. c., p. 255). For if these words were really used, the most resourceful of reconcilers can hardly venture to affirm that they are compatible with a disbelief in "these things." As the learned and fair-minded, as well as orthodox, Dr. Alexander remarks, in an editorial note to the article "Demoniacs," in the Biblical Cyclopedia (vol. i, p. 664, note):

> . . . On the lowest grounds on which our Lord and his apostles can be placed they must, at least, be regarded as honest men. Now, though honest speech does not require that words should be used always and only in their etymological sense, it does require that they should not be used so as to affirm what the speaker knows to be false. Whilst, therefore, our Lord and his apostles might use the word or the phrase ascribed to them, as a popular description of certain diseases, without giving in to the belief which lay at the source of such a mode of expression, they could not speak of demons entering into a man, or being cast out of him, without pledging themselvs to the belief of an actual possession of the man by the demons (Campbell, Prel. Diss., vi, 1, 10). If, consequently, they did not hold this belief, they spoke not as honest men.

The story which we are considering does not rest on the authority of the second gospel alone. The third confirms the second, especially in the matter of commanding the unclean spirit to come out of the man (Luke viii, 29); and, although the first gospel either givs a different version of the same story, or tells another of like kind, the essential point remains: "If thou cast us out, send us away into the herd of swine. And he said unto them, Go!" (Matt. viii, 31, 32).

If the concurrent testimony of the three synoptics, then, is really sufficient to do away with all rational doubt as to matter of fact of the utmost practical and speculativ importance—belief or disbelief in which may affect, and has affected, men's lives and their conduct toward other men in the most serious way—then I am bound to believe that Jesus implicitly affirmed himself to possess a "knowledge of the unseen world," which afforded full confirmation to the belief in demons and possession current among his contemporaries. If the story is true, the medieval theory of the invisible world may be, and probably is, quite correct; and the witchfinders, from Sprenger to Hopkins and Mather, are much-maligned men.

On the other hand, humanity, noting the frightful consequences of this belief; common sense, observing the futility of the evidence on which it is based, in all cases that hav been properly investigated; science, more and more seeing its way to inclose all the phenomena of so-called "possession" within the domain of pathology, so far as they are not to be relegated to that of the police—all these powerful influences concur in warning us, at our peril, against accepting the belief without the most careful scrutiny of the authority on which it rests.

I can discern no escape from this dilemma: either Jesus said what he is reported to hav said, or he did not. In the former case, it is inevitable that his authority on matters connected with the "unseen world" should be roughly shaken; in the latter, the blow falls upon the authority of the synoptic gospels. If their report on a matter of such stupendous and far-reaching practical import as this is untrustworthy, how can we be sure of its trustworthiness in other cases? The favorit "earth," in which the hard-pressed reconciler takes refuge, that the Bible does not profess to teach science,* is stopped in this instance. For the question of the existence of demons and of possession by them, though it lies strictly within the province of science, is also of the deepest moral and religious significance. If physical and mental disorders are caused by demons, Gregory of Tours and his contemporaries rightly considered that relics and exorcists were more useful than doctors; the gravest questions arise as to the legal and moral responsibilities of persons inspired by demoniacal impulses; and our whole conception of the universe and of our relations to it becomes totally different from what it would be on the contrary hypothesis.

The theory of life of an average medieval Christian was as different from that of an average nineteenth-century Englishman as that of a West-African negro is now in these respects. The modern world is slowly, but surely, shaking off these and other monstrous survivals of savage delusions, and, whatever happens, it will not return to that wallowing in the mire. Until the contrary is proved, I venture to doubt whether, at this present moment, any Protestant theologian, who has a reputation to lose, will say that he believes the Gadarene story.

The choice then lies between discrediting those who compiled the gospel biographies and disbelieving the master, whom they, simple souls, thought to honor by preserving such traditions of the exercise of his authority over Satan's invisible world. This is the dilemma. No deep scholarship, nothing but a

* Dr. Wace tells us: "It may be asked how far we can rely on the accounts we possess of our Lord's teachings on these subjects." And he seems to think the question appropriately answered by the assertion that it "ought to be regarded as settled by M. Renan's practical surrender of the adverse case." I thought I knew M. Renan's works pretty well, but I hav contrived to miss this "practical" (I wish Dr. Wace had defined the scope of that useful adjectiv) surrender. However, as Dr. Wace can find no difficulty in pointing out the passage of M. Renan's writings, by which he feels justified in making his statement, I shall wait for further enlightenment, contenting myself, for the present, with remarking that if M. Renan were to retract and do penance in Notre Dame to-morrow for any contributions to biblical criticism that may be specially his property, the main results of that criticism, as they are set forth in the works of Strauss, Baur, Reuss, and Volkmar, for example, would not be sensibly affected.

* Here, as always, the revised version is cited.

* Does anyone really mean to say that there is any internal or external criterion by which the reader of a biblical statement, in which scientific matter is contained, is enabled to judge whether it is to be taken au sérieux or not? Is the account of the deluge, accepted as true in the New Testament, less precise and specific than that of the call of Abraham, also accepted as true therein? By what mark does the story of the feeding with manna in the wilderness, which involves some very curious scientific problems, show that it is meant merely for edification, while the story of the inscription of the law on stone by the hand of Jahveh is literally true? If the story of the fall is not the true record of a historical occurrence, what becomes of Pauline theology? Yet the story of the fall as directly conflicts with probability, and is as devoid of trustworthy evidence, as that of the creation or that of the deluge, with which it forms a harmoniously legendary series.

knowledge of the revised version (on which it is to be supposed all that mere scholarship can do has been done), with the application thereto of the commonest canons of common sense, is needful to enable us to make a choice between its horns. It is hardly doubtful that the story, as told in the first gospel, is merely a version of that told in the second and third. Nevertheless, the discrepancies are serious and irreconcilable; and, on this ground alone, a suspension of judgment, at the least, is called for. But there is a great deal more to be said. From the dawn of scientific biblical criticism until the present day the evidence against the long-cherished notion that the three synoptic gospels are the works of three independent authors, each prompted by divine inspiration, has steadily accumulated, until, at the present time, there is no visible escape from the conclusion that each of the three is a compilation consisting of a groundwork common to all three—the threefold tradition; and of a superstructure, consisting, firstly, of matter common to it with one of the others, and, secondly, of matter special to each. The use of the terms "groundwork" and "superstructure" by no means implies that the latter must be of later date than the former. On the contrary, some parts of it may be, and probably are, older than some parts of the groundwork.*

The story of the Gadarene swine belongs to the groundwork; at least, the essential part of it, in which the belief in demoniac possession is expressed, does; and therefore the compilers of the first, second, and third gospels, whoever they were, certainly accepted that belief (which, indeed, was universal among both Jews and pagans at that time), and attributed it to Jesus.

What, then, do we know about the originator, or originators, of this groundwork—of that threefold tradition which all three witnesses (in Paley's phrase) agree upon—that we should allow their mere statements to outweigh the counter arguments of humanity, of common sense, of exact science, and to imperil the respect which all would be glad to be able to render to their master?

Absolutely nothing.† There is no proof, nothing more than a fair presumption, that any one of the gospels existed, in the state in which we find it in the authorized version of the Bible, before the second century, or, in other words, sixty or seventy years after the events recorded. And, between that time and the date of the oldest extant manuscripts of the gospels, there is no telling what additions and alterations and interpolations may hav been made. It may be said that this is all mere speculation, but it is a good deal more. As competent scholars and honest men, our revisers hav felt compelled to point out that such things hav happened even since the date of the oldest known manuscripts. The oldest two copies of the second gospel end with the eighth verse of the sixteenth chapter; the remaining twelve verses are spurious, and it is noteworthy that the maker of the addition has not hesitated to introduce a speech in which Jesus promises his disciples that "in my name shall they cast out devils."

The other passage "rejected to the margin" is still more instructiv. It is that touching apolog, with its profound ethical sense, of the woman taken in adultery—which, if internal evidence were an infallible guide, might well be affirmed to be a typical example of the teachings of Jesus. Yet, say the revisers, pitilessly, "Most of the ancient authorities omit John vii, 53–viii, 11." Now let any reasonable man ask himself this question. If, after an approximativ settlement of the canon of the New Testament, and even later than the fourth and fifth centuries, literary fabricators had the skill and the audacity to make such additions and interpolations as these, what may they hav done when no one had thought of a canon; when oral tradition, still unfixed, was regarded as more valuable than such written records as may hav existed in the latter portion of the first century? Or, to take the other alternativ, if those who gradually settled the canon did not know of the existence of the oldest codices which hav come down to us; or if, knowing them, they rejected their authority, what is to be thought of their competency as critics of the text?

People who object to free criticism of the Christian scriptures forget that they are what they are in virtue of very free criticism; unless the advocates of inspiration are prepared to affirm that the majority of influential ecclesiastics during several centuries were safeguarded against error. For, even granting that some books of the period were inspired, they were certainly few amongst many; and those who selected the canonical books, unless they themselvs were also inspired, must be regarded in the light of mere critics, and, from the evidence they hav left of their intellectual habits, very uncritical critics. When one thinks that such delicate questions as those involved fell into the hands of men like Papias (who believed in the famous millenarian grape story); of Irenæus with his "reasons" for the existence of only four gospels; and of such calm and dispassionate judges as Tertullian, with his "Credo quia impossibile;" the marvel is that the selection which constitutes our New Testament is as free as it is from obviously objectionable matter. The apocryphal gospels certainly deserve to be apocryphal; but one may suspect that a little more critical discrimination would hav enlarged the Apocrypha not inconsiderably.

At this point a very obvious objection arises and deserves full and candid consideration. It may be said that critical skepticism carried to the length suggested is historical pyrrhonism; that if we are to altogether discredit an ancient or a modern historian, because he has assumed fabulous matter to be true, it will be as well to giv up paying any attention to history. It may be said, and with great justice, that Eginhard's "Life of Charlemagne" is none the less trustworthy because of the astounding revelation of credulity, of lack of judgment, and even of respect for the eighth commandment, which he has unconsciously made in the "History of the Translation of the Blessed Martyrs Marcellinus and Paul." Or, to go no farther back than the last number of this Review, surely that excellent lady, Miss Strickland, is not to be refused all credence because of the myth about the second James's remains, which she seems to hav unconsciously invented.

Of course this is perfectly true. I am afraid there is no man alive whose witness could be accepted, if the condition precedent were proof that he had never invented and promulgated a myth. In the minds of all of us there are little places here and there like the indistinguishable spots on a rock which giv foothold to moss or stone crop; on which, if the germ of a myth fall, it is certain to grow, without in the least degree affecting our accuracy or truthfulness elsewhere. Sir Walter Scott knew that he could not repeat a story without, as he said, "giving it a new hat and stick." Most of us differ from Sir Walter only in not knowing about this tendency of the mythopeic faculty to break out unnoticed. But it is also perfectly true that the mythopeic faculty is not equally activ on all minds, nor in all regions, and under all conditions of the same minds. David Hume was certainly not so liable to temptation as the Venerable Bede, or even as some recent historians who could be mentioned, and the most imaginativ of debtors, if he owes five pounds, never makes an obligation to pay a hundred out of it. The rule of common sense is prima facie to trust a witness in all matters in which neither his self-interest, his prejudices, nor that love of the marvelous, which is inherent to a greater or less degree in all mankind, are strongly concerned; and, when they are involved, to require corroborativ evidence in exact proportion to the contravention of probability by the thing testified.

Now, in the Gadarene affair, I do not think I am unreasonably skeptical if I say that the existence of demons who can be transferred from a man to a pig, does thus contravene probability. Let me be perfectly candid. I admit I hav no à priori objection to offer. There are physical things, such as tæniæ and trichinæ, which can be transferred from men to pigs, and vice versa, and which do undoubtedly produce most diabolical and deadly effects on both. For anything I can absolutely prove to the contrary, there may be spiritual things capable of the same transmigration, with like effects. Moreover I am bound to add that perfectly truthful persons, for whom I hav the greatest respect, believe in stories about spirits of the present day, quite as improbable as that we are considering.

So I declare as plainly as I can that I am unable to show cause why these transferable devils should not exist; nor can I deny that, not merely the whole Roman church, but many Wacean "infidels" of no mean repute, do honestly and firmly believe that the activity of such-like demonic beings is in full swing in this year of grace, 1889.

Nevertheless, as good Bishop Butler says, "probability is the guide of life," and it seems to me that this is just one of the cases in which the canon of credibility and testimony, which I hav ventured to lay down, has full force. So that, with the most entire respect for many (by no means for all) of our witnesses for the truth of demonology, ancient and modern, I conceive their evidence on this particular matter to be ridiculously insufficient to warrant their conclusion.*

After what has been said I do not think that any sensible man, unless he happen to be angry, will accuse me of "contradicting the Lord and his apostles" if I reiterate my total disbelief in the whole Gadarene story. But, if that story is discredited, all the other stories of demoniac possession fall under suspicion. And if the belief in demons and demoniac possession, which forms the somber background of the whole picture of primitiv Christianity presented to us in the New Testament, is shaken, what is to be said, in any case, of the uncorroborated testimony of the gospels with respect to "the unseen world?"

I am not aware that I hav been influenced by any more bias in regard to the Gadarene story than I hav been in dealing with other cases of like kind, the investigation of which has interested me. I was brought up in the strictest school of evangelical orthodoxy, and when I was old enough to think for myself I started upon my journey of inquiry with little doubt about the general truth of what I had been taught, and with that feeling of the unpleasantness of being called an "infidel" which, we are told, is so right and proper. Near my journey's end, I find myself in a condition of something more than mere doubt about these matters.

In the course of other inquiries, I hav had to do with fossil remains which looked quite plain at a distance, and became more and more indistinct as I tried to define their outline by close inspection. There was something there—something which, if I could win assurance about it, might mark a new epoch in the history of the earth; but, study as long as I might, certainty eluded my grasp. So has it been with me in my efforts to define the grand figure of Jesus as it lies in the primary strata of Christian literature. Is he the kindly, peaceful Christ depicted in the catacombs? Or is he the stern judge who frowns above the altar of SS. Cosmas and Damianus? Or can he be rightly represented in the bleeding ascetic, broken down by physical pain, of too many medieval pictures? Are we to accept the Jesus of the second or the Jesus of the fourth gospel as the true Jesus? What did he really say and do; and how much that is attributed to h m in speech and action is the embroidery of the va ious parties into which his followers tended to split themselvs within twenty years of his death, when even the threefold tradition was only nascent?

If anyone will answer these questions for me with something more to the point than feeble talk about the "cowardice of agnosticism," I shall be deeply his debtor. Unless and until they are satisfactorily answered, I say of agnosticism in this matter, "J'y suis et j'y reste."

But, as we hav seen, it is asserted that I hav no business to call myself an agnostic; that if I am not a Christian I am an infidel; and that I ought to call myself by that name of "unpleasant significance." Well, I do not care much what I am called by other people, and if I had at my side all those who since the Christian era hav been called infidels by other folks, I could not desire better company. If these are my ancestors, I prefer, with the old Frank, to be with them wherever they are. But there are several points in Dr. Wace's contention which must be eliminated before I can even think of undertaking to carry out his wishes. I must, for instance, know what a Christian is. Now, what is a Christian? By whose authority is the signification of that term defined? Is there any doubt that the immediate followers of Jesus, the "sect of the Nazarenes," were strictly orthodox Jews, differing from other Jews not more than the Sadducees, the Pharisees, and the Essenes differed from one another; in fact, only in the belief that the messiah, for whom the rest of their nation waited, had come? Was not their chief, "James, the brother of the Lord," reverenced alike by Sadducee, Pharisee, and Nazarene? At the famous conference which, according to the Acts, took place at Jerusalem, does not James declare that "myriads" of Jews, who, by that time, had become Nazarenes, were "all zealous for the law?" Was not the name of "Christian" first used to denote the converts to the doctrin promulgated by Paul and Barnabas at Antioch? Does the subsequent history of Christianity leave any doubt that, from this time forth, the "little rift within the lute" caused by the new teaching developed, if not inaugurated, at Antioch, grew wider and wider, until the two types of doctrin irreconcilably diverged? Did not the primitiv Nazarenism or Ebionism develop into the Nazarenism, and Ebionism, and Elkasaitism of later ages, and finally die out in obscurity and condemnation as damnable heresy; while the younger doctrin throve and pushed out its shoots into that endless variety of sects, of which the three strongest survivors are the Roman and Greek churches and modern Protestantism?

Singular state of things! If I were to profess the

* See, for an admirable discussion of the whole subject, Dr. Abbott's article on the gospels in the Encyclopedia Britannica; and the remarkable monograph by Professor Volkmar, Jesus Nazarenus und die erste christliche Zeit (1882). Whether we agree with the conclusions of these writers or not, the method of critical investigation which they adopt is unimpeachable.

†Notwithstanding the hard words shot at me from behind the hedge of anonymity by a writer in a recent number of the Quarterly Review, I repeat, without the slightest fear of refutation, that the four gospels, as they hav come to us, are the work of unknown writers.

* Their arguments, in the long run, are always reducible to one form. Otherwise trustworthy witnesses affirm that such and such events took place. These events are inexplicable, except the agency of "spirits" is admitted. Therefore "spirits" were the cause of the phenomena.

And the heads of the reply are always the same. Remember Goethe's aphorism: "Alles factische ist schon Theorie." Trustworthy witnesses are constantly deceived, or deceive themselvs, in their interpretation of sensible phenomena. No one can prove that the sensible phenomena, in these cases, could be caused only by the agency of spirits, and there is abundant ground for believing that they may be produced in other ways.

Therefore, the utmost that can be reasonably asked for, on the evidence as it stands, is suspension of judgment. And on the necessity for even that suspension, reasonable men may differ, according to their views of probability.

doctrin which was held by "James, the brother of the Lord," and by every one of the "myriads" of his followers and co-religionists in Jerusalem up to twenty or thirty years after the crucifixion (and one knows not how much later at Pella), I should be condemned with unanimity as an ebionising heretic by the Roman, Greek, and Protestant churches! And, probably, this hearty and unanimous condemnation of the creed held by those who were in the closest personal relation with their Lord is almost the only point upon which they would be cordially of one mind. On the other hand, though I hardly dare imagin such a thing, I very much fear that the "pillars" of the primitiv Hierosolymitan church would hav considered Dr. Wace an infidel. No one can read the famous second chapter of Galatians and the book of Revelation without seeing how narrow was even Paul's escape from a similar fate. And, if ecclesiastical history is to be trusted, the Thirty-nine articles, be they right or wrong, diverge from the primitiv doctrin of the Nazarenes vastly more than even Pauline Christianity did.

But, further than this, I hav great difficulty in assuring myself that even James "the brother of the Lord," and his "myriads" of Nazarenes, properly represented the doctrins of their master. For it is constantly asserted by our modern "pillars" that one of the chief features of the work of Jesus was the instauration of religion by the abolition of what our sticklers for articles and liturgies, with unconscious humor, call the narrow restrictions of the law. Yet, if James knew this, how could the bitter controversy with Paul hav arisen; and why did one or the other side not quote any of the various sayings of Jesus, recorded in the gospels, which directly bear on the question—sometimes, apparently, in opposit directions?

So if I am asked to call myself an "infidel," I reply, To what doctrin do you ask me to be faithful? Is it that contained in the Nicene and the Athanasian creeds? My firm belief is that the Nazarenes, say of the year 40, headed by James, would hav stopped their ears and thought worthy of stoning the audacious man who propounded it to them. Is it contained in the so-called Apostles' creed? I am pretty sure that even that would hav created a recalcitrant commotion at Pella in the year 70 among the Nazarenes of Jerusalem who had fled from the soldiers of Titus. And yet, if the unadulterated tradition of the teachings of "the Nazarene" were to be found anywhere, it surely should hav been amidst those not very aged disciples who may hav heard them as they were delivered.

Therefore, however sorry I may be to be unable to demonstrate that, if necessary, I should not be afraid to call myself an "infidel," I cannot do it, even to gratify the bishop of Peterborough and Dr. Wace. And I would appeal to the bishop, whose nativ sense of humor is not the least marked of his many excellent gifts and virtues, whether asking a man to call himself an "infidel" is not rather a droll request. "Infidel" is a term of reproach, which Christians and Mohammedans, in their modesty, agree to apply to those who differ from them. If he had only thought of it, Dr. Wace might hav used the term "miscreant," which, with the same etymological signification, has the advantage of being still more "unpleasant" to the persons to whom it applied. But, in the name of all that is Hibernian, I ask the bishop of Peterborough why should a man be expected to call himself a "miscreant" or an "infidel?" That St. Patrick "had two birthdays because he was a twin" is a reasonable and intelligible utterance beside that of the man who should declare himself to be an infidel on the ground of denying his own belief. It may be logically, if not ethically, defensible that a Christian should call a Mohammedan an infidel and vice versa; but, on Dr. Wace's principles, both ought to call themselvs infidels, because each applies that term to the other.

Now I am afraid that all the Mohammedan world would agree in reciprocating that appellation to Dr. Wace himself. I once visited the Hazar mosque, the great university of Mohammedanism, in Cairo, in ignorance of the fact that I was unprovided with proper authority. A swarm of angry undergraduates, as I suppose I ought to call them, came buzzing about me and my guide; and if I had known Arabic, I suspect that "dog of an infidel" would hav been by no means the most "unpleasant" of the epithets showered upon me, before I could explain and apologize for the mistake. If I had had the pleasure of Dr. Wace's company on that occasion, the undiscriminativ followers of the Prophet would, I am afraid, hav made no difference between us; not even if they had known that he was the head of an orthodox Christian seminary. And I hav not the smallest doubt that even one of the learned mollahs, if his grave courtesy would hav permitted him to say anything offensiv to men of another mode of belief, would hav told us that he wondered we did not find it "very unpleasant" to disbelieve in the Prophet of Islam.

From what precedes, I think it becomes sufficiently clear that Dr. Wace's account of the origin of the name of "Agnostic" is quite wrong. Indeed, I am bound to add that very slight effort to discover the truth would hav convinced him that, as a matter of fact, the term arose otherwise. I am loth to go over an old story once more; but more than one object which I hav in view will be served by telling it a little more fully than it has yet been told.

Washington's Birthday.

Of all the miserable blizzards I ever encountered last Friday night, the occasion of our celebration of Washington's birthday, was the worst, but, strange to relate, the storm and cold did not deter a large number of ladies from attending, some of them coming ten miles to participate in the dance. They were far more heroic than the men, which made those present in much greater demand. To the Vorwaerts Turner Society we were indebted for one of the finest gymnastic performances on the "horse" and the horizontal bars ever witnessed, by a class of fifteen sturdy Germans. The Chicago Times said:

The Chicago Secular Union celebrated Washington's birthday at Princess Opera House last evening. The first number on the program was an address by President Stevens, who after a tribute to the first president's generalship and sterling qualities as a statesman, proceeded to claim him as a Secularist. The speaker said all good and great Freethinkers were counted as Christians when dead, evidencing the moral decadence of orthodoxy, as it relied on the power and influence of great names, not moral force, to hold its sway in society. Washington's supposed piety, to use common parlance, has been worked for all it is worth, and as an example to Sunday-school children he has ever been held up as a model for emulation. But when Huxley, Emerson, and Darwin hav been claimed by preachers in this city for Christianity, can we reasonably expect that these reputation-snatchers would not "resurrect" the bones of George Washington? The speaker laid particular stress on the non-committal attitude of George Washington on the matter of religion in his public utterances. Referred to his companionship with the Deists of his day and showed that the first president was a thorough Secularist, for had he desired to engraft any religious tenet on the Constitution, as president of that convention he had the power and opportunity to force any measure he could hav desired. While it might possibly be well for Washington not to lose the respect of the Christian community by openly avowing his convictions as a Deist along with Franklin, Paine, and Jefferson, yet how much more glorious would hav been his name had he done so! Paine will liv in loved remembrance of the progressiv future for his moral courage as much as for patriotic statesmanship. The speaker then quoted John E. Remsburg to prove that Washington was a Deist. A feature of the evening was a splendid exhibition of gymnastics by a select class of the Vorwaerts Turn Society. Dancing was kept up till early morning.

There are individuals in this world with mental calibers that resemble the traditional Revolutionary smoothbore musket that when it goes off generates more force behind than before it. They are continually obtruding their pedal extremities in hopes that some one will step on their corns and giv them an opportunity to kick. Their egotism is so immeasurably superior to their sense of justice and fair play that no amount of argument will convince them that they are not the target at which every gun is aimed, and in consequence they are always on the warpath, with their tomahawks in their belts and their knives sharpened ready to take somebody's scalp.

Among this unfortunate class are many members of what is known as the Secular Union, an institution whose object of existence, judged by its past record, would seem to be to compel the use of the United States mails for the distribution of obscene literature. They delight in calling themselvs "Freethinkers," and claim to be organized for the purpose of propagating the principles of Freethought. As if there was any restraint upon Freethought, or that people were prevented from thinking as they please or even expressing their thoughts so long as they do it with a proper regard for their neighbors.

This so-called Secular Union has discovered a mare's nest in the bill recently introduced by Mr. Blair in the United States Senate to prohibit Sunday labor. With their characteristic egotism, some of the members of the Secular Union imagin Senator Blair has his gun aimed at them, and with a freedom that givs the lie to all their claims of a suppression of Freethought they meet on Sunday and between drinks they air their eloquence and resolute. In their endeavor to bolster up a bad cause they do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the tenor of the bill. In order to incite the opposition of that class of small fry and narrow intellects who go into spasms at the mention of the name of the despised Nazarene, the members of this so-called Freethought brigade substitute the "Lord's day" wherever "Sunday" is mentioned in the bill. In order to catch those who delight in "beer picnics" on Sunday they try to make it appear that all kinds of pleasure is to be prohibited on Sunday. To mystify the workingman they say the bill provides that the employer need not pay for work done on Sunday. Now the fact is, while the tendency of the bill will be to discourage "beer picnics," it will not prevent any man from making a hog of himself and drinking all the beer he wants if he does it in a way that will not annoy his neighbors nor infringe upon their rights. These so-called Freethinkers are terribly afraid if the Blair bill is passed it will compel them to read the Bible. The bill won't hav any such effect, but what if it did? Are their intellects so terribly weak that they are afraid they will become unbalanced if they are compelled to read of the struggles of humanity in its attempt to attain the infinit? These individuals who sleep with a copy of the Police News or Day's Doings under their pillow are afraid their morals will become corrupted by reading the poetry of Solomon's songs. Will the story of Jesus, whose broad humanity, magnificent individuality, and heroic self-sacrifice has no parallel in the history of worlds, damage the intellect of these Freethinkers if they should be compelled to read it, which they won't?

Mr. Blair's bill is for the purpose of giving a day of rest, recreation, and proper enjoyment of one day in seven to fifteen or twenty millions of overburdened and overworked people, for the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. A careful study of its provisions will convince anyone with as much brains as a chippy that it will not interfere with anybody's "personal rights." It has been carefully drawn with wise and beneficent provisions for the rights of humanity. It ought to pass and become a law, and if they don't want to read the Bible on Sunday, or don't want to go to church, they can get a copy of the Day's Doings or the Police News and go a-fishing or duck-hunting, or they may hie themselvs to a north side beer garden, carry a keg or barrel of beer with them, and when they get sufficient inspiration they can assemble in the educational institute of the Secular Union and blow their bazoos for the entertainment of each other, or for anyone they can get to listen to them.

The above is from a disreputable rag, the Knights of Labor, existing for the "boodle" of a few politicians who hope to frighten business men into advertising under the impression that it is supported by the Knights of Labor. But that body is practically dead, and scarcely any even of them would touch this paper. It took nearly three weeks for me to learn of its vaporings, which hav been ably answered by your brilliant brother George, in Freethought. But that was entirely unnecessary. The editor was expelled, if my memory serves me, from the Knights of Labor, and came near wearing a suit more fashionable than gay at the state retreat at Joliet, for some of his numerous swindling operations. If that paper praised a decent person, he ought to see that the edition is suppressed. Nothing could be more welcome to me than the hatred of this pariah. The special animus of this attack on our Union arises from the speeches I hav been making under the auspices of the German Turner societies against the Blair Sunday bill, at some of which I pointed out that this piece of religious tyranny was indorsed by Powderly, and Powderly was indorsed by Cardinal Gibbons, and the cardinal wore the bloody insignia of Rome as the traitorous agent of Pecci. It looks as though the remarks were appreciated.

EIGHT MILLION AGENTS OF THE ITALIAN BANDIT.

The Catholic Directory for 1889 informs us that the Romish banditti in the United States hav a membership of 8,157,676, 8,118 priests, and 7,353 houses of conspiracy, called churches, all exempt from taxation, so as to more easily undermine the government. This Italian conspiracy is officered in the United States as follows: One cardinal, twelve archbishops, seventy-two bishops, one prefect-apostolic, and eight mitered abbots. Those in charge of the seven vicarates-apostolic are bishops. They, with fifty-eight over-sees—two of the sixty dioceses being vacant—and seven who hav resigned, make up the seventy-two bishops. The Rt. Rev. John J. Keane, the former bishop of Richmond, Va., is one of those who hav given up their sees. He is now rector of the Catholic University at Washington. In a general summary the directory gives the total number of priests in the United States as 8,118. Of these 2,008 are members of religious orders and 6,110 are secular clergymen. There are 7,353 churches, 2,770 stations—that is, places where there are not resident pastors—and 1,480 chapels. The Catholics hav 199 orphan asylums, with 21,358 inmates; 32 theological seminaries, with 1,570 students; 124 colleges, 549 academies, 2,799 parochial schools, with 597,194 pupils. There are thirteen archdioceses—New York having more priests than any other, Baltimore second with 325. As to the number of churches Milwaukee takes the lead, having 268; St. Paul second, 245; Cleveland third, 226; and Chicago fourth, with 210. Brooklyn "takes care" of more orphans (2,357), and New York comes fifth—Philadelphia providing for 1,404, San Francisco 1,350, and New Orleans 1,300.

Baltimore, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cincinnati, Buffalo, and St. Louis hav more theological seminaries than New York, there being three each in Baltimore and Philadelphia, and two in each of the other sees.

In the number of parochial schools New York takes the lead, Louisville being second—125. Chicago takes first place for attendance, as its pupils number 42,087.

New York has 325,000 more Catholics than its nearest competitor, Boston, in which reside 475,000 Romanists.

Each of these archdioceses is the head of a province, which is again made up of several sees. In the thirteen provinces there are sixty dioceses, seven vicarates-apostolic, and one prefecture-apostolic, that of the Indian Territory.

The statistics for the archdiocese of New York show that there are churches with resident priests, 144; without resident priests, 46; chapels, 60; stations (without churches) regularly visited, 42; priests, 479 (secular, 311; regular, 43; not affiliated with the archdiocese, 25); brothers, including novices and postulants, 398; religious women, including novices and postulants, 2,179; 1 theological seminary, students, 134; 4 colleges, students, 1,107; 8 boys' academies, students, 886; 32 girls' academies, students, 2,957; 78 boys' parochial schools, pupils, 18,148; 79 girls' parochial schools, pupils, 19,658; 6 orphanage schools, pupils, 1,201; 7 industrial and reform schools, inmates, 3,153; 6 orphan asylums, inmates, 1,201; 17 homes for destitute or wayward children, inmates, 9,292; 6 hospitals, inmates, 5,127; 3 homes for the aged, inmates, 814; 1 insane asylum, inmates, 58; 1 foundling asylum, inmates, 1,670 (not all Catholics though); 44 conferences of St. Vincent de Paul, members, 1,200. The Catholic population is 800,000.

These figures, compared with the statistics of 1888, show that during the year the archdiocese has gained 2 churches, 1 chapel, 1 station, 42 priests, 54 brothers, including novices and postulants; 3 girls' academies, 9 boys' parochial schools, and 11 girls' parochial schools. The increase in the number of pupils in the boys' schools is 1,577, while in the girls' schools the gain is 462.

In spite of the above showing of wealth and power, these traitors feel ill at ease as long as education is unrestricted.

Being fortunate enough to secure an admission ticket to the lectures of the Young Men's Sodality of the Society of Jesus, I concluded that my presence, if discovered, would perhaps raise a disturbance, so I delegated our good friend James Gruber to put on a most humiliated look, enter Sodality Hall, and inform me if there was anything in the Jesuit father's lecture that would interest the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The topic of the evening was "Literature," and the Rt. Rev. Dr. McKeogh did the discoursing, from which our special reporter made the following excerpts: "Infidelity had captured the free platform," asserted the holy father, "and as all Infidels were immoral, we as soldiers of Christ should put them down. . . . Our public libraries contained such damaging books as Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndall, which taught Infidelity and Anarchy. These books made immoral Infidels and should not be countenanced. Catholics should read only such books as are written by Catholic writers or as are sanctioned by the church, as Infidelity in its mildest form had a tendency to weaken a Christian's faith. By getting such literature in our libraries Infidels hoped to keep Catholics ignorant of the teachings of their church. While the Holy Inquisition was to be deplored, he denied that Catholics as such had any knowledge or hand in that prolonged massacre. The speaker denied that Catholics murdered Galileo, and Infidelity alone was responsible for that historic lie. . . . The right reverend indulged in abusiv billingsgate on all prominent Infidels, and warned his hearers that if the Catholic church was not more activ, Infidelity would grow and spread and sap the life-blood out of our holy mother church. . . . The learned (?) Jesuit regretted there were so few Catholic writers, as the tendency of modern literature was to weaken the cause of Christ and his church, and he could see every day evidences of its pernicious doctrins. He acknowledged that on the whole the church was deteriorating, and was fast losing her grip on mankind, but he looked to this country as the rock on which Romanists would build their church."

E. A. STEVENS.

Justice.

All men appeal to justice, and it must, therefore, be a natural and fundamental moral principle. Justice is something that cannot be manufactured and shaped into laws. The elements of justice may be discovered, but not made to order. Some people seem to think that congresses and parliaments create justice in their law-making, but they do nothing of the kind. On the contrary, most laws enacted are made in direct and open violation of the common principles of justice. We shall see more about this by and by.

Just here we may say, in passing, that theological mills cannot grind out justice from injustice. Man is insane when he attempts to prove that there are two kinds of justice, one human and the other divine. There can be only one kind of justice for earth and heaven—that is, if there be a heaven. No gospel of duty is more fundamental than man's duty to giv justice to every other man, and the duty is just as imperativ for him to demand justice of all his fellow-men. For convenience's sake I will divide justice into three heads.

1. Justice in religion.
2. Justice in politics.
3. Justice in government.

Let us take a brief look at justice in religion. Is there any justice in compelling a man to believe, or to say that he believes, in things he cannot understand? How can he preserve his reason while attempting to credit that which is impossible?

It is a complete overthrow of the moral nature of man to force him to say he believes a thing to be true which his reason convinces him is false. What place in the order of natural justice is there for idolatry—for singing fulsome praises to an imaginary being or wailing superstitious prayers to an unknown and unknowable being? Does it agree with our ideas of justice for a human parent to demand constant praise from his children? Then why should a heavenly parent demand what an earthly parent would not deem it just to ask?

Is it justice for God to command us to love him before we see him? Can we love anyone before we see him? No. There is certainly no sense of justice in that man who can weep and pray to God and who at the same time knows his neighbor is starving.

Is it justice for a father to put bribes before his children to tempt them to praise him? The good father will not need to corrupt the hearts of his children by offering them rewards to giv him flattery, nor will he curse them if they do not.

The good father need not command anyone to praise him. His goodness is sufficient. Goodness, like beauty, music, and truth, does not need commandments to enforce itself, any more than sunlight needs proof of its existence. Besides, a good father will hav good children, and they will not need anything more than the sight of their father's face to induce them to express their love of him. The happy father has happy children. The Jehovah of the Old Testament was never happy. He was always angry, and his chosen people were in the same temper, and were constantly making war on neighboring nations and trying to exterminate them.

Is it any part of justice to teach people to pray selfishly for good gifts? What is prayer but a piece of selfishness. I get down on my knees and ask God to bless me—to do a little better by me than he will by my brother John. Prayer implies that you cannot get justice of heaven without entreating for it. That won't do; heaven must be just though every man on earth should be unjust, or be a politician. If, however, heaven will administer justice without prayer, then it does something better by him who prays. But that won't do; there is nothing better than justice.

Here is another phase of the selfishness of prayer in the case of the importunate widow and the unjust judge. She wearied the unjust judge, she made him tired, and then follows the logic in this form: "And shall not God avenge his own elect which cry day and night unto him?" (Luke xviii, 7).

The principle here taught is that God can see injustice go on for a long time and not interfere, but that if the person suffering the wrong can only keep on persistently praying God will, without any sense of justice, giv heed to the supplicant and take revenge upon some one. Although God may not be willing to answer prayers, yet he can be teased into doing so. If it were justice to answer prayer, why did not God do it without teasing? Yes, why did he not right the wrong before ever a prayer was offered? And if the prayer was conceived in the spirit of injustice, how could the judge of all the earth be tormented into doing injustice? Does prayer imply that man can hav justice only when he prays for it? It would seem that justice is meted out to man according to the quantity and quality of his prayers.

Why should a poor mortal ask God not to lead him into temptation?

There is no justice in punishing a person for not religiously observing the Jewish Sabbath.

There is no justice in coercing men to subordinate reason to credulity. Every doctrin respecting the supernatural is at war with reason, and therefore at war with justice. Is it justice that dooms millions of children to hell for the sins of an imaginary Adam and a hypothetical Eve?

Where is the justice in sending babies to hell?

Is it justice to leave the majority of the race without a true revelation and a trusty guide?

Is it justice to damn the skeptic for not believing the false guide, which the Bible is?

Does justice gleam out of the Bible on every page?

Has the church made a record of justice?

If no one can be saved except those who believe in Christ, and nine-tenths of the human race hav never heard of him, is it justice to damn the nine-tenths who hav never heard his name for not believing in him?

Is not the doctrin of the atonement the violation of justice, and, therefore, a doctrin that must degrade rather than save man?

Where is the justice in punishing the innocent and allowing the guilty to escape?

Is it justice for the ruler of this universe to stand back and allow the worst men to step in between him and his people of this world, and thus to take the reins of government out of his hands?

Nowhere is there any evidence that this world is controled, or under the management of a just ruler.

We Hav the Pamphlet Now—Price 10 Cents.

From the Investigator.

On our first page we copy from the New York TRUTH SEEKER a speech by Colonel Ingersoll, it being the commencement of his debate with the Hon. F. R. Coudert, Catholic, and Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, Protestant, before the Nineteenth Century Club. Colonel Ingersoll also makes the closing speech in reply to his two opponents.

We shall giv the three other speeches in future papers—Mr. Coudert's next week. So great is the demand for this very able discussion that THE TRUTH SEEKER will print it in pamphlet form, when we shall advertise it and hav it on sale at this office.

Heresy in Congress.

Washington Correspondence of the Boston Globe.

Naturally, it will surprise most people to be told that Senator Tom Palmer, the millionaire Michigander, who has wearied at the shams of the capital, and is about to go back home with an extra curl in his cynical sneer—it will surprise them to hear that he is an ardent revolutionist. He is a Communist, and is forever dropping some little hint or other of his discontent with existing systems. Only a few days ago he spoke pityingly of labor strikes as the "teething pains of civilization." Senator Palmer is probably the warmest radical in the Senate, and if he were out of politics, and lived in New York, he would probably succeed his namesake, the late Courtlandt Palmer, of the Nineteenth Century Club.

John James Ingalls, the vinegary president pro tempore, is no novice in Radical speculation. He is a steady reader of the literature of Radicalism, and he sits in the vice-president's chair and laughs at the unwitting Socialism of Senator Blair. Ingalls is an Individualist, and some people say an Anarchist. Everybody knows that he is an Agnostic in religion. John Jones, of Nevada, the golden phenix of the Senate, who almost annually rises from his financial ruins, is no less a Radical because he is so signally successful in availing himself of the present order of things. Senator Jones is a bold philosopher. Senator Davis, of Minnesota, who looks like a picture of General Butler on the eve of the war, dreams of the social millennium, and expects its coming on earth. Senator Eustis, of Louisiana, is deeply versed in and much attached to French Radicalism. Senator Platt, of Connecticut, is a close student of advanced economics, whatever his present conclusions may be. Senator Reagan, of Texas, who held two cabinet offices in the Confederate government, is perilously near a state Socialist in his reasoning and impulse. Senator Turpie, of Indiana, has built up his mental structure on the basis of Jefferson, and is extremely jealous of the exactions of the state in its relation to the individual.

These are only the few Senators who hav given some outer sign of what is passing in their minds. Senator Stanford's radicalism has no relation to government or industry. He is a devoted Spiritualist. The radical group in the House comprises many elements and such members as Anderson of Kansas, Weaver of Iowa. Farquhar of New York, Tom Browne of Indiana, Charles R. Buckalew of Pennsylvania, Ben Butterworth, J. Logan Chipman of Michigan, Charles Dougherty of Florida, Martin A. Foran of Ohio, Thomas N. Norwood of Georgia, James Phelan of Tennessee, and Deacon Stephen White of New York.

Probably as many lines of radical thought are embraced in this list as there are names, but they are all men who hav indicated in different ways, more or less frank, that they sometimes think there are vital screws loose in our social and political machinery. Both of President Cleveland's appointees on the Supreme bench are men who do not think in ruts. Justice Lamar has often expressed the feeling that the last thing men will learn is how to treat one another, while a close friend of the chief justice once told me that, while Mr. Fuller believed profoundly in the American form of government, his belief was equally strong that the future would prove that we do not now know the just way of administering the powers of the Constitution.

Finally, I may recall that the president's last message to Congress on the subject of the aggregation of national wealth in a few strong hands smacked unmistakably of thought and study, in which the very conservativ never indulge. Indeed, Mr. Cleveland's letter of acceptance last summer had a paragraph in it relating to the currency that met with the full and hearty approval of Liberty, whose editor, Benjamin R. Tucker, of Boston, is the torch-bearer in this hemisphere of what may be termed intellectual Anarchy.

A Reliable Estimate of Sam Jones.

S. P. Putnam in San Francisco Freethought.

Sam Jones is a unique character. There never was anything like him, and never will be again. Nature broke her mold in forming him. The combination is a rare one. There hav been comedians in the pulpit, but never such a minstrel show as Sam Jones. He plays the "end man" to perfection. His jokes are "chestnuts," but he has a wonderfully cute way of cracking them. As comedy, Sam Jones is a supreme success. No one can deny that. His hits are palpable, and so is his accent. If Sam Jones were on the stage with the tambourine, I should enjoy him without dissent. But the idea of combining his jokes and slang with the solemn, awful, tremendous doctrin of orthodoxy and eternal damnation is something that one could not realize without an actual experience. The idea of cracking a joke with Calvin and St. Paul, and heaven and hell and the great white throne as a background, is simply inconceivable. I hav no doubt that when Sam Jones passes the golden gates he will chuck St. Peter under the chin and say, "How are you, old feller?" and he will giv Gabriel a poke in the ribs, and sauntering to the central throne will say to the archangels, "I will see you later;" and if he should happen to meet Lucifer no doubt will announce, "You make me tired." Sam Jones caricatures. He can't help it; but that Christians should accept the caricature for the reality is somewhat strange. Outside of pure comedy Sam Jones is a fool. He doesn't know anything. He has no theology, no philosophy. His religion is simply feeling. He is without thought or logic. He is absolutely unworthy of intellectual respect. He is a show and nothing more.

The Day of Rest.

From the Denver Republican.

If Monday were preferred by the majority of people as the day of weekly rest, it should be selected. Sunday is probably selected now only because it suits the convenience of the greatest number of people. A certain fixed day is named rather than leave the choice to the individual, for the same reason that a certain day is named for an election. It is to the public convenience and advantage that the day be observed generally.

Comstock's Lavatory Habits.

Unknown Exchange via Denison Gazetteer.

Mr. Anthony Comstock declares that this is an age of corruption, and that all good influences are despised. The trouble with Mr. Comstock is that he uses his office towel in wiping his spectacles.

ON Sunday evening, March 17, 1889, Robert W. Hume, of New York, will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, of Philadelphia, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets. Subject: "A Glance at the Incoming of a New Civilization." The Liberal public are cordially invited.

Frigid Agnosticism.

A REPLY TO THE AUTHOR, C. N. BEECHER, OF "FRIGID MATERIALISM."

An Agnostic is one who does not pretend to know what he does not know. He is thus far honest. But most Agnostics are as fond of setting bounds to human knowledge as any Christians ever were.

They seem proud to proclaim themselvs to the world as men who are ignorant, and who know that they don't know certain things; and more than that, they know that no one else is a whit more intelligent than themselvs. Their egotism cannot be surpassed. They can define the limits of human knowledge to a hair's breadth. This and this is knowable and that and the other is absolutely unknowable, and they know it. You ask them a question, and you generally get one uniformly frigid reply: "I don't know, and neither does anybody else." Is there a God? I don't know. A future life? I don't know. They are in the fog and they don't know where they are, only that they fancy that all the world is in the same fog. Nothing hurts them so much as to hav some one try to penetrate the unknown. A man who claims to hav seen farther than they, is treated by them just as a Christian always treats a man who makes a new discovery in science. They like to argue Christians out of their Christianity, only to leave them in equal ignorance and greater uncertainty. Christians are saying: "For mercy's sake, if you do not know but there is a God and a future life, why do you try to unsettle other people who are perfectly contented with their present views? You are neither wise nor kind so to do."

A certain Agnostic says: "When Atheists hav answered the questions, What is electricity, gravitation, and life? they can, perhaps, convert the world to their horrid Materialism." Atheism is explaining more and more every day. Suppose some day it should really come to know what the above-mentioned really are, would our ignorant (Agnostic) friend be an Atheist at once? If not, why is he so ready to advance such statements as a reason why Atheism is untrue. He, like most critics of Atheism, has a little smattering of philosophy, but does not know or keep in mind the first principles of nature, namely, that "action and reaction are equal," and the correlation of forces and the "conservation of energy." He thinks it impossible that life is a product of fire, probably because he thinks fire such an enemy of life; while the facts are that fire is only one kind of phenomenon illustrating combustion, and combustion is only a disorganization of compounds. Heat always results from every disorganization of a compound, and the more rapid said disorganization the more sensible the heat. Life is a union of organization and disorganization, and growth is when organization predominates.

No heat, no combustion, no life; yet either too great or too little heat or combustion will destroy life. This is in accord with every principle of nature. Equilibriums depend on opposits which mutually destroy each other.

"Highly organized matter" is not mind, but a special form of organized matter may evolve a force called mind, just as it evolves a force called heat or work. All forces are transmutable, that is, can be converted from one into another, therefore, the force which at one time manifested itself as heat, light, electricity, magnetism, etc., may now manifest itself as intelligence, but must finally return to its cruder forms. If Spiritualists would substitute the word force for spirit everywhere, they would greatly simplify and harmonize their philosophy. They say: "He is controled by the spirit of Dr. A." They mean the force of Dr. A. If spirit is not force, it is nothing. Intelligence is force, life is force. Only force can accomplish results. Only force can control an atom or a man, therefore every medium is controled invariably by a force. Materialists believe in matter and force, but not in matter and spirit; or at least they object to the use of that word because it is vague and ghostly.

All should remember that there is really no such thing as absolutely dead matter in the absolute sense. Inasmuch as matter and force are always found together, and can in no way be separated from one portion except to enter another portion, so even the so-called deadest matter has all the latent potencies of life in a greater or less degree. A piece of brass naturally givs forth odor; rub it and it becomes electrified; pound it and it givs sound; compress it and it givs out heat, compress still more and it will giv forth light also.

So the earth at one time may hav given light; then no light, but heat; then no heat but what it reflected of the sun's. Now it supports a very advanced class of animals and plants, and geology proves that the time was when all its living things were of a very different and inferior order.

We are asked: "If there is no God, why continue to perpetuate the human race?" I reply, Why if there is a God? The fact is, life's object, if it has any, is happiness—enjoyment. Parents enjoy children; children enjoy life and their parents. Children are necessary to complete the happiness even of Atheists. I know many ladies and gentlemen who were both born and raised Atheists, and happier and more exemplary persons cannot be found. They hav no fears of God, death, or the future.

Our Agnostic, Spiritualistic friend still speaks of death as the "king of terrors," and seems "horridly" afraid he is going to be annihilated. But he admits that a "godless race," "at the summit of intelligence," might be sinless. Atheism, science, my friend, is just what makes people intelligent. As long as people are satisfied with the idea that "God did it," as the cause of a thing, they never study nature to find out the real cause. The God idea is a bar to all investigation and human progress, and people who believe they hav another world in which to love and be loved, do good and be good, are inclined to put off doing their duty here. While the Atheists vividly realize that "life is real, life is earnest," and that death must be its goal, therefore they feel that if they are to do anything good and true which will enable them to liv in the pleasant memories of future generations, they must do it now.

As to "stealing $5 from a man who would never miss it, and who would and could never be conscious of his loss," sure enough, "what's the harm?" Taking what no one values, what no one is conscious of the loss of, like drinking from a brook or a spring, is no theft. To steal is to take to yourself what is valuable to another or to its proprietor. But your supposition of stealing $5 is impossible, without injury to the one stolen from. I hav yet to find a philosophy which givs greater incentivs to honesty, goodness, and morality, in general, than philosophical Atheism.

C. L. HASKELL.

Something Outside of Man.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The latest criticism of my position by Ella E. Gibson deserves yet another reply. It is well known that this lady has been honestly and bravely warring against superstition, fanaticism, sectarianism, and clerical hypocrisy. As St. Michael the archangel, or gallant knights of old, she has given many powerful blows to the spirit of evil and darkness. She deserves in no small degree the praise and respect that are due to the noble champion of a good cause. So much more the pity to see a lady, so worthy to be considered a Minerva, dwarf herself, as she does in her last criticism, in so emphatically denying everything that is above humanity—above man, that small inhabitant of this minuscule sublunar planet of ours. I wonder that, in enlisting herself under the banner of such gross and negativ Materialism, the lady did not fear to find herself in bad company—among the herd of Epicurus.

It is with great pleasure I observe that the lady has, in one sentence, completely indorsed my position as to the gender of the Great Cosmic Unity. She says: "If any gender is used, we want a word that comprises all genders, since the Great Cosmic Unity is the All." So when she, more emphatically than ever, concludes that the neutral or negativ gender is the one that must be used, exclusiv of any positiv one, in reference to the same Cosmic Unity, she evidently contradicts herself as much as she contradicts me—and I complain no more. The inconsistency, if I interpret the article of Ella E. Gibson correctly, that partiality for the neutral gender, is the result of the great fear that seems to possess the lady that, if the masculin gender was used, it would be thought to exclude the feminin, instead of including them both, as does the word mankind. The lady, too, remarks with disgust that Christianity has made the persons of the trinity "all males," but forgets that this is the very reason why the divine three could not, in spite of their power, procreate a savior without the help of the immaculate wife of poor St. Joseph, which compensation ought to be more than sufficient to please and pacify the whole feminin sex.

But, "jesting aside," as says my gentle contradictor, I must add that, beside that esprit de corps against any unjust masculin privilege that animates the lady, there is another fear—that the theory of a "being," of an "individual," is meant in the same sense it is understood by anthropomorphism. That fear is as unreasonable as it is misleading.

The lady, as well as the numerous class of negativ or Materialistic Freethinkers she represents, seems to be much more under the influence of feeling and passion against the past than under the control and the direction of sober thought and pure reason with which to construct the future. She is merely prejudiced against the words, "God, religion, worship," believing they only represent superstition, and are deprived of any higher and truer meaning.

A very little science is sufficient to destroy superstition; but only a greater science can enable a thinker to understand pure religion. The distance between exoteric and esoteric religion is a difficult one to measure.

Superas revertere ad auras
Hic labor, hoc opus est.

It is why so many founder in the bog of Materialism and remain there as one Epicuri de grege porcum. They are inevitably precluded from understanding, and even from seeing, the great truths that underlie, not only the magnificent mythologies of the past, but even the grossest fetichism.

One of the greatest Freethinkers and destroyers of superstition, Renan, has written: "Are we then to conclude that religion is destined to die away like the popular fallacies concerning magic, sorcery, and ghosts? By no means. Religion is not a popular fallacy; it is a great intuitiv truth, felt and expressed by the people. All the symbols which serve to giv shape to the religious sentiment are imperfect, and their fate is to be one after another rejected. But nothing is more remote from the truth than the dream of those who seek to imagin a perfect humanity without religion. The contrary is the truth. Let us suppose a humanity ten times as powerful as we are; it would be infinitly more religious." And speaking against selfishness, the same great Freethinker says also: "Egotism is the measure of inferiority, and decreases as we recede from the animal nature. A perfect being would no longer be selfish, but purely religious. The progress of humanity, then, cannot destroy or weaken religion, but will develop and increase it."

Religion, the idea of God, and worship are pure diamonds that require only to be cut by Science and Reason from the dark and dense layers of ignorance and superstition that obscure their essential and brilliant truth. That slow process of cutting is the result of evolution. The religious sentiment of man and his conception of "God"—the Great Cosmic Unity or Monos—hav progressed from the lowest fetichism to the purest, the most scientific Monism, step by step, evolving with man from his primitiv bestial nature to his highest modern intellectuality.

Why Ella E. Gibson refuses to accept that Monos, the unique substance, is a "being," I am unable to comprehend, when she accepts that this same Unity is "the All," the spring source from which man and all the other "beings" are so many emanations.

Monos is not only a being, but necessarily he is the being—the only being—to whom other beings and individualities are merely that which electric sparks are to the universal electric fluid.

Dr. Carus, in the Open Court, recently (and justly) says: "Freethought is so much identified with Materialism that this prejudice will, for a long time, still be the greatest obstacle to progress. . . . Monism, although it opposes the systems of orthodoxy, differs fundamentally from the prevailing Freethought, which tends to destroy all religious faith and ideals. It differs especially from that view which is commonly called Materialism—a view the cruder it is the more radical do its advocates consider it."

Indignant to see faith, ignorant and superstitious and the prey of priestly craft, many Freethinkers become themselvs possessed by the no less blind fanatic and sectarian spirit, when they pretend to excommunicate scientific, rational, and refined faith, and to bring back mankind to the animalism of gross Materialism. Seeing the substance, movement, and law of the Great Cosmic Unity concealed under imperfect myths and deities, these Freethinkers, instead of trying to disengage them out of these rude travesties and helping them to shine in all their radiant truth and beauty, prefer to revile them. "Man is superior to the whole universe," says Ella E. Gibson. Poor little man! I wonder that in writing these words the lady had not seen that this negation was inferior intellectually to even anthropomorphism itself, which at least concedes man's attributes as shared by the original substance he is emanated from. The theory of Ella E. Gibson's school, its axiom and fundamental dogma, is that man is greater than his spring source, or, in more precise terms, that the part is greater than "the All," or the whole. Such is the absurd and monstrous conceit of Materialism. After that, my gentle contradictor is logical when she adds that "there is nothing left above man to worship;" and even that she refuses to do—which is, I concede, perfectly excusable, particularly if the word "man" is considered as exclusiv of "woman."

The daily discoveries of science are enlarging rather than diminishing the human conception as well as knowledge of the Cosmic Unity, of Monos. So the admiration of cultured and intelligent men is increasing pari passu. The essence of worship is nothing but admiration—sublimed admiration. The essence of religion is nothing but pure science—so really so that our Aryan forefathers had one word only, "Veda," to designate both science and religion.

The essence of the idea of "God" is nothing but the idea of the existence of the Great Cosmic Unity with his substance, movement, and law.

Though for ages obscured, these human ideas of essential truths cannot be destroyed, but, as all other true human ideas, they are bound to evolve to a purer, more scientific and artistic, that is, a more intellectual conception.

That progress of evolution is only impeded by the well-meaning but mistaken and too superficial Freethinker, who, as my gentle contradictor, closes his eyes to the imminent truths that are underlying, and disfigured by, the exoteric teachings of anthropomorphism. Superstition is to him what a red cloth is to the bull. He sees nothing else, and madly destroys everything, the true as well as the false.

The fact noticed by Ella E. Gibson that Christians would ridicule a "form of expression" is also acting on her mind as a banderillo. The lady ought not to take such things into account. The only thing, in my estimation, that ought to be feared by Materialists and the other negativists of the religion of the future, is the possibility that there is under the grossest superstition of the past, as well as the present, some great underlying truth perfectly unknown to, or at least inconsiderately ignored by, them.

PERICLES.

Mr. O'Brien's Philosophical Notions.

Having read the discussion between Messrs. Ingersoll, Coudert, and Woodford, I find the impression left upon my mind is not a happy one, for the reason that I am constrained to differ from our champion in his treatment of the philosophical side of the question. If I am able to catch his meaning at all the substance of it is that a man has no choice in selecting his thoughts, but must necessarily accept and assimilate every separate notion as it happens to come, without having the power to modify or reject any. Looking at it in that light it seems to me the argument has a tendency to contradict itself, for without the power to select and adopt such thoughts as commend themselvs to our better judgment, I fail to see how or when any real freedom of thought begins. Surely it cannot be said that a man is enjoying freedom while he is being pushed relentlessly in any direction by an unseen power over which he has no control. This power of selection and adoption is distinctly admitted when considering the thoughts offered by another, but seems to be tacitly denied in respect to those that come spontaneously to himself. I can't see why this distinction should be made. Here is what Mr. Ingersoll says: "I admit at the very threshold that every human being thinks as he must. And the first proposition really is whether a man has a right to think. It will bear but little discussion, for the reason that no man can control his thought. If you think you can, what are you going to think to-morrow? What are you going to think next year? If you can absolutely control your thought, can you stop thinking?

"The question is, has the will any power over the thought? What is thought? It is the result of nature—of the outer world—first upon the senses, those impressions left upon the brain as pictures of things in the outward world. And these pictures are transformed into or produce thought, and as long as the doors of the senses are open thoughts will be produced. Whoever looks at anything in nature thinks. Whoever hears any sound or symphony, no matter what, thinks," etc. I suppose the object of all this is to demonstrate that every animal that breathes performs some small, feeble act in the way of thinking, but that it is almost entirely passiv in the hands of nature. I protest against this mode of reasoning. I believe it is deceptiv, illusory, and calculated to lead us away from our object, which is, as Mr. Ingersoll himself has suggested, a proper definition of the word thought. He asks: What is thought? but neglects to giv any definit answer. My answer would be, that thought is an elaborate product of the mind, including the brain and nervous system. Simple impressions derived through any or all of the senses do not rise to the dignity of thoughts. Neither does an idle whim, a passing illusion, a momentary sensation of pleasure or of pain. These are but the raw material from which thought is manufactured. The vainest, giddiest boy or girl in the country is susceptible to every one of these sensations; but yet, whenever we hav occasion to mention any of those poor creatures we characterize them at once as thoughtless. And so they are. It is a very proper distinction. I presume Mr. Ingersoll will agree to this, but he will say at once they are not to blame for it. They cannot help it. Their brains were imperfect. Their environments were unfavorable, and so on. Let it be admitted once for all that a very plausible argument could be made on that side. But when it was done it would smack more of charity than of sound philosophy. One great trouble with all that kind of people is sheer downright laziness—too lazy to think. Another barrier in the way of improvement is timidity carried to the verge of cowardice. This applies mostly to persons who are willing enough to use their brains in affairs of this world, but would shrink with horror from a thought that suggested the use of their own judgment in matters relating to what they call the world of spirits. Leaving those to one side, let us turn to men of our own class—those who glory in the name of Freethinker and are determined to follow it up until it is recognized all over the world as a title of honor, applicable to all men having courage enough to be honest, and intelligence enough to know that honesty is the best policy. Allow me, as one of those, to answer a few of Mr. Ingersoll's questions.

"Has the will any power over the thought?" Yes, if you mean by will the whole power of a man's mind concentrated upon a single object. "If you can absolutely control your thought, can you stop thinking?" No, but I can do better than to stop. I can change the complexion and the current of my thoughts almost any time except when under the influence of violent passion. The simple method of closing one book and opening another will often be sufficient to change the condition of the mind from gloom to gaiety, from despondency to cheerfulness. And so with regard to our companions, our occupations, etc. We cannot prevent those impressions of nature that he calls the seed of thought, but we can often determin what kind of seed shall be planted in our minds. "What are you going to think next year?' If I liv and hav my senses next year I shall use my thinking machine much the same as I did this year—for the benefit of myself, my family, my neighbors, and for the country at large when election day comes around. When next year comes most of us will be found working among our thoughts as we do in our gardens—selecting the proper seeds, cultivating, pruning, weeding, and fertilizing, so the annual crop will not fall short of what we had anticipated at the beginning of the year. And I can't discover anything in the laws of nature to hinder us from doing this.

He tells us that "whoever looks at anything in nature thinks. Whoever hears any sound, or symphony, no matter what, thinks." We must regard this as a hasty and inconsiderate remark—a mere outburst of enthusiasm from a soul overflowing with sympathy for everything that is beautiful and sublime in nature. But unfortunately the real facts are often at variance with these poetic sentiments. There is scarcely a grown person in the country but has some time witnessed sights and heard sounds so appalling to the senses as to deprive him for a time of the power to think of anything. The sight of a house on fire, a train of cars falling through a bridge, a ship sinking in mid-ocean, the shock of an earthquake, the roar of a cyclone in its career of devastation across the country, the explosion of fire-damp in a coal mine followed by the wail of anguish from bereaved orphans and widows—some one or more of these horrible catastrophes are taking place every day, but are not calculated to inspire thought in either the victims or the beholders. A man witnessing one of those frightful scenes may act under the impulse of sudden immediate intuition, but he cannot do any thinking until afterward, when the excitement is over. How often do we hear it said: "I had no time to think." And generally it is true. Thinking is a deliberate act and requires time, more or less, from everybody. While anything that causes surprise, admiration, or terror is passing suddenly before us, we hav no time to think. We think of these things afterwards when memory recalls them to our minds.

Mr. Ingersoll asked in his closing remarks, Where was memory when the first thought came? It strikes me that question was answered before it was asked. The proposition they were discussing contained this clause: "Not forgetting the fact of heredity." Now, this fact of heredity is nothing more or less than a memory of bygone ages transmitted to posterity in the flesh.

The Giordano Bruno Statue at Rome.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The contributions to raise the $600 necessary to complete the $1,000 for this international monument to Freethought do not proceed as rapidly as could be wished. Your editorial was a grand one and you hav the thanks of the committee for it. We had hoped that others not distinctivly known as Liberals would now take up this work, but they do not seem to be anxious to do so. Can it be possible that the power which burnt Bruno alive still represses the expressions and contributions of American citizens? Is it true that nearly every American newspaper has some adherent of "his holiness" in its management who sees that nothing distasteful to his master is inserted there?

If this is so, can there be any remedy for this state of things other than a Liberal or Secular organization powerful enough not only to erect this monument, but to secure the free expression of the love of freedom to every American, and even to every American newspaper and politician?

The events of the past week hav pressed these questions upon some of us in a way never realized or felt before. The account stands thus:

The Parish Minister.

Some time ago, when listening to a fashionable sermon preached by a society preacher, I was terribly impressed with the difference between the stern Covenanting minister of the past generation and the kid-gloved, dudish-looking gentleman who was then holding up Christ crucified to his audience, and to me it appeared as if, by his twaddle, he was crucifying that ancient gentleman once more.

The society clergyman, with his "aws" and "ers," had a look of weariness about him that seemed to take well with his audience, the majority of whom were asleep, and he seemed rather to be thinking of his vacation than of his sermon.

After my dude had drawled out to his slumbering audience all he knew, and more of what he did not know, about the text, "The watah ov life flows—ah—freely," I fully expected him to add, "dontcherknow, deah fwends." He had a hymn sung by his fashionable choir, then the audience filed out, sympathizing with the "deah parson" upon the "twemendwos" effort he had made that morning, while the deah parson slowly descended from his pulpit with the look of weariness greatly increased, and entered the vestry, where he doubtless consoled himself with a glass of the sacramental wine. Such is the present-day servant of the meek and lowly Jesus, who, in his day, had not a place to lay his head. Not so with the pastor of my boyhood. When the Rev. Dr. M. mounted the rostrum and thundered out his extempore sermon, woe betide the luckless wight who attempted to slumber, for would he not be held up as a terrible example by the doctor to the entire congregation, forbye being brought before the elders, in judgment assembled, to answer for his heinous crime? Assuredly, and for that reason not even the laird suffered himself to be taken captiv by the drowsy god.

Dr. M., as I remember him, was a short, burly-looking gentleman, well up in years, with a florid face and twinkling blue eyes, and who seemed to know more about the ultimate fate of the Romanists than any preacher for miles around. On that point he was positiv. The scarlet woman was in league with hell, and the pope was the vicar of Satan. Dr. M. knew it, and that settled the question, at least for the doctor's parishioners. Of course, he was a firm believer in Calvin and his backbone election. He was certain that only the elect were to be saved. And that the elect numbered his congregation, together with the rest of the Presbyterians, he was as sure as he was of his own salvation. Of that latter, like all Calvinists, he was confident. He was dubious as to whether the Episcopalians would ever get a mansion. He was not prepared to say they would not. But "they did cater an' awfu' lot to the scarlet woman, puir fowks, yet, nae doobt, they wud be judged accordin' tae their licht," which latter, of course, was none of the brightest, if the word of our reverend friend was to be taken.

But if there was anything our minister loved, really loved to descant on, it was hell, pure and unadulterated. Then would the sinners come in for a share of his affections. "He would," as an old lady said who sat under the doctor, "jist tak' them by the nape o' the neck, like, and haud them over the reekin' pit till he gaved them sweat for fear, and had brought them tae a knowledge o' salvation."

Although a firm believer in hell, he also was one in whisky. When one day he was twitted upon that point by a clerical brother, who told our minister that it was written, "Look not upon the wine when it is red," the latter gave the reply: "Oo ay, brither, that's a' richt, but de'il a word it says aboot the whusky, an' wine I canna' thole."

Such was our parish minister, a representativ of a class which is fast dying away—a bigot in his religion, but a Liberal in his philanthropy. C. BRITON.

A Splendid Publication.

From the Independent Pulpit.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. A splendid publication, and in every way up to the standard of former editions. It contains an interesting Symposium of opinions on Liberalism from twenty-four well-known Liberals, followed by a comparison of passages from Colonel Ingersoll's writings with quotations from the world's greatest poets and orators, in which the great Liberal loses nothing by the contrast. Among the engravings is one of the statue of Giordano Bruno, and one of the Lick Observatory. It is worth twenty-five cents, and can be had at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 28 Lafayette place, New York.

As the Religion of St. Thomas's Appears to Texans.

From the Galveston News.

The sexton of a fashionable church in New York pulled a lady off her knees in prayer in a pew belonging to some one else, and told her she must pray in the aisle. The sexton is a bold man. He said even if Christ were to occupy a pew without paying for it, he would put him out. Who will say after this that the dollar is not a religion?

What Did She Really Mean?

From the Boston Globe.

"Rev." Mary B. G. Eddy, of this city, said in a recent lecture in New York: "God has a supreme contempt for laws of health. Spell God good, and good God, and you hav it. Man is only what he thinks he is. Man is the idea of God, and God and man are coexistent." Christian Science, evidently, is not administered in small doses.

Religion in the Government.

The petitions for and against Blair's Sunday Rest bill hav been tumbling upon the senatorial desks in great swarms during the past week. Not a session day has passed without several on both sides being presented.

The Sun of this city has been watching and reporting the senate attendance upon prayers. One day, fourteen senators were in their places when the $900 a session chaplain rose to tell the Lord what to do. The next day fifteen appeared. The day following only five turned up. Another day but four were on hand. The greatest number that has listened to the spiritual lobbyist on any one day is twenty-five. The senate is composed of seventy-six members. In the House the Sun's correspondent found at prayers on Monday of last week but one-sixteenth of the three hundred and twenty-five Congressmen. And these twenty-two didn't look as though they cared much for what the blind chaplain had to say. It is evident that the prayer business in Congress, upon which our legislators annually waste $1,800 of the people's money, is a farce, and only indulged in because of the fear the Congressmen hav of the church.

This view is strengthened by the remarks of two Representativs in discussing the Indian Appropriation bill, in which appeared this clause:

"For pay of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian church, for buildings and other improvements made by said board on land at Albuquerque, New Mexico, donated to the government for Indian school purposes, $6,803, being the appraised value of said improvements as agreed upon by a representativ of said board and special agent of the Indian bureau."

Notice, now, the power of the church: "Mr. Randall said that he disliked to interfere with church arrangements, but he hardly thought it right that we should pay for a donation. As the church was concerned, however, he would make no point of order. Judge Holman said that he had visited this school, and was doubtful as to whether the appropriation ought to be made. The situation of the school was not good. The scholars were the children of Apaches. They were brought from the reservation against the protest of their parents. It seemed to him that the school ought to hav been established upon a reservation. Out of deference to the Presbyterian church, he would not make a point of order."

Here are two able, and presumably honest, Congressmen possessed of serious doubts as to the wisdom and equity of this clause. Yet, because the Presbyterian church asked for these few thousand dollars, they would vote for it. Suppose the Presbyterian church had asked them to steal $6,803 from a private party—would they hav done it? There is probably an inside history to this transaction, and the probabilities are that it is about like this: The Board of Missions begged the money to build the school, to which, according to Mr. Holman, they dragged the Indian children from unwilling parents. The support of the school became a burden, so it was given to the government. Then the Board of Missions comes up to Congress and begs to be paid for a gift. The Board makes both ways. It begged the money to build the school from the Sunday-schools of the East. So much ahead. Then it sells it to the government, and has its cake again after eating it. Good financiering. This does not interfere at all with the proselyting of the Board, for the government will employ their teachers, and what before was a charity, expensiv to them, becomes a source of employment and profit. Splendid financial genius. The people of the United States are taxed to make Presbyterians out of little Apaches, and the pennies of the Sunday-school children in the East can go to the foreign heathen.

After Messrs. Randall and Holman had given their heads for footstools for the Board of Missions, Mr. Toole, of Montana, "succeeded in doubling the appropriation for the support of the pupils at the St. Ignatius school on the Jocko reservation." The amount given is $45,000. The Presbyterians are neophytes in robbery compared with the Roman Catholics.

The Preachers and the Papers.

Writing against the Sunday papers, the editor of the Christian Advocate says:

"The old argument that the Monday paper is worked upon Sunday, and that the Sunday paper is really made on Saturday, is wholesale falsehood. It has now been proved, by careful examination of the inside working of the newspaper offices, that the news in the Sunday paper is largely communicated on Saturday night and Sunday morning early, and that the editorials on them are prepared practically on Sunday morning early; that the working force gets out the paper on Sunday morning, and that the Monday paper needs no Sunday work at all."

Using the language of the Christian editor, this statement is a wholesale falsehood. It is a deliberate attempt to deceive the readers of his paper. The Christians do not like Sunday papers because reading them has a tendency to interest people in worldly affairs on the day when the church desires people to think only of herself, and to keep them from attendance upon "divine worship." The preachers do like Monday dailies because, as news, except police reports, is usually scarce on that day, the editors fill up with reports of sermons and church doings. To destroy the Sunday paper and keep the Monday issue, religious editors deliberately lie about the time when the labor on the respectiv issues is performed.

Sunday papers are almost entirely prepared on regular working days. The literary matter is selected during the week. The news is gathered by the reporters on Saturday. It is written up and in the compositor's hands by ten or eleven o'clock. Correspondence must be in the office Saturday evening. The typesetting is mainly done between seven and twelve o'clock, only the very latest news being set after the latter hour, and this employs but a few men. Advertisments are not received after nine or ten o'clock, and are all set and made up before twelve o'clock. The stereotyping, printing, city distribution, and mailing is of course completed during Sunday morning, but using only some six hours at the most of "sacred" time.

Monday papers, however, are chiefly made up during Sunday. The reporters work all day, the office is open to receive advertisments, the news gathered is written up, is edited, and the compositors set it up on Sunday night before twelve o'clock. The telegraph news is sent and received on Sunday, the sermons are reported on Sunday, and the whole paper is completed on Sunday with the exception of the stereotyping, printing, city distribution, and mailing. The night editor begins to make Monday's paper as soon as the Sunday paper forms are closed on Saturday night; the editorial staff do their work on Sunday, the reporters begin early Sunday morning, the managing editor, proofreaders, and compositors all do nine-tenths of their work on Monday papers on Sunday.

It is the sheerest nonsense to say that Sunday papers are prepared on Sunday morning after twelve o'clock, and equally false to say that Monday papers are manufactured after twelve o'clock Sunday night. The principal portion of the labor on any daily paper is done on the day and evening previous to its issue, whether that day be Saturday or Sunday. These facts are known to everybody who knows anything about the business, and for any Christian editor to say otherwise is to prove him wholly ignorant or intolerably dishonest.

The reason for the Advocate's wholesale falsehood is found in this paragraph:

"How does Toronto, the most purely Sabbatic city in America, get along without a Sunday paper? We can all do just as well. There are multitudes of people who stay away from church because they dawdle away all the morning over a newspaper, and imagin that because of the finger-length of so-called religious matter—and always growing beautifully less—they are getting a substitute for the gospel."

The preacher-editor cannot bear that anyone should stay away from church. He can bear anything but to be ignored by the populace. He can bear and lie about the Sabbath-breaking done by the Monday paper because it reports his platitudes, but he cannot keep quiet when the people lessen his importance in the community by leaving him out of their calculations for Sunday. He sighs for the good old times when the preacher was a great man in the community, the magistrate, the dictator of action, of study, of recreation. He would like to prescribe our dress, our food, our drink, our very thought. He wants to be the Great I Am, a temporal ruler as well as chief guesser on "spiritual" things. He desires our reverence. He wishes us to take off our hats when he passes by. Representing a great divinity, he thinks a little worship of that representativ is not entirely out of place—simply as an honor to the divinity, of course. He demands a bending of knees before him and a bowing of heads to his commands. There is no limit to the arrogant claims for himself because of the Thing he imagins he represents. He is the most intolerant of tyrants, and has really the least upon which to base his claims of any two-for-a-cent despot on earth.

The immensity of the arrogance of these preachers is seen in the laudation of a theologically stagnated Canadian city. To get people into their churches in New York they would be willing to reduce the metropolis of the Western world to the level of Toronto! Great God!

"We Told You So."

Mr. T. B. Wakeman's communication about the Bruno statue at Rome emphasizes some points, and contains an admission, of great interest to all Liberals.

The points are these, succinctly stated: That the Roman Catholic church is at present running things in this country, and second, that no class of people but Freethinkers can be depended upon to work for or to remember the workers for freedom.

The admission is, that the eminent gentlemen who hav activ charge of collecting the funds for the Bruno monument hav found these things out.

Colonel Ingersoll, we believe from his published expressions, has long known the great strength of Catholicism, but Messrs. Thompson, Wakeman, and Davidson either hav not known it, or hav failed to see its significance. At any rate, if they hav spoken against that church, or worked against it, their words and efforts hav not reached this office. But now that they are seeking to do partial justice to the memory of one of that church's victims they find the avenues of public communication closed to them by the same power that sent Giordano Bruno to the stake. Their eyes are suddenly opened.

There can be no doubt that the press of this country is afraid to offend Roman Catholics. So are the politicians. So are the business men. And so is everybody not in an independent position. The Protestant churches denounce the "mother of harlots," but at the same time never oppose her public steals, so long as she leaves a dollar in the public treasury that they can get for themselvs. Justice and a secular government will never be born from the quarrels of these sectarians, for the quarrel ceases the moment identical interests are touched, and they hav a great many interests in common. In fact, the great interest of both now is to preserve their lives. Hence we see them uniting on the Sunday bill and other iniquitous measures. And the only salvation for this country now is, as Mr. Wakeman admits, a "Liberal or Secular organization powerful enough not only to erect this monument, but to secure the free expression of the love of freedom to every American, and even to every American newspaper and politician."

We hav the nucleus of this organization in the American Secular Union, which if guided wisely and directed to practical work such as taxing churches, opposing grants of money to religious organizations, opposing Sunday bills, and kindred pertinent efforts, may become a great power. The Union was never intended to teach new philosophies, nor social economy. Its ascension to power, however, can be achieved only through unanimous and harmonious support by the Liberals, who are the chosen ones of the republic. They alone hav the right conception of a government so far as it touches religious matters.

We are not particularly sorry that the church world refuses to help erect a monument to Bruno. Unless an enemy voluntarily lays down his arms, it is better to keep him out of the fold. The refusal is but another disgrace to Christendom, and the erection of the statue by the Liberals—the INFIDELS—will add one more leaf to their wreath of laurel. They ought to be thankful that the church which burnt Bruno has shown them how to make that deed appear a thousandfold more hideous than ever before.

Some "Sabbath Notions."

Colonel Elliott Fanatic Shepard has "consented to giv an expression of his views on the subject of Sabbath-breaking," provided they were not printed in the Sunday edition of the paper whose reporter he talked to. His views, as given under this pledge, are a mixture of hypocrisy, puritanism, and religious cant. He started off with a lie upon his lips, saying that he did not set himself up as a standard for anyone else, or to judge any other man. When it is considered that he and his fellow-churchmen are trying to enact their views into laws to be enforced by the whole power of the government, the sniffling hypocrisy of this declaration is at once apparent.

Naturally, in this interview, Mr. Shepard touched upon his stopping the stages on Fifth avenue on Sunday. He did this, he said, because Fifth avenue is the street of homes, and he wanted quiet. He would also stop all the horse-cars if he could on all the avenues. Travel violated the first commandment, and God knew what he was about when he gave us that commandment. He thought it perfectly feasible to stop all public transportation by railroad, steamboat, or stage on Sunday, which he persistently but mistakenly calls the Sabbath. Stores, he thought, should all be closed. Candy stores, especially, must be closed because—and here Mr. Shepard revealed fully his broad mind and comprehensiv view of social economy—"we know that children are often tempted to spend for candy the money that their parents hav given them for the missionary cause. The candy stores should be closed, so that children should not be subjected to such temptation. The Bible says, 'Lead us not into temptation.' We may find in the Bible explicit instructions how to conduct ourselvs under all circumstances and in any emergency of life." If there is an idiot asylum anywhere handy the man who talks like that should certainly be placed therein.

Sunday newspapers came in for strong condemnation, for "they are not in harmony with the object of the Sabbath, which is to giv to the man an opportunity to commune with the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, to hear the teaching of the gospel. The Sunday newspaper reading diverts the mind from these topics to merely secular matters." Concluding, he said: "What we want is the spirit to obey the word of God. God will accept every man's honest effort to obey the law and to discharge his highest duty in the best way he can. One man may think it is wrong to take a walk on Sunday, and God will accept his worship. Another may think it is right to walk abroad and view with reverence the wonderful works of nature, and God will accept that worship. The test to be applied to the opening of stores or the publishing of newspapers or public transportation is, after all, as to the motiv. What is the motiv of doing these things? The act must be judged by the spirit. If the motiv is good, the act is right."

Mr. Shepard's views are in themselvs and by themselvs of no more value than the views of any other narrow and conceited simpleton. But as president of the American Sabbath Union, supported by a lot of United States Senators, and backed by wealth and powerful church organizations, his ideas may be taken as foreshadowing the laws we shall hav if the Union succeeds in its efforts. Relying upon the Jesuitical philosophy that the motiv governs the act, they will under the pretense of "doing good" make Sunday a day of forcible "rest" and "worship." And only lack of power will prevent their going a great deal farther.

Fellows like Shepard and Blair, and the evangelical clergymen who want to run everybody else according to their own religious notions, are dangerous foes to liberty, because the majority of folks seem to care so little for their own rights that they will not take the trouble to maintain them.

An Unreliable Historian.

Ever since last summer the religious press has been circulating a story purporting to be an account of a meeting between Colonel Ingersoll and Jo Cook at a summer hotel. The story as given by the religious editors is an absolute falsehood, but it has Cook's indorsement, and enables us therefore to measure that fellow's regard for truth. This is the latest shape the traveler's tale has taken:

"A statement is in the papers to the effect that Joseph Cook and Robert G. Ingersoll recently met at a hotel near Lake George, and that the latter used profane and indecent language. Particulars are given, and there is little room to doubt the substantial accuracy of the report, and the world thus sees a side of this blasphemer's character which is not often on exhibition. He is evidently capable of using the most ungentlemanly and brutal language. He even threatened Mr. Cook in these words: 'You are a —— liar and a dirty dog, and I hav a half a mind to giv you a licking now.' Mr. Cook stepped up to him at once and said: 'You will never hav a better chance than now. Put your fingers on me and I will hav you arrested in three minutes.' The coarse Infidel then slunk away, still muttering vulgar and profane words."—New York Advocate.

"When we read the above, we clipped it and sent it to Mr. Cook to know the truth of the statement; to which we received the following reply: 'Entirely correct. The quotation of Ingersoll's is only one small part. You are safe in using it [this extract].—W. J. SHEILIDAY, Secretary to Joseph Cook.'"

As the story is given here by the Advocate it is a lie pure and simple, and Cook in indorsing it makes himself a liar without mitigating circumstances. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 27, 1888, we printed the truthful version of the incident upon which Cook bases his lie. Cook had been trying to meet Colonel Ingersoll, and at last found a gentleman—the hotel manager, we believe—who offered to introduce him. When the two approached Colonel Ingersoll, the latter turned away, and said he did not desire to know Mr. Cook. Thereupon Joseph bellowed out in his coarse manner that as Colonel Ingersoll had been so badly defeated by Mr. Gladstone, he probably felt sore toward Christians. Colonel Ingersoll paused long enough to say that that was not the reason, but that he declined to know Mr. Cook because that individual was a liar. One witness of the meeting reports that the colonel added, "and a coward." He then walked away, leaving Cook very much embarrassed.

That is all there is to the story. Neither party uttered an oath, and no further conversation ensued. In indorsing the Advocate's account as "entirely correct," Cook has revealed his own dishonesty. His word cannot be taken, and his indecency of statement is very good evidence that Colonel Ingersoll was quite right in declining to permit him to be introduced.

Editorial Notes.

ANY of our friends having copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 23d and March 2d that they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to this office.

THE biggest petition against the Blair Sunday Rest bill secured by any Freethinker was circulated in Salina, Kan., by John W. Abbott, of New Cambria. About a thousand names were attached, being rather more than half the voters of the place. Mr. Abbott encountered bigoted opposition from the preachers, but he fought his way through in a spirit deserving of wide commendation.

A GOOD way to prevent heresy is the course pursued by a minister out in Bangor, Pa. He bought a cheap copy of "Robert Elsmere," read it, and then got up in his pulpit and forbid any member of his congregation to do as he had done. And the best part of it is, the men of the congregation could see nothing derogatory to their manhood in this prohibition. They actually believe that the minister is their mental guardian!

A Herald correspondent interviewed Signor Crispi, premier of Italy, last week, and asked him whether he would deal with the question of the restoration of the pope's temporal power. The premier replied: "As well talk of the obsolete governments of the Middle Ages. The temporal power is now a thing of the past—a toy for dull hours of mimic and would-be statesmen." It is a good thing for Italy that she has a Freethinker running her government.

THE Leadville, Col., Liberals are stirring up the dry bones of orthodoxy in their city, and their organization, effected a few weeks since, numbers one hundred, with more to come. During this month Mr. Watts lectures for the association, to be followed by Mr. Bell. Mr. Underwood has just concluded an engagement. The Association has published its declaration of principles, which led to a spirited controversy between a mossback bigot, signing, "Chaffee County," and A. L. Heister, president of the Leadville Freethought Association. Mr. Heister is a valiant warrior, and our cause is safe in his hands. Utah, Colorado, and the Pacific coast are at present in the lead in Liberalism. We hope that when the lecturers hav converted all of that part of the country they will come East and wake the folks up.

WE hav received this query from Martin Newlin, of Annapolis, Ill.: "Did the Catholic church, as an organization, hav anything to do in electing Harrison president of the United States? That is, did they vote in an organized body by order of the pope?" To which we must say, No. The influence of the church is not usually exerted openly, as we imagin that the pope thought he could get as much from Mr. Cleveland as from Mr. Harrison. But Tammany Hall gave votes for Harrison for votes for her local officers, and Tammany Hall is the political side of the Catholic church in this city. The Roman church in this neighborhood will profit greatly through last fall's election.

ELEVEN ministers of Nashville, Tenn., hav banded together and formally resolved that they will not giv to the papers the items of religious news which hav customarily appeared in the Sunday morning editions of the Nashville papers. The American, of the place, points out some inconsistency of action which this resolution discloses. Their position is that any news which is to appear in the Sunday papers must be withheld, though its appearance is the only manner in which it breaks the holy calm of Sunday, as the work upon it is done on Saturday. But these same preachers are perfectly willing that their sermons may be put into type on Sunday to appear on Monday. Indeed, the American accuses them of working on Sunday night themselvs, reading the proofs of these same sermons. The American concludes, therefore, that the preachers are as apt to liv in glass houses as the rest of their fellows, and that it will take actions instead of words to prove themselvs at all superior to their neighbors.

THE Minneapolis Secular Society sent its protest against Blair's Sunday bill and educational amendment to the House of Representativs, and it was duly placed in the petition box. It ought to hav been sent to the Senate, as the two measures are not yet before the House; but it has done its work and has its influence. A daily paper of this city, referring to our Minneapolis friends as "a society of some kind," oracularly says that they need not be alarmed at the prospect of the adoption of these measures as long as the country is governed by the Constitution. The sapient editor who wrote that should instruct himself. The Sunday bill could be passed, as it applies only to places and trains and labor within the jurisdiction of the general government, and the educational measure is not a proposed act, but a resolution calling for an amendment to the United States Constitution. Neither bill nor resolution should ever be adopted by either branch of Congress.

SENATOR BLAIR is a great favorit with the good old maids of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and one day last week they decked his Senatorial desk out with posies, attached to which was a card with this apocryphal inscription: "Hon. H. W. Blair, by District of Columbia Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in behalf of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in grateful acknowledgment of his brave championship of Senate bills favoring Prohibition, education, woman's ballot, and the resolution guarding against sectarian interference with the public schools of the nation." "Guarding against sectarian interference" is the neatest bit of Jesuitical phrasing that we hav seen for many moons. Diplomats acknowledge that they use language to conceal their thoughts, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union hav evidently been attending the school of diplomacy. The ingenious hypocrisy, the naïve dishonesty, the artless cunning of that statement has never been excelled. The Blair educational amendment is the most gigantic sectarian measure that ever legislator had the hardihood to propose. It would educate every child in the country to be a Christian, and establish a particular religion as the legal belief of our government. Local and petty sectarianism might indeed be wiped out in our schools, but its substitute would be a mountain to what is now a molehill.

"LONGMONT, COL., Feb. 22, 289.

"DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: In compliance with a resolution of the Longmont Secular Union, we address through you the Liberals of United States and Canada. We do this for the purpose of inaugurating, if possible, some plan by which that rising light of Liberalism, George E. Macdonald, the spicy associate editor of Freethought, may, in the interest of our cause, be sent around the world, as was D. M. Bennett, a few years ago, to make and to publish in book form the observations of the journey; the books to be furnished at cost to the parties who subscribe the funds necessary to the carrying out of this undertaking.

"We, therefore, invite all who are interested in this matter to correspond in regard to it with us and each other through your columns.

"Committee. { JOHN R. KELSO, GEORGIANA RICE, ETTA D. KELSO."

There are several leagues of territory intervening between this office and the generous person of our only brother, but still we feel that he is nearer than he would be if he were wandering around the streets of Jerusalem, turning over ash barrels and peering into dark corners looking for signs of our risen Lord, and we cannot say that we indorse this scheme very heartily. That his book, or books, would be worth several times the cost we willingly grant. The "Innocents Abroad" would be nothing to them. But the effects of such a trip are too far-reaching. After his explorations the Sunday-school maps would all hav to be changed and another committee appointed to revise the New Testament. The economy of the theological world would be disturbed, and the old gentlemen up here in the Bible House might get excited. It wouldn't do to unsettle their geographical and historical convictions on biblical subjects. The lunatic asylums are not numerous enough. Better let George stay where he is—though if it is determined to send him out of the country, we know a few good people who ought to be willing to contribute heavily.

BOULDER, COL., Jan. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Find $3.25 to renew subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and for a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. I find the paper better and better from week to week, cartoons and all. By the way, is it not possible that the cartoons could be placed in a volume, with copious explanations for each? Such a volume would be the best educator in existence. Watson Heston has no equal to-day as an artist, and I move that the volume be printed for his benefit. I will giv $10 for a copy. Indeed, I do not know but he may hav retained the copyright for his cartoons. In either case, I want the volume. JOS. WOLFF.

STREATOR, COL., Jan. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Charles Watts lectured at Alamosa, Col., on the evenings of January 23d and 24th, and at Monte Vista, Col., on the evening of January 25th. Considering the sparse population and the very cold weather at the time, the audiences were good, and Mr. Watts was listened to with close attention. Our friends without exception expressed themselvs as highly pleased with the lectures, and our only regret is that our financial condition was not such that we could hav had Mr. Watts at least a week in each place. I wish to say to all Liberals desiring lectures that Mr. Watts will giv the utmost satisfaction to all, and should be kept busy. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER continued success, I am, Fraternally, F. M. BORDEN.

VERSAILLES, IND., Feb. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: To a question by Mr. Boynton that is stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 9, 1889, I can giv a sufficient answer. A portion of the medulla presides over the important function of respiration, and from it arises the pneumogastric nerve, so called because its branches serve both the lungs and stomach. The feelings of hunger, thirst, and the desire for air are aroused by means of this nerve.

The wounding of the gray matter of the medulla, even of a small portion of it, near the origin of the pneumogastric nerve, at once stops the action of the lungs and causes death.

From the great importance of this part it has been termed the "vital knot." We find, also, that its location with the skull is exceedingly well protected, it being quite beyond the reach of any ordinary form of harm from without. LEONORA S.

HARVARD, ILL., Jan. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I receive THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly. It is the best paper I take. It is a paper that it pays us to read. Some people think Heston's pictures are rather hard on the Christians, but admit they show the facts only. The fact is, all the churches, both Protestant and Catholic, are badly honeycombed. The young Catholics in our country are leaving the old Mother Church at a fearful rate here, and women are beginning to do their thinking themselvs. Man is a progressiv being. Orthodoxy says that he has got the whole truth. If that is so man cannot advance. He is at the end of his rope. Man has discovered that the old theory is not true. If the old theory was true we would be nothing but a set of savages. Please find money order for twenty-five cents to pay for the FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1889.

Yours with respect, ABRAM CARMAOH.

AUSTIN, NEV., Jan. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find postal order for which you will please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to Isaac G. McMonigal, Belmont, Nev. That makes one new subscriber for me. I liv twenty-five miles from Austin, out in the mountains, and my neighbors in passing frequently stop over night with me, and here they hav the privilege of perusing one of the most valuable of papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER. They almost all speak well of the paper, and frequently ask for the loan of some of the papers, and if they are as I was, after reading a few numbers they will subscribe for the paper and become enlightened. That is the way it acted on me. I borrowed some of the papers from David Deen, of Austin; after reading the papers, they suited me, so I subscribed. And I am not a bit sorry. And I hope all who borrow THE TRUTH SEEKER and read it will be served by it as I hav been. G. S. CROFT.

ARMSTRONG, IA., Jan. 21, E.M. 289.

MR. EDITOR: I take it upon me to giv the brotherhood and sisterhood of TRUTH SEEKER Infidels an understanding of how the vinyard of the Lord is being worked in this vicinity. The Presbyterians starved out. The Methodist Episcopals starved out. The Catholics hav only two families. And the only live society is the Free Methodists, who serve the young folks, by way of amusement, as a kind of loose theatrical sideshow. Their pastor, a Mr. Norten, who established the society here, claimed when he came that he intended to convert just fifty people here this winter, but so far his labor is summed up thus, 0. And still there is but one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER coming to this place, though that is lent where it will wield the most influence for humanity. The readers of your paper here think Watson Heston's pictures are timely and like arrows well directed. They are doing good work. That your paper may be ever managed as it is, is the wish of,

Yours respectfully, PETER H. BURT.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, Feb. 14, E.M. 289.

MR. EDITOR: It becomes my painful duty to record the death of C. W. Grant, of Nova Scotia, who died Feb. 8, 289, in his seventieth year. He was a true friend to the cause of Freethought, and not only a friend of free thought, free press, and free mails, but he was one of nature's noblemen, fully charged with kindness to all his fellow-men. This world was his country, to do good his religion. He was never so happy as when engaged in making others happy. He leaves a wife and large family (my wife is one of his daughters) to mourn an irreparable loss. I cannot find words to write his worth; your paper would not hold the names of persons that hav been befriended by him. His house was an open house for all wayfarers; never was a poor man or woman sent from his door without some act of kindness shown them. He died as he lived, trusting not in the revengeful Christian God, but in nature. He loved the liberty of speech. There was no bigotry in him. And so, with loving thoughts, I bid adieu to this noble, generous, and loving man. I. W. AROHIBALD.

Jan. 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As an old Freethinker of forty years and a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER from its first issue at Paris, Ill., I am surprised that men and women of apparent intelligence on all other subjects can adhere to the absurdities of the Bible and the great plan of salvation, as they term it. It does seem to me, if I had been God and had the love for my children that the Christians claim that God has for his, I would hav taken that old serpent by the tail when he appeared in the garden of Eden and snapped his head off and saved the human family from the curse of total depravity, and saved the sacrifice of the innocent and only begotten son, and also saved the world the vast expense of the costly churches, and the great army of priests that are required to instil into the minds of their dupes the necessity of their believing in the business. And when you try to get them to read or reason and investigate, they are afraid to do so. If they could be induced to read THE TRUTH SEEKER or some Liberal paper and think for themselvs, they would soon hav no use for church or priest. W. E. CRANDALL.

DAVENPORT, Jan. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: My object in writing to you is to let you know that my paper of January 12th was cut upon the inside pages. For instance, the article from the National Reformer, also articles on "Superstition in Crime," "Marriage and Divorce Laws," which I would like very much to read. Please send me another copy of said date, for such articles are of great value, not only to myself, but to others, especially milk-and-water Christians, that are hanging on the fence and don't know which way to fall.

Mr. Putnam's lecturing trip was hailed with delight by the Freethinking fraternity, and I will say that they were not disappointed in his ability as a lecturer and debater. His coming to these parts again will ever be appreciated by his many new-made friends. May his shadow never grow dim. I will further state that if any Freethought lecturer happens to wander in this direction, I, for one, would like to hear him. He will address some of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Freethought, and Investigator readers around Davenport. Please find inclosed money to pay for the book, "Looking Backward," by E. Bellamy, and for one TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and one "Agnostic Annual" for 1889. PETER SELDE, SR.

VERSAILLES, MO., Jan. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to know that there are still men and women who hav the courage to speak out in behalf of liberty. I think it a grand mistake in Liberals not organizing so as to make themselvs effectiv. And this, I think, should be done at once, if we expect, or even hope, to perpetuate liberty. We can afford to agree to disagree about minor things to maintain the great cause of liberty, too dear to trifle away in seeming differences. Success to your paper and the cause of truth and liberty! The more I read your paper the better I like it, from the fact I find it loaded down with valuable and instructiv matter; not that I am in harmony with all of its utterances, but because of its manly defense of liberty, without which life is not worth living for. It does my soul good to know and learn that we hav men of courage and independence enough to b the lion in his own stronghold. I feel and I hav felt for me years past that we as a people are fast drifting into a period in our history, goaded on by the so-called religion, much more destructiv than any of nature's upheavals, such as cyclones, earthquakes, volcanoes, floods, etc. Inclosed find $1, for which send me two copies of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" and one of "The Crisis." JOHN GRILLS.

EARLVILLE, ILL., Jan. 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Sometimes one needs an incentiv to make one wield the pen. This morning words were uttered by the lips of a faithful Christian that hav made me decide to celebrate my forty-sixth birthday by writing to THE TRUTH SEEKER, that was so dear to my mother. The topic of conversation in this vicinity is the conflict going on between the Protestants and Catholics over the Protestant Bible being read in the schools. Four Catholic families are represented by one person on the school board. A teacher began teaching in this district last spring, and he felt it his duty to read the Bible. The Catholic director interfered, and he decided to call the school at 8:50 o'clock and still read it. This winter the Catholic children hav to stay out in the cold or hear it read, just the same as though they were called at 9 o'clock. It is such a farce to them that the Catholic director has opened fire again, but the other two directors and the Protestant families tell the teacher to go ahead. To-day Mr. Paine has been appealed to by the Catholic director to know if there was any way to stop his reading it. He told him that the way he understood Bateman's Decisions any teacher could not be disturbed in his religious exercises outside of school hours. The Catholic director says no teacher shall be hired again till he knows whether he is going to read the Bible.

January 16th.—The teacher holds out the oliv branch of peace by saying he will read the Catholic Bible one morning and the Protestant the next, but the Catholics say they hav not got any, so I suppose Protestantism will rule.

These passing events create a desire in my breast to see some philanthropist found a Freethought school at Chicago also a home for aged Liberals, as Father Hacker suggests. Chicago is situated midway between the two oceans, and its superior commercial advantages, also its being a great railroad center, together with its marvelous growth, recommend it as a suitable place for these two institutions. I hav watched the school at Liberal with interest, thinking it might be a haven of rest for Liberals, but there seems to be too much dissension to allow its being a success. One established further north I think would be more favorable for freedom.

January 20th.—THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 19th was received last night, and has been my reading to-day. I can truly say it has been an intellectual feast. On opening it I always turn to see what our workers are doing. I hav missed the poetic Putnam much, but Secretary Stevens's inspiring words fill that place now with me. I felt happy when he was reëlected at the last Congress. The words of Professor Bell in regard to Liberal greet my eyes. I always think of him as the person that conducted the funeral services of my dear mother. Long may he liv to wave the banner for Universal Mental Liberty. The desire of my heart, to hav Liberal hymns accompanied with music, has at last been gratified by Mr. Washburn's "Cosmian Hymn Book." I hope the Liberals will appreciate it by adopting it immediately. The suggestion of President Westbrook for a "manual of the purest principles of morality" hits me exactly. I hope our wise heads will act on the suggestion. Edward Everett Hale shows that the world "do move." So many of our workers are doing such valiant service in the field, and we welcome the new ones.

January 29th.—This eve, while sitting in my peaceful home, my he rt beats in unison with all the Liberals that are celebrating our Author Hero's natal day.

I bid you adieu, with the wish that the ennobling spirit of humanitarianism may make the whole world a bond of brotherhood. MRS. SARAH J. PAINE.

DENVER, COL., Jan. 30, 289.

MR. EDITOR: The announcement that Chas. Watts would deliver a lecture before the Denver people on Sunday evening, January 27th, called forth at that time a goodly number of our citizens. The Odd Fellows' Hall, a very pleasant auditorium, had been engaged for the occasion, and, though its seating capacity is estimated at from five to six hundred, it could not seat the people in attendance. However, many were pleased to stand rather than deny themselvs the pleasure of hearing the great lecturer. And if one can judge from the applause elicited by the happy hits made by the speaker of the evening, all present were richly repaid. The subject, "Secularism Superior to Christianity," was treated with the accustomed strength and eloquence which Mr. Watts brings to the rostrum. This was the first visit of Mr. Watts to Denver, but so favorably has he impressed the people by his effort of last Sunday, that it is more than probable he will be asked to return from Salt Lake, where he has now gone, by way of Denver, and giv the Radicals of this part of the West an opportunity again to be edified, socially by his presence and intellectually by the grandeur of his thought and the ready adaptation of logic and wit in his argument.

THOS. J. TRUSS.

SENECA, S. C., Jan. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A little more than one year ago, while making boards to cover our poultry house, I unfortunately ran a sliver into my right wrist 1⅝ inches in length. It broke off below the surface and the orifice closed up immediately, leaving no visible trace of its entrance. My wrist and hand began to swell before I could walk two miles to Seneca to hav the fatal sliver extracted. Anyway, the surgeon—one of eminence too—failed to find it. The result was inflammation and erysipelas of the most alarming type. I suffered unutterable anguish for ninety days. The sliver remained in my wrist until the work of ruin was complete, when it gradually worked back to the surface and I pulled it out myself. Suffice it to say, I am a cripple for life. But enough of this. What I set out to do was to beg the use of a small space in THE TRUTH SEEKER columns to express my lifelong love and gratitude to all those kind friends whose timely aid has kept the wolf away from our humble cot. Had it not been for the assistance of Infidels and Spiritual friends I should long since hav been an inhabitant of the tomb. I am master of no language that will express what I feel. I regret that it is out of my power to make each and every contributor in our distress realize the depth of our gratitude.

Fraternally, R. M. CASEY.

Jan. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I must tell you of an idea a good Christian lecturer advocated in a lecture delivered by him here. It is as follows—that the New Jerusalem is to be here on earth; first the souls are to return and inhabit the bodies, and they are all to be taken up, he did not say where to, but led us to believe to some safe place, while this earth is to be cleansed from all wickedness, etc., then the good people are to hav their bodies go through some process to adapt them to the climate and then be returned to the new world, which is none other than this old one in a new style, to liv in peace and happiness forever and ever. The wicked are also to go through some preparation to adapt them for their new world of fire and brimstone. But he failed to locate their future abode. And as he gave us leave to ask him any questions, I had one there for him and put it in the following form: Take, for instance, old soldiers (let alone other cripples of every description); they lose a leg or both on the battlefield in some foreign country, or at home. Is the Lord going to gather up the lost members of their bodies and thus complete their happiness, or are there to be men running around the streets of the New Jerusalem on crutches, without arms, eyes, or with no head at all? Answer: The good Lord will provide in some way unknown to his children. You must hav faith in the Lord Jesus. Yours, etc. J. H. M.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Jan. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The ministers of Los Angeles had about run out of blasphemy and brimstone, but now their supply has been replenished. The "dugout," Sam Jones captain, arrived in port two weeks ago, five or six days out from negrodom, and the captain is now unloading his cargo of superstition and other stale material twice a day to about four thousand of his customers, and demanding pay for the same as the work progresses, without allowing a chance for investigation. He says, "I despise theology, but I love religion," and it takes money to buy it. He says, "It takes grace, grit, and greenbacks to run me—$25,000 a year. God furnishes the grace, I furnish the grit, and you must furnish the greenbacks." He has greatly insulted many of our very best citizens, especially the ladies, by his harang of vulgarity, and there has been talk of riding him out of town on a rail. If he modifies his remarks doubtless he will remain here another week in order to unload his usual number of almanac anecdotes, after which he sails for Sacramento with a cargo of legislativ gas, where it is to be hoped the papers and members of the legislature will shut down on him worse than the Angel City is serving him. Two of our dailies are denouncing him in very strong language; the other two do not speak encouragingly of him. This ecclesiastical blackguard goes around the country preaching that "no lady who cares anything for her virtue can ever be found in a ballroom," or words to that effect. FRED S. LUCE.

GRANADA, COL., Jan. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Granada is the first town in Colorado on the Santa Fe railroad, seventeen miles west of Kansas state line. Many Freethinkers are here who hav never seen THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other Freethought paper. The Germans, as everywhere else, form the greatest numbers, pro rata, of skeptics. Granada was settled a year and a half ago. As it started into notice the Methodist preachers were not behind. They soon collected the people's square quarters and buzzards (dollars) and built a $2,500 gospel shop to support a lazy preacher, who livs off the sweat of other people's brows. And now what? Well, we struck a little reverse, temporarily, in our progress of prosperity, and all because these worthless preachers got our spare money invested in a useless gospel shop, where the gospel-bangers work one or two hours a week to earn a good salary, while we farmers work six days to earn half as much. Besides, we hav to pay high taxes on our poorly furnished and constructed houses, while these self-styled embassadors of the Lord pay no taxes on their gilded, painted, and varnished joss-houses. Truly Christianity has a queer way of interpreting justice and civilization. But we are hopeful, and don't you forget it. Colorado is progressing, and some of these days we will imitate California and make these gilded gospel shops and mental dude factories pay equal taxation. Colorado is the Centennial State, and it will not be behind in its growing to manhood among states.

We hav got the Salvation Army in some towns of the state, to the amusement of the idle miners while winter lasts. In Trinidad the Salvation Army, while marching through the streets, in order to represent the vernacular of the common wicked people sing, "There are no flies on Jesus, you bet." When the local papers reported it first I thought it was some lying sensation, but upon investigation I found it pure truth. Not only that, but a crowd of miners, women, and children will go half a mile to hear the Salvation Army sing, "There are no flies on Jesus, you bet." And now every wicked kitchen maid and all youngsters sing the same gospel chant. And your humble writer is puzzled why flies and musketoes did not light on Mr. Christ's as well as on any other man's nose.

I suppose you learned the news through the press how an evangelist who was conducting revival meetings at Hiawatha, Kan., eloped with the daughter of a local preacher while he was enjoying the preacher's hospitality of his home. Moral: Always giv a tramp preacher the point of your boot if he has the audacity to ask for anything without paying for it. Had we taken the nearly $3,000 we squandered for a new gospel shop and built an irrigating ditch eight miles long we should hav our lots and suburbs beautified with flowers, trees, shrubs, grasses, etc., and our neighborhood farms would raise grains, stock feed, vegetables, flowers, etc., thereby enhancing the value of our farms three times, as well as every city lot more than doubling in its value. In short, had we followed the common-sense, natural way, we should hav made the desert blossom as the rose. But as we spent all our cash for public works, the first thing in a gospel shop, we raise only sage weeds and cactuses. The class of people that cannot liv without a gospel shop, where they can sing Hosannah to a Jewish God, never put their shoulders to the wheels of progress in a new country, and never did, nor do they contribute to a community's morality. The way these priest-ridden Methodists take up land claims under preëmption laws and fill the United States land offices with perjury can only be compared to Kansas Prohibition. The latter takes the cake, causing more perjury than all the combined criminality in the United States. Yet there are liars even among so-called Freethinkers, narrow-minded, self-conceited cranks who say Kansas Prohibition is a success—the biggest lie in the West. United States Senator Ingalls from Kansas last summer was right when he answered a reporter who said that Kansas Prohibition is a great success, that "the Prohibitionists got the Prohibition law, just what they wanted, and the people get all the whisky they want—both sides are accommodated."

Eastern Colorado is a fine prairie country, with lots of public land yet. Home-seeking Freethinkers coming West to see the country should not forget to stop off at Granada. Stop at the Brunswick Hotel and start about six to eighteen miles north of Granada and look all over the country. I am sure almost anyone will be suited if he seeks land for homes. Lots of it will be covered by irrigation. On the other hand, if the party or parties are only on a hunt or bumming excursion, pass on.

With fraternal feelings I sign myself a MUGWUMP.

STURGIS, Jan. 24, 289.

MR. EDITOR: The knowledge that you are kept busy through your attention to correspondents and editorial duties is not sufficient to deter me from intruding an additional letter. The later numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are of such character as to seem to justify me in taking this liberty. The progress and healthy growth of Rationalism, made manifest in so many ways throughout the land, should cause all true Liberals to look back with pride upon the struggles and sacrifices endured, in greater or less degree, individually and collectivly, during the last decade. Many who could hav done more must as necessarily regret that they did not as those who regret that they could not for want of means. To my mind, it is a glorious thing to realize that nothing of value is ever lost; that every defense of the right, every honest protest against wrongs, no matter how humble or insignificant the protester may be, eventually shows itself as seed sown in good ground. Bread of this character cast upon the waters is surely seen after many days.

While THE TRUTH SEEKER and other like publications were being cursed and condemned for telling the truth, and forcing their way into recognition against mountains of prejudice, but a tenth of a century ago few of their supporters believed that a more general demand for Freethought literature would be made so soon. Very few, even the most sanguin, imagined that a work like "Robert Elsmere" could, in this year of our Lord—with a little l—attract so much attention and create such a furore, while the much superior writings of William McDonnell, "Exeter Hall," "The Heathens of the Heath," and others, had been so long on the market begging for readers. Such is the advantage of having a quasi-orthodox house for a publisher. The Liberals of the country could do much more to advance their cause if those who hav opportunity would identify themselvs with the many other reform movements organized. Legitimate strategy is honest when applied for the advancement of truth, and as this should be the object in view rather than a desire to become notorious by courting antagonism and posing as martyrs, there is reason to believe the adoption of this method of propagandism would yield good results. Many of these organizations may not be just what we would like them to be, yet through them their members soon learn that one fact sustains a necessary relation to all facts, and a careful exponent finds but little difficulty in inspiring thought. It is almost impossible to talk labor reform, temperance, or even Prohibition, without referring to and quoting history, and as soon as people become really interested in history the crimes and falsehoods of organized Christianity become so manifest that the most illiterate are able to see that every evil of which we complain is directly traceable to church domination, supported by ignorance.

I regret very much the trouble Brother Everett and some others hav had with the Knights of Labor, but I cannot help believe they in some way courted all they got. I was an activ member of that organization four years, during which time I edited papers in three different places, made over two hundred public addresses, and in every one took particular pains to credit Infidels with having originated every real reform, religious, social, and political. I spoke in schoolhouses, court houses, town halls, opera houses, and in the open air, was known as an uncompromising advocate of Liberalism long before and during this time, and never visited a place where I was not invited to come again, and several places I did go to the second time. I was frequently abused and misrepresented by the political press, but this was nothing compared to the treatment received at the hands of some notoriety-loving individuals calling themselvs Liberals. Despite all this, I was sustained by the Knights of Labor from head to foot. I was frequently asked how it came that Mr. Powderly, a Catholic, permitted me, an Infidel, to lecture for and organize assemblies. My answer was that "Mr. Powderly has sense enough to know that I hav as much right to be an Infidel as he has to be a Catholic." "That may be, but his church doesn't think so." "True, but the church did not establish the Knights of Labor, and you will find nothing in its constitution, by-laws, or ritual either encouraging or forbidding in any member the enjoyment of his religion." "Do you ever discuss religious matters in your assemblies?" "Certainly not. We are not organized for that purpose; besides, there is much more of importance to the assembly as such to discuss than we usually get through with." "How is it that you ring in so much about what you call the crime of Christianity when you talk to the public?" "I do this because it is impossible to separate the present from the past. To show how mankind has advanced, it is necessary to show what we advanced from, and why advance was necessary. If we believe in liberty, we must show that its enjoyment is preferable to a condition when liberty was not. This compels us to tell why it was not, and show who and what must be held responsible for its opposit, slavery. If the facts of history locate this responsibility and throw it upon the priesthood and the church, so much the worse for the church. I cannot help that."

In the labor movement I found that the influential members of our unions were heterodox without exception, and like myself regarded our organizations as only a means to an end, the end being the elevation of men and women by educating them up to a point that would enable them to use as individuals the power residing with themselvs to the best possible advantage. I believed and still believe that, deprived of their educational features, labor unions are valueless. Their utility consists chiefly in the liberty of thought and discussion essential to their existence, and for this, if for no other reason, they should be encouraged. For centuries prior to their establishment, self-constituted arbitrators claimed and enjoyed the right to answer all questions. The justly dissatisfied were answered with a text, "The poor ye hav always with you." The advocates of political liberty—self-government—were told to "be subject to the powers that be, for they are ordained of God." The larger number of members of labor organizations sneer at these old "chestnuts" nowadays, and disdainfully listen to those who quote them. This denotes progress. The Knights of Labor assemblies hav one by one dwindled away during the past three years, but not because Mr. Powderly is a Catholic. His religious opinions hav prejudiced a very insignificant number. Other circumstances and conditions hav contributed far more than his Catholicism. By many he is considered too conservativ; others believe him incompetent; many more hold him responsible for their own acts of either commission or omission. Envy has had a great deal to do toward working up opposition. Hobbyists hav objected to his rulings because their hobbies hav not been considered the salvation of the race, while the real cause of loss of membership in the "noble order" is in its defectiv constitution, a document well enough suited to the government of a small organization, but inadequate to the requirements of a very large one such as the Knights of Labor was in 1886. Its principal defect will be found in its failure to emphasize the importance of self-reliance. Local assemblies were subject to the district and state assemblies; these in their turn to the officers of the general assembly. This, with such a variety of cases demanding attention, was a greater burden upon the executiv board than it had time or ability to handle, besides creating and encouraging a centralized form of government.

Any movement must fail that tends to the establishment of an autocracy. I could cite to you a very forcible illustration of this fact, if necessary, in an effort made a few years ago to found and maintain a "Liberal" colony in the state of Missouri. The Knights of Labor as an organization will soon be supplanted by one of much greater worth and influence. The rank and file of the order will never go backward. Enough has been done to demonstrate that the educational advantages incident to these labor unions are of too much value to be thrown away, and when the time comes that any man or woman can manage a large number of their fellow-men any great length of time to the satisfaction of each, organizations will be no longer necessary, the millennium will hav arrived; governments, ecclesiastical and social, will then be things of the past; everyone will know just what to do and how to do it, and all will do right because it is right. Until that time, however, the old conflict will continue. Organized labor will meet organized capital, and organized tyranny, under the garb of religion, must be met by its opposit—organized Secularism. I find a great deal of effectiv work in behalf of the latter can be done in connection with other reform movements, and although it may not show at once, it "bobs up serenely" after a while. Should the progressiv daily papers continue to profit by printing the leading thought of the day, the glory that should be in great part yours will be shifted. The grand old pioneers will care little for that. Their unselfishness has been sufficiently established to guarantee a calm and serene old age, crowned with glory and honor enough to make their pathway toward the grave a pleasant one to travel. If the daily press is to be the vehicle for the dissemination of real race enlightenment, and get credit for the abolishment of mental slavery, they can stand it as well as they hav stood the claim that the church abolished chattel slavery.

The Blair Sunday bill is all that is now required to furnish Liberalism a formidable auxiliary. Of course, vigilance is as necessary now as ever, but the zeal exhibited by a few of your correspondents, apparently based upon fear that the republic is doomed, and that the sanctified are about to get control, is far-fetched and misapplied. The real danger to the republic is centralized money, not religious, power.

As Henry George, against the advice of his friends, insisted that single-tax advocates by using the national Democratic party as a means of educating the masses would strengthen their cause more than by placing a ticket in the field, and as time has demonstrated the wisdom of his plan, let the Liberals learn a lesson, and instead of holding their Secular Union aloof from all other purely political reform organizations, take advantage of such circumstances as present themselvs, and the two, five, or nine Demands will be reduced to practice that much sooner. The "whole hog or none" policy has held the movement back. We hav all heard a great deal about striking at the root; this is all well enough, but so long as there are so many obstacles between where we now stand and the much-talked-of root, we shall hav to discover a means of removing them one by one, or we shall be, as ever, deprived of opportunity of striking the much-talked-of root. I was somewhat amused at Mr. Westbrook's remark, wherein he suggests that the Secular Union might do more for morals by getting up a manual for public schools than by pushing their claims against the Girard College thieves. It does not appear to me that humanity is short on manuals of the highest principles of morality. The trouble seems to be in finding a school wherein they can be taught. The best way, in my judgment, to impress the public with the superior quality of Secular morality is to force the thieving propensities of Christian moralists upon public attention through the courts. Push the Girard College case, and compel a general discussion of the matter. The result must be favorable.

Fraternally yours, FRANK GREENE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

God Helps Those Who Help Themselvs.

Be the thing that nature made you,
Not one false pretension show;
Be true and kind to fellow-mortals,
Then no fear of hell you'll know.

For if there's such a place as heaven
In the future bright and gay,
'Twill be gained by doing kindness,
Not by wasting time to pray.

All the prayers that e'er were uttered,
All the prayers that e'er were read,
Never fed a poor man's family,
Or put cover on their bed.

If there is a God almighty
Who, they say, will answer prayer,
Why doesn't he cheer the aching bosom,
And drive off sorrow and despair?

Why doesn't he feed the many millions
That are starving day by day?
Why doesn't he, in a case of sickness,
Save the ones for whom you pray?

Ah, my friends, prayer never saved,
Not so much as one poor elf;
And now I hope you will remember,
God helps him who helps himself.

MISS NETTIE OLDS (aged 15).

McMinnville, Ore, Feb. 11, 1889.

Edith Belle.

In the city of Winimee there lived a wealthy family. They had one little girl whom they loved very dearly, and she had no name. None could be found sweet enough for her. Papa wanted Lilly, Mamma wanted to name her Daisy, aunty wanted Pansy, and uncle wanted to name her Rose. So, you see, there were a good many names ready for her, but none would suit, till at last, when she was a year old, her mamma said she was going to call her Daisy Emma, but papa called her the old pet name of Darling.

When she was fourteen months old she began to walk. Then there was great excitement in the house about the baby, and she was petted until aunty said she was entirely spoiled.

When she was six years old she started to school. She was bright at her lessons, and soon was in the Second Reader. She studied hard, and always had her lessons well. When she was ten years old she was in the Fifth Reader.

It was a hot morning on the 1st of May, and the teacher and scholars started on a picnic. There were just twelve girls—Lucy Wilson, Kitty Moore, Jenny Wilson, Lulu Elliott, Eva Stewart, Nellie Collins, Ethel Joy, Florence Baylor, Flora Baylor, Julia Whitney, Edith Bell, who was a poor little girl eleven years of age, and there was Daisy herself.

The boys said they would giv the girls a row in the boat on the lake if they wanted one, and they thought it would be splendid. There was just room for four boys and four girls. Edith Belle staid on shore. They had not gone far when Daisy, in reaching for a water-lily, fell out of the boat. She screamed, but no one tried to save her, till Edith, hearing the cry, started at once toward the boat. She was just in time to save Daisy's life, and nearly lost her own.

The teacher knew nothing about what was going on; but when she heard the cries she rushed toward the lake, and got there just in time to see the bright, sunny head go under the water.

She did not speak, but went in the water and succeeded in saving the young heroin.

Daisy's father took the brave girl home for his adopted daughter. She always lived happy and made others happy besides herself.

Daisy was never lonesome after that.

Why Freethought is the Best Thought.

Freethought has been the foundation of every invention and discovery. The greatest and purest minds of the universe were and are to a great extent Freethinkers.

We are all born Freethinkers, and it is a sin to pollute the minds of the children with things that are unreasonable and opposit to nature.

Theology teaches what we hav scarcely any proof of, while Freethought investigates and givs us the truth. Freethought tends toward the perfection and enlightenment of every human being, promotes the growth and development of the human mind, and forms new and better thoughts for the benefit of the civilization and the welfare of the people.

The good Freethought has done for us, and the harm theology has, can be conceived through observation and investigation. Taking, for example, some of the first men of inventiv genius; every inventor of a new machine was watched by very superstitious people, who claimed that he was in league with the devil. So he was forced to giv up his experiments, and was at the mercy of the flames.

Where Freethought has once rooted itself into the mind, orthodoxy and superstition are no longer retained there. Our country was discovered by means of Freethought.

Freethought is scarcely ever known to be an inmate of the asylum. It seeks to make the most of the present; its motto being, "One world at a time." It causes many beautiful cities to be built, which contain many beautiful houses and streets, instead of temples and monasteries, built only for the benefit of a worthless lot of priests and nuns. It causes better houses to be built, better clothing to be made, better fruits to grow, and better food to be raised. Any person of intelligence ought to see at once the good that Freethought has done for us. It ought not to be necessary to argue the point at all.

Freethought is far superior to any other creed, because it is working for our present good and welfare and not fretting over the future. How could our present system of telegraphs, telephones, steamships, and all our glorious modern inventions be brought about if it were not for steady, hard Freethought? Surely the prayers and snivelings of priests do not result in such improvements as these!

Did you ever see a steamship cross the mighty ocean? How grand, magnificent, and majestic she appears! She is steered on in her course by one man who stands at the helm. Do you think he could steer this gigantic vessel by prayers? Does he not hav to exercise a little Freethought and some muscular power? Who will contend that she has been brought to her present high degree of perfection as a steamship without the exercise of Freethought, science, art, and practical sense and reason? All the theology in the world, past, present, and to come, has not and never will hav power to make a steamship or to make it go by prayer.

MORE ABOUT THE GOAT.

BRIDGEPORT, CAL., Feb. 11, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Although you hav told us much about the goat that Anna saw, there remains yet much that can be said about that animal. We hav about one hundred goats, and I can assure you it is more than interesting to watch them—especially the kids—in their gambols. We hav between thirty and forty of them that came about the last of November, but on account of the coyotes catching them while small, we hav never yet turned them out with their mothers, but hav kept them all the while in a corral. We sometimes, for their amusement, fix up a spring-board, and it would do you, as well as the little readers of the Corner, good to see them, as it were, form themselvs into line and run, one after the other, jump onto the board out to the end, spring off, often turning a complete summerset, up around the corral, onto the board, and off again, till they run themselvs down.

We hav a large cow-bell hanging on the fence where they are kept. They will stand upon their hind feet ringing it, often two at a time, until they are completely tired out, when others will take their place and keep it going from morn to night. They often wake us up during the night with the noise. It seems to giv them perfect delight.

You were right about the meat being good. For sweet, juicy, fine-flavored meat, nothing can surpass that of a six-month-old kid. They seem always to be healthy, while mutton is often diseased. The milk also is richer and sweeter than that of cows. We often use it in coffee, it being exceptionally fine.

The nannies make nice, kind pets; but woe to the little boy or girl who undertakes to make a pet of a billy, for they will find they hav made a sad mistake.

I could relate quite a thrilling adventure which mamma and I had with a large billy, that papa was compelled to kill by shooting before he could be conquered. KID.

[We should all be pleased to read the adventure if you will kindly write it out for us. —ED. C. C.]

LEON, IA., Feb. 2, E.M. 289.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. My papa and mamma take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner. I am nine years old, and I go to school and study the Third Reader, oral physiology, arithmetic, language, writing, geography, and spelling. My teacher's name is Miss Trask, and she does not read the Bible in the school.

I hav two little brothers, Jamie and Leroy. One time mamma was coring some crab-apples, and Jamie watched her a little bit and said: "Are you takin' 'e diggards out 'e tabs." One night Leroy wanted a needle and thread to sew on some buttons. He sewed them on the corners of his handkerchief, and when he was done the corners were all drawn together. He examined it, and with much surprise said: "My sakes a-dacious, I sewed it too tight!"

Abraham Lincoln.

There were Lincoln memorial services held at the school-house of this vicinity on the night of February 12th, the eightieth anniversary of Lincoln's birth. The house was completely filled. All the seats were occupied. Many had to stand and a large portion sat on the floor. It was the largest and most enthusiastic crowd ever assembled together in that school-house, if not in the whole community. The house was called to order by George J. Remsburg, and on his motion Mr. J. D. Richardson was elected chairman, and on motion of Eugene L. Bell George J. Remsburg was elected secretary. The meeting was opened with a song, "Abraham Lincoln"—tune, "Marching through Georgia"—to which George J. Remsburg responded in an address on the virtues, merits, and achievements of Abraham Lincoln, followed by Eugene L. Bell, who reviewed Lincoln's life, and spoke of his many noble qualities of head and heart. After many interesting declamations by the pupils of the school, Mr. D. T. Pomeroy was called upon, and in a beautiful and touching address he outlined the horrors of slavery, gave a brief history of the colored race, and paid a beautiful tribute to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, who freed them from the bondage of slavery. The next speaker was Mr. H. C. Buchanan, the district treasurer. In language simple, but full of meaning, he expressed his desire to stand by the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Ulysses S. Grant, the men who worked together for the greatest cause on earth. Rev. Mr. Kirchafore was then called upon. He dwelt upon the history of the colored race, gave a brief view of slavery and his experience as a slave, and spoke of Lincoln as "one of the grandest and noblest of men." The famous old song, "John Brown," was then sung by the large crowd, and George J. Remsburg adjourned the meeting with the following benediction: "My friends, may you all leave this place to-night feeling that it is good to hav been here. May each of you feel within your heart a stronger desire to honor and cherish the memory of the great and noble Abraham Lincoln. May you, my colored friends, more fully realize that you are indebted to him for all that you are or ever hope to be. And may the blessings of liberty, which he so freely gave to you, rest upon and be appreciated by you now and forever."

The house was beautifully decorated with evergreens, flags, and pictures. Over the blackboard was raised in large letters the name Abraham Lincoln, and at each side of this was a large picture. One piece of canvas contained portraits of Washington, Lincoln, and Grant, and beneath it said, "Our Country's Heroes." On one side of the chimney was a large gilt frame containing portraits of Harrison and Morton, Washington, Lincoln, Grant, Garfield and Arthur, while beneath these pictures was draped a large flag. On one side of the house was the word Liberty, and on the other a flag. The meeting was a success, and the speeches were made amid cheers, stamping of feet and clapping of hands. We hope the seed sown that night will bring a rich harvest. REPORTER.

Oak Mills, Kan.

The Primitiv Religion of Israel.

From the Independent.

Prof. Th. Nöldeke, of Strassburg, "the little giant," as the Semitists of the continent are accustomed to call him, the best philologian of the times, in a recent review of a work by Baetbgen, in the Journal of the German Oriental Society, givs this summary:

"A remnant of original fetichism was preserved for a long time in Israel. I refer to the reverence for sacred stones, as this has been practiced by a number of the Semitic tribes. That the stone of Jacob was an originally Canaanite one we hav no reason to suppose. The sacred character of Bethel is, according to all indications, original with the Israelites, as the Old Testament is still acquainted with the fact that the place was in former times called Luz. The interpretation given to the divinely revered stone in our present accounts must not deceive us any more than the legends of the Moslems concerning the stone fetiches in Mecca, which hav remained as a singular relic in Islam.

"That Jahveh, at a comparativly late period, too, was worshiped merely as the god of his own people, and that other beings were regarded by them as gods among the other peoples, Baethgen himself acknowledges. The absolute monotheism attained supremacy only very slowly. Thus, e. g., while the prophet Amos declares him to hav been the creator, and hence certainly as the only God, the narrator of Judg. xi, 24, who certainly lived later than this prophet, puts words into the mouth of Jephtha which acknowledge Chemosh as the god who cares for Ammon as Jehovah cares for Israel. Sentences like that in Ex. xv, 10, 'Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods?' presuppose the acceptance of more than one God; only at a later date were such expressions employed for rhetorical purposes.

"The polytheism of Israel was supported materially by the use of images. A difference in the kinds of images causes, in a marked degree, a faith in different divine beings. But the old religion of Israel was by no means without images. Baethgen tries to explain away the Teraphim, but 1 Sam. xix, 13, ff, shows plainly that David had a household god in the shape of a human being. It is further narrated as something quite natural that Gideon made an idol (Judg. viii, 24-27, a); the blame attached to this further on (27, b) does not suit to the connection. The picture of Jahveh in Dan is attributed to a grandson of Moses (Judg. xvii, ff). In the light of these facts, the golden images of steers made by Jeroboam receive a certain legitimacy. It is even not certain that Solomon's temple was entirely without images, for it was only Hezekiah who destroyed the image of a serpent of brass which was attributed to Moses (2 Kings xviii, 4). It is vain to try to explain away these plain facts by the legend in Num. xxi, 6-9.

"But it is also a certain fact that at an early date there was an opposition to the use of images for worship. The second commandment, which is certainly very old, forbids the use of any and all images, and the story of the golden calf of Aaron, which in itself is certainly unhistorical, condemns even before the days of Hosea in the strongest terms the official religious cult of the northern kingdom.

"As was the case with the other Shemites, the Israelites, too, had human sacrifice, especially the horrible sacrifice of children. The law which demands all the first-born for Jahveh, Ex. xiii, 2, was undoubtedly meant literally at first. The very fact that ransom money was paid for the first-born shows that originally these were sacrificed themselvs. The story in Gen. xxii, would be without meaning if it did not presuppose the sacrifice of children as an ancient rite. The prohibition in Lev. xviii, 21; xx, 2, not to sacrifice children to Moloch, is not given as against a foreign custom. As was the case with the Greeks, spiritual progress among the Hebrews also at a very early date crowded out this barbarity, while among the equally pious but innerly wild Carthaginians it remained in full sway. But in Israel, too, it from time to time comes into the forefront again.

"We accordingly find throughout Israel religious ideas and customs such as were in vogue among their related polytheists; but everywhere there is seen also, even in the oldest times, a striving for a pure monotheism and a higher religious service, and this it is that givs Israel its characteristic position in history. But just the origin of this feature is wrapped in darkness. The Old Testament represents Moses, who grew up as an Egyptian, and whose name is Egyptian, as the lawgiver of the monotheistic religion. Unfortunately, we cannot secure a historical picture of his person and work, and still less of the legislation of Sinai; but we can certainly trust tradition sufficiently to believe that the new departure was contemporaneous with the exodus out of Egypt. In Egypt the Israelites doubtless received many germs which were developed later. There, where crude fetich worship and deep wisdom were both at home, a gifted nation could receive many an impetus. At any rate, it would be my supposition that the service of Jahveh was also taken from them. But, however this may be, I would forego the explanation of the mystery, that this originated 'in the constant divine conduct and divine revelation.' This is certainly no scientific explanation.

"It is more than doubtful that the original Israelites already in Egypt, or their ancestors before going there, were to a greater or less extent monotheistic. Of Abraham, the God-fearing man, something may be saved as historical. I cannot at all understand how a man from whom not only all Israel, but also a number of other nations descended, could hav been a real person. How can a tradition concerning such a one hav been developed? Is his personality or that of his immediate descendants testified to any better, historically, than that of Deucalion, Xuthus, or Dorus? In the account given by Genesis of Abraham, we hav probably several ancient Hebrew divinities, but the most of this is uncertain, to which must be added that much of it may hav come from Babylon."

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

With References to the most Plain and Striking Self-Contradictions of the so-called Inspired Scriptures.

BY A. JACOBSON.

Third edition, carefully revised and enlarged.

Read the following extract from a letter by Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds:

"The 'Bible Inquirer' is better than a Concordance as a reference, to speedily find the teaching of the Bible, on any subject. It is a sledge-hammer in demolishing error, yet the most devout Bible-worshiper can find no cause of offense. Using no word of argument, it simply permits the Bible to destroy all faith in the Bible, by giving chapter and verse—word for word—showing its palpable absurdities and contradictions."

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. It should be extensivly circulated, as it teaches the doctrins of Liberalism on the most important subject of the world—the right to think and speak and write. The superiority of our doctrins on Liberty over the creeds of Catholicism and Protestantism was never better set forth, and must be manifest to any Christian who possesses the power to reason. Odds and Ends.

A PRIME minister—a missionary not underdone.

NUBBS: "Didn't you think the andante was lovely?" Stubbs: "Didn't hear it, old chap; was too busy looking at Anne Summers."

'Tis said Love's blind, and cannot see
Just where his darts to aim—
'Tis noticed, though, that spite of this
Love gets there just the same.

SHE: "Why, George, I didn't understand that the Mail and Express was a religious paper; I thought it was a funny paper!" He: "Yes, it's both; its manner of being religious makes it funny."

Down in the cellar, dark, remote,
Where alien cats your larder note—
In solemn grandeur stands the goat.

Without he hears the whining storm,
And feels the draughts around him swarm—
He eats the coal to keep him warm.

LOCKSLEY (who has just given a cigar to Sharpson from his own private box): "I say, Sharpson, tell me what you think of that cigar." Sharpson: "Well, if you say so, I will, but I want you to understand that I'm no optimist."

WHEN lovely woman stoops to weather
The stormy blast that sweeps the street,
Beware, young man, her fixed umbrella—
'Twill knock your teeth out if you meet!

LITTLE girl (at school): "What did the teacher send you here for?" Little boy: "She said I was bad, and must come over and sit with the girls." "I like you. Can you stay long?" "Guess not. I wasn't very bad." "Well, you be badder next time."

JACK SPOONER (who has managed to blunder through it): "Edith, dear, I—I—hardly know just what to say—I am so happy and so agitated. It may seem foolish to you—but—I put my sentiments in writing before I came—half intending to leave a letter!" Miss Korton (with admirable foresight): "Well, John, dear, we understand each other now; but please do let me hav the letter, too. I would so love to keep it as a memento of this happy evening!"

A FAIR cashier at the desk did stand,
And wrote out a bill for a man near by;
He watched the pen in her snow-white hand,
And saw the amount with a great, big sigh.

"A fine business hand; how I wish 't were mine!"
The man with the writing like Greeley's said;
"If this is a serious offer, 'tis thine;"
He looked up surprised, and tumbled and fled.

"Do you know I am surprised that the blood sent out through the arteries ever gets back to the heart again," reflected Litewate yesterday. "Why shouldn't it?" anxiously inquired Featherbrane. "Why! Because it has been proved that every course the blood takes to reach the heart again is in vein." Then they both began to develop cases of blood-poisoning.

ONE day Dr. McCosh came into the mental philosophy class and said: "Ah, young gentlemen, I hav an impression!" "Now, young gentlemen," continued the doctor, as he touched his head with his forefinger, "can you tell me what an impression is?" No answer. "What! No one knows? No one can tell me what an impression is?" exclaimed the doctor, looking up and down the class. "I know," said Mr. Arthur. "An impression is a dent in a soft place." "Young gentleman," said the doctor, removing his hand from his forehead and growing red in the face, "you are excused for to-day."

MISS COULTER: "Oh, dear! I'm afraid I'll be late. Mother, won't you come help Marie pull on this corset? I'll never get dressed at this rate. There, that will do nicely. Whew! Giv me a moment to see if I can breathe in it. Yes. Now bring me my paper-sole walking shoes. They look rather thin for wet weather, but it can't be helped. I couldn't drag myself along in heavy shoes, with the weight of this new street costume to carry. It nearly breaks my back. There, I'm ready!" Mrs. Coulter: "Where are you going?" Miss Coulter: "To the Modern Progress Society meeting. I am to read a paper on 'Woman's Weakness Due to Man's Tyranny."

Gems of Thought.

IN vain shall we attempt to cure men of their vices, unless we begin by curing them of their ignorance. It is only by showing them the truth, that they will perceive their real interests, and the real motivs that ought to incline them to do good. Instructors hav long enough fixed men's eyes upon heaven; let them now turn them upon earth. An incomprehensible theology, ridiculous fables, impenetrable mysteries, pueril ceremonies, are too fatiguing to be any longer endured. Let the human mind apply itself to what is natural, to intelligible objects, sensible truths, and useful knowledge. Let vain chimeras be banished, and reasonable opinions will of their own accord enter into heads thought to be destined to eternal error.—D'Holbach.

MAN vainly ascribes his misfortunes to obscure and imaginary agents; in vain he seeks for mysterious and remote causes of his ills. In the general order of the universe his condition is, doubtless, subject to inconveniences, and his existence overruled by superior powers; but those powers are neither the decrees of a blind fatality, nor the caprices of whimsical and fantastic beings; like the world, of which he forms a part, man is governed by natural laws, regular in their course, consistent in their effects, immutable in their essence; and those laws, the common source of good and evil, are not written among the distant stars, or hidden in mysterious codes; inherent in the nature of terrestrial beings, interwoven with their existence, they are at all times, and in all places, present to man; they act upon his senses, they warn his understanding, and dispense to every action its reward or punishment. Let man, then, study these laws!—Volney.

THE poet in a golden clime was born,
With golden stars above;
Dowered with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn,
The love of love. —Tennyson.

HE who hates, blaspheмes.—Ingersoll.

THE truly moral deterrent from murder is not constituted by a representation of hanging as a consequence, or by a representation of tortures in hell as a consequence, or by a representation of the horror and hatred excited in fellow-men, but by a representation of the necessary natural results—the infliction of death-agony on the victim, the destruction of all his possibilities of happiness, the entailed sufferings to his belongings.—Spencer.

THE child has no moral rules, but is governed by fear; the youth is controled by authority; the adult is influenced by reason. Corresponding to this we find that the religion of savages rests upon fear, that of the masses of civilized nations upon the authority of church, priests, and sacred books, while the more highly educated are swayed wholly by reason. Rationalism is, therefore, proved to be the highest order and latest development of mental evolution. These three stages in the growth of morality may be illustrated by the conduct of persons in a park, where is placed the warning, "Keep off the grass." One says, If I go on the grass I shall be arrested and fined. He is restrained by fear. Another says, The law should be respected by all good citizens. He is ruled by authority. A third person says, If I walk on the grass I shall injure the appearance of the park. He is influenced by reason. A fourth, and still higher, stage will be reached when long continuance in rational well-doing becomes a habit, and men do right as a matter of course. Punishment and the law are useful means of restraint for those who are in low stages of moral development, but they are useless for the more advanced. Some are restrained from ill-doing by fear of hell and God; still more by fear of the policeman; others, without thought, follow the orders of church and state, while the most enlightened believe, with Kant, that duty ought to be done for duty's sake. These last certainly are not the people that Christian ministers should hold up to scorn. It ill becomes those who are under the restraint of the lower motivs to rail at those who hav the loftier considerations.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

CHRISTIANS consider each other incapable of telling the truth, except when kissing the Bible.—The Beacon.

ALL theologies contain devices and plans by which the supposed anger of the God can be turned aside and his forgivness obtained. There is no limit up to the last moment of life to the amount of forgivness obtainable. It is a frequent occurrence for a murderer to state on the gallows that he is perfectly certain of having been forgiven, and of being received into the favor of God forever. By the plans of salvation so provided, a lifetime of crime is obliterated and an eternity of bliss secured. It is quite evident how this is calculated to lessen the strength of the moral sanction.—John Wilson, M.A.

THE Christian world has endeavored for nearly two thousand years to explain the atonement, and every effort has ended in an admission that it can not be understood.—Ingersoll.

ANOTHER PHASE OF THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

Notes and Clippings.

BAD effects of attending a religious meeting: Two English servants went to a Salvation Army meeting on a Sunday evening, overstayed the time when they should hav been home, and for fear of a scolding, tied themselvs together with a woolen scarf and drowned themselvs in a canal.

BOSTON boasts of a dog, the member of a family where fish is always eaten on Fridays, that for some time past disappeared on Thursday evenings and was not seen again until Saturday morning. So says the Sun. Investigation showed that the intelligent but heretical brute spent Friday with a family where meat was eaten on that day. Even a dog knows better than to be a Catholic.

AN American man-of-war's man was once in a Washington church on an Easter Sunday. Seeing an American flag laid down in the aisle, he indignantly asked what it was placed there for. He was told that it was to save the carpet. Thereupon Sailor Jack picked up the flag from the floor, and, as he folded it carefully, exclaimed: "You people may be good Christians, but you are damned poor Americans."

MR. BOWEN, proprietor of the Independent, a Congregational journal published in this town, went to Washington to see Brother Harrison inaugurated. He spent several dollars telegraphing to his paper his opinion of the affair, as follows: "It has been my privilege to hear other presidents speak on similar occasions in the past, but I venture the opinion that, never since the immortal Washington addressed the people one hundred years ago, has any president touched the hearts of the people as President Harrison has on this occasion. Tears of gratitude were seen in all directions, while the vast multitude present gave vent to their joy by such cheers as probably never were heard before in the city of Washington." Brother Bowen ought to get an office.

MR. WANAMAKER, our new postmaster-general, presided last Sunday over the Sunday-school of the Bethany Presbyterian church. He is superintendent of the school. He does not travel on Sunday, so that in order to teach his school he is obliged to leave Washington on Saturday and return on Monday morning. The question of interest to the public just now is whether he will try to interfere with mail arrangements of Sundays.

MATTHEW HENRY once said: "He who prays in his family does well. He who reads the scriptures and prays does better. He who reads the scriptures and sings and prays does best of all." Quoting this, a religious journal says: "Let the head of every Christian family seek to excel." But supposing the head of the family can't sing, then how can he excel? And isn't the Lord responsible for his lack of excellence by not endowing him with a comprehension of music?

A WRITER in the Glasgow, Scotland, evening News givs us this: "Most people now, I daresay, interpret sacred writ in a way to suit themselvs. Professor Adams, of the theological faculty, Edinburgh University, does so anyhow, and nothing can exceed the ingenuity and nonchalance, so to speak, with which he can get over a scriptural passage which is not to be reconciled with the laws of human nature. A few days ago, when his class was reading the song of Deborah, he stopped them at the words, 'To every man a damsel or two.' 'You will observe,' he said, with a twinkle in his eye, 'that there is an evident mistake here. It would be a peculiar consolation to the women folk to find their men coming home with two girls apiece. In fact, damsel here means heap of spoil.' And the class smiled sadly."

THE Christian Advocate says: "The good old times of our fathers, when there were no railroads and telegraphs, were favorable to family devotion. But now conditions hav changed. The father leaves home early and returns late, and prayer gradually loses its place among the family customs. It is said that family devotions are becoming exceedingly scarce among church-members. If this be so, whatever the cause, it is a serious symptom of spiritual decline."

THE status of the past and present attempts to repeal the blasphemy laws in England is given by the London Freethinker: "Mr. Courtney Kenny is retiring from Parliament His little bill for abolishing the blasphemy laws has never got further than being printed. Fortunately Mr. Bradlaugh has now taken the matter up, and we expect to see it vigorously carried forward. Mr. Bradlaugh has given notice, and, with his usual good fortune, has secured an early date in the ballot. He will bring on his bill on March 20th. Whether it stands a fair chance of success is more than we can say. But there is no need to worry; the bill is in the best hands, and every Freethinker may rest satisfied that whatever success is possible will certainly be achieved. Should the bill fail in the first debate, it will be brought in again and again." Petitions in favor of the bill are being vigorously circulated in England.

THE Rev. Dr. Talmage, acrobat of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, says that "No man can be a Christian if his stomach is out of order." The Inquisitors, the persecutors of Europe, and the Puritans of New England must hav possessed exceptionally good digestiv apparatus.

CONTINENTAL bigotry is still rampant, and Jews as well as Freethinkers appear to be under the ban in Sweden. The London Freethinker says: "It is evident that hard fighting will hav to be done in Sweden ere the fangs of bigotry are rendered harmless. It appears that on one of the counts against Mr. Lennstrand his jury acquitted him. Not satisfied with the imprisonment Mr. Lennstrand has undergone, the public prosecutor has appealed to the supreme court against this acquittal on the ground that there was a Jew among the jury, and the supreme court has, in its impartial wisdom, declared that on that account the jury was invalid, and the case must be tried anew. This charge was that of being concerned with Mr. Lindkvist in translating one of the Freethinker tracts, that by J. Symes, entitled, 'Who is to be Damned if Christianity be True?' Mr. Lindkvist, it will be remembered, received one month's imprisonment, and the Swedish bigots are not yet satisfied. We are pleased to notice as a set-off that Norway has recently rescinded the laws by which the state was wont to bind consciences to the established church, a measure which has produced loud indignation on the part of the national clergy."

Agnosticism.

From the Nineteenth Century.

Looking back nearly fifty years, I see myself as a boy, whose education had been interrupted, and who, intellectually, was left, for some years, altogether to his own devices. At that time I was a voracious and omnivorous reader; a dreamer and speculator of the first water, well endowed with that splendid courage in attacking any and every subject, which is the blessed compensation of youth and inexperience. Among the books and essays, on all sorts of topics from metaphysics to heraldry, which I read at this time, two left indelible impressions on my mind. One was Guizot's "History of Civilization," the other was Sir William Hamilton's essay "On the Philosophy of the Unconditioned," which I came upon by chance in an odd volume of the Edinburgh Review. The latter was certainly strange reading for a boy, and I could not possibly hav understood a great deal of it;* nevertheless, I devoured it with avidity, and it stamped upon my mind the strong conviction that, on even the most solemn and important of questions, men are apt to take cunning phrases for answers; and that the limitations of our faculties, in a great number of cases, renders real answers to such questions not merely actually impossible, but theoretically inconceivable.

Philosophy and history having laid hold of me in this eccentric fashion, hav never loosened their grip. I hav no pretension to be an expert in either subject; but the turn for philosophical and historical reading, which rendered Hamilton and Guizot attractiv to me, has not only filled many lawful leisure hours, and still more sleepless ones, with the repose of changed mental occupation, but has not unfrequently disputed my proper work time with my liege lady, Natural Science. In this way I hav found it possible to cover a good deal of ground in the territory of philosophy; and all the more easily that I hav never cared much about A's or B's opinions, but hav rather sought to know what answer he had to giv to the questions I had to put to him—that of the limitation of possible knowledge being the chief. The ordinary examiner with his "State the views of So-and-so" would hav floored me at any time. If he had said, what do you think about any given problem? I might hav got on fairly well.

The reader who has had the patience to follow the enforced, but unwilling, egotism of this veritable history—especially if his studies hav led him in the same direction—will now see why my mind steadily gravitated toward the conclusions of Hume and Kant, so well stated by the latter in a sentence, which I hav quoted elsewhere.

"The greatest and perhaps the sole use of all philosophy of pure reason is, after all, merely negativ, since it serves not as an organon for the enlargement [of knowledge], but as a disciplin for its delimitation; and, instead of discovering truth, has only the modest merit of preventing error" (Kritik der reinen Vernunft. Edit. Hartenstein, p. 256).

When I reached intellectual maturity and began to ask myself whether I was an Atheist, a Theist, or a pantheist; a Materialist or an idealist; a Christian or a Freethinker; I found that the more I learned and reflected, the less ready was the answer; until, at last, I came to the conclusion that I had neither art nor part with any of these denominations, except the last. The one thing in which most of these good people were agreed was the one thing in which I differed from them. They were quite sure they had attained a certain "gnosis"—had, more or less successfully, solved the problem of existence; while I was quite sure I had not, and had a pretty strong conviction that the problem was insoluble. And, with Hume and Kant on my side, I could not think myself presumptuous in holding fast by that opinion. Like Dante,

> Nel mezzo del cammin di nostra vita
> Mi ritrovai per una selva oscura,

but, unlike Dante, I cannot add,

> Che la diritta via era smarrita.

On the contrary, I had, and hav, the firmest conviction that I never left the "verace via"—the straight road; and that this road led nowhere else but into the dark depths of a wild and tangled forest. And though I hav found leopards and lions in the path; though I hav made abundant acquaintance with the hungry wolf, that "with privy paw devours apace and nothing said," as another great poet says of the ravening beast; and though no friendly specter has even yet offered his guidance, I was, and am, minded to go straight on, until I either come out on the other side of the wood, or find there is no other side to it, at least, none attainable by me.

This was my situation when I had the good fortune to find a place among the members of that remarkable confraternity of antagonists, long since deceased, but of green and pious memory, the Metaphysical Society. Every variety of philosophical and theological opinion was represented there, and expressed itself with entire openness; most of my colleagues were -ists of one sort or another; and, however kind and friendly they might be, I, the man without a rag of a label to cover himself with, could not fail to hav some of the uneasy feelings which must hav beset the historical fox when, after leaving the trap in which his tail remained, he presented himself to his normally elongated companions. So I took thought, and invented what I conceived to be the appropriate title of "agnostic." It came into my head as suggestivly antithetic to the "gnostic" of church history, who professed to know so much about the very things of which I was ignorant; and I took the earliest opportunity of parading it at our society, to show that I, too, had a tail, like the other foxes. To my great satisfaction, the term took; and when the Spectator had stood godfather to it, any suspicion in the minds of respectable people, that a knowledge of its parentage might hav awakened, was, of course, completely lulled.

That is the history of the origin of the terms "agnostic" and "agnosticism;" and it will be observed that it does not quite agree with the confident assertion of the reverend principal of King's College, that "the adoption of the term agnostic is only an attempt to shift the issue, and that it involves a mere evasion" in relation to the church and Christianity (Report of the Church Congress, Manchester, 1888, p. 252).

The last objection (I rejoice, as much as my readers must do, that it is the last) which I hav to take to Dr. Wace's deliverance before the Church Congress arises, I am sorry to say, on a question of morality.

"It is, and it ought to be," authoritativly declares this official representativ of Christian ethics, "an unpleasant thing for a man to hav to say plainly that he does not believe in Jesus Christ" (l. c. p. 254).

Whether it is so, depends, I imagin, a good deal on whether the man was brought up in a Christian household or not. I do not see why it should be "unpleasant" for a Mohammedan or a Buddhist to say so. But that "it ought to be" unpleasant for any man to say anything which he sincerely, and after due deliberation, believes, is, to my mind, a proposition of the most profoundly immoral character. I verily believe that the great good which has been effected in the world by Christianity has been largely counteracted by the pestilent doctrin on which all the churches hav insisted, that honest disbelief in their more or less astonishing creeds is a moral offense, indeed a sin of the deepest dye, deserving and involving the same future retribution as murder and robbery. If we could only see, in one view, the torrents of hypocrisy and cruelty, the lies, the slaughter, the violations of every obligation of humanity, which hav flowed from this source along the course of the history of Christian nations, our worst imaginations of hell would pale beside the vision.

A thousand times, no! It ought not to be unpleasant to say that which one honestly believes or disbelieves. That it so constantly is painful to do so, is quite enough obstacle to the progress of mankind in that most valuable of all qualities, honesty of word or of deed, without erecting a sad concomitant of human weakness into something to be admired and cherished. The bravest of soldiers often, and very naturally, "feel it unpleasant" to go into action; but a court-martial which did its duty would make short work of the officer who promulgated the doctrin that his men ought to feel their duty unpleasant.

I am very well aware, as I suppose most thoughtful people are in these times, that the process of breaking away from old beliefs is extremely unpleasant; and I am much disposed to think that the encouragement, the consolation, and the peace afforded to earnest believers in even the worst forms of Christianity are of great practical advantage to them. What deductions must be made from this gain on the score of the harm done to the citizen by the ascetic other-worldliness of logical Christianity; to the ruler, by the hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness of sectarian bigotry; to the legislator, by the spirit of exclusivness and domination of those that count themselvs pillars of orthodoxy; to the philosopher, by the restraints on the freedom of learning and teaching which every church exercises, when it is strong enough; to the conscientious soul, by the introspectiv hunting after sins of the mint and cummin type, the fear of theological error, and the overpowering terror of possible damnation, which hav accompanied the churches like their shadow, I need not now consider; but they are assuredly not small. If agnostics lose heavily on the one side, they gain a good deal on the other. People who talk about the comforts of belief appear to forget its discomforts; they ignore the fact that the Christianity of the churches is something more than faith in the ideal personality of Jesus, which they create for themselvs, plus so much as can be carried into practice, without disorganizing civil society, of the maxims of the Sermon on the Mount. Trip in morals or in doctrin (especially in doctrin), without due repentance or retractation, or fail to get properly baptized before you die, and a plébiscite of the Christians of Europe, if they were true to their creeds, would affirm your everlasting damnation by an immense majority.

Preachers, orthodox and heterodox, din into our ears that the world cannot get on without faith of some sort. There is a sense in which that is as eminently as obviously true; there is another, in which, in my judgment, it is as eminently as obviously false, and it seems to me that the hortatory, or pulpit, mind is apt to oscillate between the false and the true meanings, without being aware of the fact.

It is quite true that the ground of every one of our actions, and the validity of all our reasonings, rest upon the great act of faith, which leads us to take the experience of the past as a safe guide in our dealings with the present and the future. From the nature of ratiocination it is obvious that the axioms on which it is based cannot be demonstrated by ratiocination. It is also a trite observation, that, in the business of life, we constantly take the most serious action upon evidence of an utterly insufficient character. But it is surely plain that faith is not necessarily entitled to dispense with ratiocination because ratiocination cannot dispense with faith as a starting-point; and that because we are often obliged, by the pressure of events, to act on very bad evidence, it does not follow that it is proper to act on such evidence when the pressure is absent.

The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews tells us that "faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen." In the authorized version "substance" stands for "assurance," and "evidence" for "the proving." The question of the exact meaning of the two words, translated thus differently, affords a fine field of discussion for the scholar and the metaphysician. But I fancy we shall be not far from the mark if we take the writer to hav had in his mind the profound psychological truth that men constantly feel certain about things for which they strongly hope, but hav no evidence, in the legal or logical sense of the word; and he calls this feeling "faith." I may hav the most absolute faith that a friend has not committed the crime of which he is accused. In the early days of English history, if my friend could hav obtained a few more compurgators of like robust faith, he would hav been acquitted. At the present day, if I tendered myself as a witness on that score, the judge would tell me to stand down, and the youngest barrister would smile at my simplicity. Miserable indeed is the man who has not such faith in some of his fellow-men—only less miserable than the man who allows himself to forget that such faith is not, strictly speaking, evidence; and when his faith is disappointed, as will happen now and again, turns Timon and blames the universe for his own blunders. And so, if a man can find a friend, the hypostasis of all his hopes, the mirror of his ethical ideal, in the Jesus of any, or all, of the gospels, let him liv by faith in that ideal. Who shall or can forbid him? But let him not delude himself with the notion that his faith is evidence of the objectiv reality of that in which he trusts. Such evidence is to be obtained only by the use of the methods of science, as applied to history and to literature, and it amounts at present to very little.

It appears that Mr. Gladstone, some time ago, asked Mr. Laing if he could draw up a short summary of the negativ creed; a body of negativ propositions, which hav so far been adopted on the negativ side as to what the apostles' and other accepted creeds are on the positiv; and Mr. Laing at once kindly obliged Mr. Gladstone with the desired articles—eight of them.

If anyone had preferred this request to me, I should hav replied that, if he referred to agnostics, they hav no creed; and, by the nature of the case, cannot hav any. Agnosticism, in fact, is not a creed, but a method, the essence of which lies in the rigorous application of a single principle. That principle is of great antiquity; it is as old as Socrates; as old as the writer who said, "Try all things, hold fast by that which is good;" it is the foundation of the Reformation, which simply illustrated the axiom that every man should be able to giv a reason for the faith that is in him; it is the great principle of Descartes; it is the fundamental axiom of modern science. Positivly the principle may be expressed: In matters of the intellect, follow your reason as far as it will take you, without regard to any other consideration. And negativly: In matters of the intellect, do not pretend that conclusions are certain which are not demonstrated or demonstrable. That I take to be the agnostic faith, which if a man keep whole and undefiled, he shall not be ashamed to look the universe in the face, whatever the future may hav in store for him.

The results of the working out of the agnostic principle will vary according to individual knowledge and capacity, and according to the general condition of science. That which is unproved to-day may be proved, by the help of new discoveries, to-morrow. The only negativ fixed points will be those negations which flow from the demonstrable limitation of our faculties. And the only obligation accepted is to hav the mind always open to conviction. Agnostics who

*Yet I must somehow hav laid hold of the pith of the matter, for, many years afterward, when Dean Mansell's Bampton lectures were published, it seemed to me I already knew all that this eminently agnostic thinker had to tell me.

never fail in carrying out their principles are, I am afraid, as rare as other people of whom the same consistency can be truthfully predicated. But if you were to meet with such a phenix and to tell him that you had discovered that two and two make five, he would patiently ask you to state your reasons for that conviction, and express his readiness to agree with you if he found them satisfactory. The apostolic injunction to "suffer fools gladly," should be the rule of life of a true agnostic. I am deeply conscious how far I myself fall short of this ideal, but it is my personal conception of what agnostics ought to be.

However, as I began by stating, I speak only for myself; and I do not dream of anathematizing and excommunicating Mr. Laing. But, when I consider his creed and compare it with the Athanasian, I think I hav, on the whole, a clearer conception of the meaning of the latter. "Polarity," in article viii, for example, is a word about which I heard a good deal in my youth, when "Naturphilosophie" was in fashion, and greatly did I suffer from it. For many years past, whenever I hav met with "polarity" anywhere but in a discussion of some purely physical topic, such as magnetism, I hav shut the book. Mr. Laing must excuse me if the force of habit was too much for me when I read his eighth article.

And now, what is to be said to Mr. Harrison's remarkable deliverance "On the future of agnosticism?"* I would that it were not my business to say anything, for I am afraid that I can say nothing which shall manifest my great personal respect for this able writer, and for the zeal and energy with which he ever and anon galvanizes the weakly frame of Positivism until it looks more than ever like John Bunyan's Pope and Pagan rolled into one. There is a story often repeated, and I am afraid none the less mythical on that account, of a valiant and loud-voiced corporal, in command of two full privates, who falling in with a regiment of the enemy in the dark, orders it to surrender under pain of instant annihilation by his force; and the enemy surrenders accordingly. I am always reminded of this tale when I read the positivist commands to the forces of Christianity and of Science; only the enemy show no more signs of intending to obey now than they hav done any time these forty years.

The allocution under consideration has the papal flavor which is wont to hang about the utterances of the pontiffs of the church of Comte. Mr. Harrison speaks with authority and not as one of the common scribes of the period. He knows not only what agnosticism is and how it has come about, but what will become of it. The agnostic is to content himself with being the precursor of the positivist. In his place, as a sort of navvy leveling the ground and cleansing it of such poor stuff as Christianity, he is a useful creature who deserves patting on the back, on condition that he does not venture beyond his last. But let not these scientific Sanballats presume that they are good enough to take part in the building of the Temple—they are mere Samaritans, doomed to die out in proportion as the Religion of Humanity is accepted by mankind. Well, if that is their fate, they hav time to be cheerful. But let us hear Mr. Harrison's pronouncement of their doom.

"Agnosticism is a stage in the evolution of religion, an entirely negativ stage, the point reached by physicists, a purely mental conclusion, with no relation to things social at all" (p. 154). I am quite dazed by this declaration. Are there, then, any "conclusions" that are not "purely mental?" Is there "no relation to things social" in "mental conclusions" which affect men's whole conception of life? Was that prince of agnostics, David Hume, particularly imbued with physical science? Supposing physical science to be non-existent, would not the agnostic principle, applied by the philologist and the historian, lead to exactly the same results? Is the modern more or less complete suspension of judgment as to the facts of the history of regal Rome, or the real origin of the Homeric poems, anything but agnosticism in history and in literature? And if so, how can agnosticism be the "mere negation of the physicist?"

"Agnosticism is a stage in the evolution of religion." No two people agree as to what is meant by the term "religion;" but if it means, as I think it ought to mean, simply the reverence and love for the ethical ideal, and the desire to realize that ideal in life, which every man ought to feel—then I say agnosticism has no more to do with it than it has to do with music or painting. If, on the other hand, Mr. Harrison, like most people, means by "religion" theology, then, in my judgment, agnosticism can be said to be a stage in its evolution, only as death may be said to be the final stage in the evolution of life.

I can but marvel that such sentences as this, and those already quoted, should hav proceeded from Mr. Harrison's pen. Does he really mean to suggest that agnostics hav a logic peculiar to themselvs? Will he kindly help me out of my bewilderment when I try to think of "logic" being anything else than the canon (which, I believe, means rule) of thought? As to agnosticism being a distinctiv faith, I hav already shown that it cannot possibly be anything of the kind; unless perfect faith in logic is distinctiv of agnostics, which, after all, it may be.

Agnosticism as a religious philosophy per se rests on an almost total ignoring of history and social evolution (p. 152).

But neither per se nor per aliud has agnosticism (if I know anything about it) the least pretension to be a religious philosophy; so far from resting on ignorance of history, and that social evolution of which history is the account, it is and has been the inevitable result of the strict adherence to scientific methods by historical investigators. Our forefathers were quite confident about the existence of Romulus and Remus, of King Arthur, and of Hengst and Horsa. Most of us hav become agnostics in regard to the reality of these worthies. It is a matter of notoriety, of which Mr. Harrison, who accuses us all so freely of ignoring history, should not be ignorant, that the critical process which has shattered the foundations of orthodox Christian doctrin owes its origin, not to the devotees of physical science, but, before all, to Richard Simon, the learned French Oratorian, just two hundred years ago. I cannot find evidence that either Simon, or any one of the great scholars and critics of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries who hav continued Simon's work, had any particular acquaintance with physical science. I hav already pointed out that Hume was independent of it. And certainly one of the most potent influences in the same direction, upon history in the present century, that of Grote, did not come from the physical side. Physical science, in fact, has had nothing directly to do with the criticism of the gospels; it is wholly incompetent to furnish demonstrativ evidence that any statement made in these histories is untrue. Indeed, modern physiology can find parallels in nature for events of apparently the most eminently supernatural kind recounted in some of those histories.

It is a comfort to hear, upon Mr. Harrison's authority, that the laws of physical nature show no signs of becoming "less definit, less consistent, or less popular as time goes on" (p. 154). How a law of nature is to become indefinit, or "inconsistent," passes my poor powers of imagination. But with universal suffrage and the coach-dog theory of premiership in full view; the theory, I mean, that the whole duty of a political chief is to look sharp for the way the social coach is driving, and then run in front and bark loud—as if being the leading noise-maker and guiding were the same things—it is truly satisfactory to me to know that the laws of nature are increasing in popularity. Looking at recent developments of the policy which is said to express the great heart of the people, I hav had my doubts of the fact; and my love for my fellow-countrymen has led me to reflect with dread on what will happen to them, if any of the laws of nature ever become so unpopular in their eyes as to be voted down by the transcendent authority of universal suffrage. If the legion of demons, before they set out on their journey in the swine, had had time to hold a meeting and to resolve unanimously, "That the law of gravitation is oppressiv and ought to be repealed," I am afraid it would hav made no sort of difference to the result, when their two thousand unwilling porters were once launched down the steep slopes of the fatal shore of Gennesaret.

The question of the place of religion as an element of human nature, as a force of human society, its origin, analysis, and functions, has never been considered at all from an agnostic point of view (p. 152).

I doubt not that Mr. Harrison knows vastly more about history than I do; in fact, he tells the public that some of my friends and I hav no opportunity of occupying ourselvs with that subject. I do not like to contradict any statement which Mr. Harrison makes on his own authority; only, if I may be true to my agnostic principles, I humbly ask how he has obtained assurance on this head. I do not profess to know anything about the range of Mr. Harrison's studies; but as he has thought it fitting to start the subject, I may venture to point out that, on the evidence adduced, it might be equally permissible to draw the conclusion that Mr. Harrison's absorbing labors as the pontifex maximus of the positivist religion hav not allowed him to acquire that acquaintance with the methods and results of physical science, or with the history of philosophy, or of philological and historical criticism, which is essential to anyone who desires to obtain a right understanding of agnosticism. Incompetence in philosophy, and in all branches of science except mathematics, is the well-known mental characteristic of the founder of Positivism. Faithfulness in disciples is an admirable quality in itself; the pity is that it not unfrequently leads to the imitation of the weaknesses as well as of the strength of the master. It is only such over-faithfulness which can account for a "strong mind really saturated with the historical sense" (p. 153) exhibiting the extraordinary forgetfulness of the historical fact of the existence of David Hume implied by the assertion that

It would be difficult to name a single known agnostic who has given to history anything like the amount of thought and study which he brings to a knowledge of the physical world (p. 153).

Whoso calls to mind what I may venture to term the bright side of Christianity, that ideal of manhood, with its strength and its patience; its justice and its pity for human frailty; its helpfulness, to the extremity of self-sacrifice; its ethical purity and nobility; which apostles hav pictured, in which armies of martyrs hav placed their unshakable faith, and whence obscure men and women, like Catherine of Sienna and John Knox, hav derived the courage to rebuke popes and kings, is not likely to underrate the importance of the Christian faith as a factor in human history, or to doubt that if that faith should prove to be incompatible with our knowledge, or necessary want of knowledge, some other hypostasis of men's hopes, genuin enough and worthy enough to replace it, will arise. But that the incongruous mixture of bad science with eviscerated papistry, out of which Comte manufactured the positivist religion, will be the heir of the Christian ages, I hav too much respect for the humanity of the future to believe. Charles the Second told his brother, "They will not kill me, James, to make you king." And if critical science is remorselessly destroying the historical foundations of the noblest ideal of humanity which mankind hav yet worshiped, it is little likely to permit the pitiful reality to climb into the vacant shrine.

That a man should determin to devote himself to the service of humanity—including intellectual and moral self-culture under that name; that this should be, in the proper sense of the word, his religion—is not only an intelligible, but, I think, a laudable resolution. And I am greatly disposed to believe that it is the only religion which will prove itself to be unassailably acceptable so long as the human race endures. But when the positivist asks me to worship "Humanity"—that is to say, to adore the generalized conception of men as they ever hav been and probably ever will be—I must reply that I could just as soon bow down and worship the generalized conception of a "wilderness of apes." Surely we are not going back to the days of paganism, when individual men were deified, and the hard, good sense of a dying Vespasian could prompt the bitter jest, "Et puto Deus fio." No divinity doth hedge a modern man, be he even a sovereign ruler. Nor is there anyone, except a municipal magistrate, who is officially declared worshipful. But if there is no spark of worship-worthy divinity in the individual twigs of humanity, whence comes that godlike splendor which the Moses of positivism fondly imagins to pervade the whole bush?

I know no study which is so unutterably saddening as that of the evolution of humanity as it is set forth in the annals of history. Out of the darkness of prehistoric ages man emerges with the marks of his lowly origin strong upon him. He is a brute, only more intelligent than the other brutes; a blind prey to impulses, which as often as not lead him to destruction; a victim to endless illusions, which make his mental existence a terror and a burden, and fill his physical life with barren toil and battle. He attains a certain degree of physical comfort, and develops a more or less workable theory of life in such favorable situations as the plains of Mesopotamia or of Egypt, and then, for thousands and thousands of years, struggles with varying fortunes, attended by infinit wickedness, bloodshed, and misery, to maintain himself at this point against the greed and the ambition of his fellow-men. He makes a point of killing and otherwise persecuting all those who first try to get him to move on; and when he has moved on a step, foolishly confers post-mortem deification on his victims. He exactly repeats the process with all who want to move a step yet further. And the best men of the best epochs are simply those who make the fewest blunders and commit the fewest sins.

That one should rejoice in the good man, forgiv the bad man, and pity and help all men to the best of one's ability, is surely indisputable. It is the glory of Judaism and of Christianity to hav proclaimed this truth, through all their aberrations. But the worship of a god who needs forgivness and help, and deserves pity every hour of his existence, is no better than that of any other voluntarily selected fetich. The emperor Julian's project was hopeful, in comparison with the prospects of the new Anthropolatry.

When the historian of religion in the twentieth century is writing about the nineteenth, I foresee he will say something of this kind:

The most curious and instructiv events in the religious history of the preceding century are the rise and progress of two new sects, called Mormons and Positivists. To the student who has carefully considered these remarkable phenomena nothing in the records of religious self-delusion can appear improbable.

The Mormons arose in the midst of the great republic, which, though comparativly insignificant, at that time, in territory as in the number of its citizens, was (as we know from the fragments of the speeches of its orators which hav come down to us) no less remarkable for the nativ intelligence of its population, than for the wide extent of their information, owing to the activity of their publishers in diffusing all that they could invent, beg, borrow, or steal. Nor were they less noted for their perfect freedom from all restraints in thought or speech or deed; except, to be sure, the beneficent and wise influence of the majority exerted, in case of need, through an institution known as "tarring and feathering," the exact nature of which is now disputed.

There is a complete consensus of testimony that the founder of Mormonism, one Joseph Smith, was a low-minded, ignorant scamp, and that he stole the "Scriptures" which he propounded, not being clever enough to forge even such contemptible stuff as they contain. Nevertheless he must hav been a man of some force of character, for a considerable number of disciples soon gathered about him. In spite of repeated outbursts of popular hatred and violence—during one of which persecutions, Smith was brutally murdered—the Mormon body steadily increased, and became a flourishing community. But the Mormon practices being objectionable to the majority, they were, more than once, without any pretense of law, but by force of riot, arson, and murder, driven away from the land they had occupied. Harried by these persecutions, the Mormon body eventually committed itself to the tender mercies of a desert as barren as that of Sinai; and, after terrible sufferings and privations, reached the oasis of Utah. Here it grew and flourished, sending out missionaries to, and receiving converts from, all parts of Europe, sometimes to the number of 10,000 in a year; until in 1880, the rich and flourishing community numbered 110 000 souls in Utah alone, while there were probably 30,000 or 40,000 scattered abroad elsewhere. In the whole history of religions there is no more remarkable example of the power of faith; and, in this case, the founder of that faith was indubitably a most despicable creature. It is interesting to observe that the course taken by the great republic and its citizens runs exactly parallel with that taken by the Roman empire and its citizens toward the early Christians, except that the Romans had a certain legal excuse for their acts of violence, inasmuch as the Christian "sodalitia" were not licensed, and consequently were, ipso facto, illegal assemblages. Until, in the latter part of the nineteenth century, the United States legislature decreed the illegality of polygamy, the Mormons were wholly within the law.

Nothing can present a greater contrast to all this than the history of the Positivists. This sect arose much about the same time as that of the Mormons, in the upper and most instructed stratum of the quick-witted, skeptical population of Paris. The founder, Auguste Comte, was a teacher of mathematics, but of no eminence in that department of knowledge, and with nothing but an amateur's acquaintance with physical, chemical, and biological science. His works are repulsiv on account of the dull diffuseness of their style, and a certain air, as of a superior person, which characterizes them; but nevertheless they contain good things here and there. It would take too much space to reproduce in detail a system which proposes to regulate all human life by the promulgation of a gentile Leviticus. Suffice it to say that M. Comte may be described as a syncretic, who, like the Gnostics of early church history, attempted to combine the substance of imperfectly comprehended contemporary science with the form of Roman Christianity. It may be that this is the reason why his disciples were so very angry with some obscure people called Agnostics, whose views, if we may judge by the accounts left in the works of a great Positivist controversial writer, were very absurd.

To put the matter briefly, M. Comte, finding Christianity and Science at daggers drawn, seems to hav said to Science, "You find Christianity rotten at the core, do you? Well, I will scoop out the inside of it." And to Romanism: "You find Science mere dry light—cold and bare. Well, I will put your shell over it, and so, as schoolboys make a specter out of a turnip and a tallow candle, behold the new religion of Humanity complete!"

Unfortunately neither the Romanists nor the people who were something more than amateurs in science, could be got to worship M. Comte's new idol properly. In the nativ country of Positivism, one distinguished man of letters and one of science, for a time, helped to make up a roomful of the faithful, but their love soon grew cold. In England, on the other hand, there appears to be little doubt that, in the ninth decade of the century, the multitude of disciples reached the grand total of several score. They had the advantage of the advocacy of one or two most eloquent and learned apostles, and, at any rate, the sympathy of several persons of light and leading—and, if they were not seen, they were heard all over the world. On the other hand, as a sect, they labored under the prodigious disadvantage of being refined, estimable people, living in the midst of the worn-out civilization of the Old World; where anyone who had tried to persecute them, as the Mormons were persecuted, would hav been instantly hanged. But the majority never dreamed of persecuting them; on the contrary they were rather given to scold, and otherwise try the patience of, the majority.

The history of these sects in the closing years of the century is highly instructiv. Mormonism . . .

But I find I hav suddenly slipped off Mr. Harrison's tripod, which I had borrowed for the occasion. The fact is, I am not equal to the prophetical business, and ought not to hav undertaken it.

A. D. Swan, at present a sojourner in our city, heads the list of last month's contributors with a life-passage fee. Brother Swan is a studious reader and deep thinker, possessing marked ability also as a writer, and is brave enough to express his convictions, though they be unpalatable to some who, in his view, are too positiv on matters purely speculativ. Not regarding rashness of expression as the sole demonstration of Radical Liberalism, he believes a little more modesty would better become the philosophical inquirer. Severely practical, his Secular principles are therefore of the most robust order, for, believing in our rights, he takes care to sustain them. Brother Swan has had a remarkably varied life, has been an extensiv traveler, and has been famous as a musician. He is now a "promoter" of scientific inventions, and has just organized a company with $50,000 for the manufacture of combination locks for general purposes. He is one of the sterling, reliable men of the Secular cause.

Capt. Robert Davis was one of the benefactors of the Liberal cause. He is a gentleman of culture and sterling character. We are happy to learn that the work of the Union has won his confidence and support, and we hope he will hav reason to rejoice at the work being done, to which we bid him a most hearty welcome. He writes: "Inclosed find order for $10, which please accept as a slight token of my appreciation of your recent and present labors in the cause of Freethought, as well as an encouragement to persevere in the good work."

R. F. Grigsby had just re urned full of enthusiasm from the grand California convention in San Francisco when he wrote Brother Wettstein for some jewelry, and considerately inclosed an X for the Union. He rejoices over the wonderful results Freethought has accomplished on the coast, and says: "Samuel P. Putnam is a good, whole-souled worker, and is doing a grand work in waking up the people."

Alliance is an important Liberal center, and R. G. Smith is the man at the helm in that community. He forwards the amount pledged by their delegates at the last congress, and reports the Union in splendid working order. At their Paine ball they had ninety-four couples, and a handsome surplus is now in the treasury. In one set danced the venerable, lifelong Liberal, Mrs. Bailey, aged ninety years, her daughter, grand-daughter, and great-grand-daughter. Quite a unique quartet, possibly one which never could be repeated by a Liberal. Brother Smith is now busily engaged in defending Paine's memory in the local press. Allez Alliance!

Reuben Wright, secretary, forwards $10 for the Molalla, Ore., Secular Union. This "band of brothers" was the first to respond, as an organization, to my appeal for funds after accepting the secretaryship, and I consequently hold it in grateful remembrance. Their secretary hopes "the cause may be pushed forward as far in the present year as it has in the past." We'll try. Reuben is all right—on the Secular question.

G. H. Hanschild is the worthy host of the Herman House, Victoria, Tex., and we earnestly hope his generosity to the Union will be the means of his making many valued friends among Secularists of the South. His vocation affords the most pleasant "propaganda by deeds." In all my travels I found but one boniface bold enough not to hide his being a Freethinker, and whose portrait of Colonel Ingersoll found a prominent place in his parlor. The American House at Kalamazoo is nearly always full, and it is the best in the state of Michigan.

Mrs. Olds, one of our lady vice-presidents, is a ceaseless worker for the Union and a most generous helper. She sent $5, which, if I remember right, was to be credited to others, but her letter being mislaid, she will kindly convey those friends our acknowledgments.

Clarence Hensley is waking up his community in Colorado, and has organized the Pine River Secular Union. Bravo, Hensley! That is what we should do everywhere. Join the American Secular Union. Organize! organize!! organize!!! Those who stand in the way of that consummation are traitors to the cause of Secularization, and deserve to be treated with utter contempt by all Liberals. They are stumbling-blocks in the path of progress which should be and must be hurled aside.

Brother Greenhill, a life member, did not forget the Union on account of his foreign tour, and before reaching home left a donation. Being quite an astronomer, would he inform us whether "Taurus" is not the solar biological sign of Senator Blair, and whether the Bull is on the ascending or descending node?

F. H. Nicoles, of Medaryville, enrols as a member, and orders some pamphlets. He proposes to do some propaganda work on his own account.

Brother Zimmer desires to take an annual trip among those who comprehend the baneful influence of priestcraft upon legislation, and work to remedy that state of affairs.

With only one of those who forwarded their donations to THE TRUTH SEEKER is the writer personally acquainted, Mrs. Susan Reichester, of Valley Falls, Kan., a most energetic and intelligent worker in the Freethought vinyard. To the other friends we desire to tender our sincere thanks.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

This noted pioneer of freedom, whose name is honored by Freethinkers as a household word, lectured Sunday, March 3d, at the Princess Opera House for the Chicago Secular Union. His discourse in the afternoon was "Bible Morals," which elicited from Judge Russell, for years a leader in the Philosophical Society, this compliment: "While most of the statements made by the lecturer taken separately are not new to me, I never before realized the mass of immorality contained in the Bible, which the lecturer, by his masterly collation of facts, has given, or the danger to society of putting this book, as a moral guide, in the hands of children. It is the most conclusiv lecture I hav heard on the question."

When it is generally recognized that Judge Russell is one of, if not the best read man in Chicago in philosophical literature, the estimate he held of Remsburg's lecture is worth recording.

There is nothing of the Bombastes Furioso about Remsburg, but, with the rapier of reason and the skill of a most accomplished swordsman, he delivers the most deadly heart-thrusts at superstition, and orthodoxy would become a vast graveyard if Remsburg could but reach it all.

The Chicago News reports his evening lecture as follows:

The Seventh Demand of the doctrin of Secularism is that no laws shall be made to compel people to observe the Sabbath. The Hon. John E. Remsburg, ex-superintendent of public instruction for Kansas, addressed the Chicago Secular Union last night on the subject of "Sabbath-Breaking." His view of the subject was entirely different from that of the speakers at Central Music Hall. The Blair Sunday bill, now before Congress, he said proposed to giv eighty thousand people—the clergy of the country—a monopoly of one day of the week. By preaching that the Christian Sabbath was a Christian institution the clergy were practicing a gross fraud on the people, as the speaker declared he could prove by the Bible and by the early Christian writers. They conceded that there was no divine command to keep Sunday holy after the abrogation of the Jewish laws, in which Saturday was the designated Sabbath. Jesus Christ, the speaker held, was a Sabbath-breaker, and Sabbath-breaking was one of the accusations made by his executioners.

Sunday was designated as the Sabbath by the emperor Constantine in A.D. 321, because it was the day on which the pagans honored the sun. Mr. Remsburg told of the punishments meted out by the early American Puritans, who punished mothers for kissing the fevered lips of a dying child on the Sabbath day. He quoted Calvin, Tyndall, Cranmer, Milton, Jeremy Taylor, William Penn, James Freeman Clarke, and Cardinal Gibbons in defense of his position that no divine authority existed for a Sunday Sabbath. Cardinal Gibbons, a sagacious theologian, favored the Blair bill because he knew it meant union of church and state, and because he knew the Catholic church would eventually rule both.

The speaker asked that the state make the day a holiday—not a holy day for the support of priestcraft. He was opposed, he said, to a law that would punish a newsboy for earning a few pennies on a day when clergymen were earning their living. The clown in the circus had as much right to amuse on a Sunday as the clown in the tabernacle.

E. A. STEVENS.

SOME people think that the diptheria is a disease of recent origin, but the Baptists hav had the dip theory among them for two hundred years or more.

"DURING a ministerial career of fifty years," said a New England clergyman, "if ever I got into pecuniary difficulty it was some good-natured sinner who helped me out."

South Dakota's Constitution.

The people of South Dakota are about to launch out in the ship of statehood. They will vote to sustain or not the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885 in May next. I herewith append the sections which are of interest to Freethinkers. Article vi, section 3, relating to worship and public expenditure of money to religious societies, reads as follows:

The right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience shall never be infringed. No person shall be denied any civil or political right, privilege, or capacity on account of his religious opinions; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse licentiousness, the invasion of the rights of others, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of the state. No person shall be compelled to attend or support any ministry or place of worship against his consent, nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship. No money or property of the state shall be given or appropriated for the benefit of any sectarian or religious society or institution.

Section 5 of the same article relates to free speech, and is as follows:

Every person may freely speak, write, and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right. In all trials for libel, both civil and criminal, the truth, when published with good motivs and for justifiable ends, shall be a sufficient defense. The jury shall hav the right to determin the fact and the law under the direction of the court.

Article xxi, section 3, does not bar the Agnostic from taking the oath of office. It reads as follows:

Every person elected or appointed to any office in this state, except such inferior offices as may be by law exempted, shall before entering upon the duties thereof, take an oath or affirmation to support the constitution of the United States and of this state, and faithfully to discharge the duties of this office.

Article xxii relates to modes of worship, and reads as follows:

COMPACT WITH THE UNITED STATES.

The following article shall be irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of this state: First, That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of this state shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

I find nothing in the constitution relating to chaplains of the legislatures. I think the above sections show a Liberal tendency in Western statesmanship.

South Dakota will sail into the Union without a religious fetter upon any of its citizens if the Sioux Falls constitution becomes a reality. The Agnostic, the Jew, the Protestant, the Catholic, the Spiritualist, will hav equal privileges to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. The state will show no preference nor appropriate any money for the benefit of religious institutions.

True, it does not embody the Nine Demands of Liberalism, yet it is free from the greedy power of religious intolerance and bigotry, which is always sure to assert itself whenever a chance is given.

It has the spirit of Thomas Jefferson and Thomas Paine embodied in its principles. But it may yet take vigilance on the part of the Liberal element to save the constitution from bigotry's stamp. The Yankton Press says: "The July constitutional convention might make any alterations demanded by public sentiment, as the document is to be submitted in October."

Would-be senators and representativs who sit in the conventions are sometimes led from the path of equality and justice by those who threaten to withdraw their influence. Let us hope and strive to the end that when another star is pinned to the flag of the Union to represent South Dakota, it may be the emblem of a state whose people enjoy civil, mental, and religious liberty. LOUIS N. CRILL, JR.

Richland, Dak., March 8, 1889.

Things in London.

The appeal of Mr. A. B. Morse to the by-laws committee of the London school board, asking them to rescind a previous resolution that he should not be permitted to advocate Freethought doctrins, has, up to the present, been unsuccessful. The question will come on again, and it is to be hoped Mr. Moss will gain his point, though this seems somewhat doubtful while the clerical element is so strong. Of course, if he belonged to any sect of the very united Christian church, he could lecture, preach, or write to his heart's content, even if he neglected his duties for the purpose, but on no account, even in his own time, must he say or do anything in opposition to the only true religion. One opposing member of the committee took up his petition on commercial grounds, saying that a business man would not allow a person in his employment to lecture and circulate books to the effect that his master's wares were falsehood and imposture, which is a very beautifully expressed and logical argument, only it happens to hav no bearing on the case in point. I only wonder the bold, bad Freethinker has not been charged with every possible crime—probably he would be, were it not for the law of libel. So long as he continues in his present evil courses I fear he will not be able to emulate that pious Baptist minister who appeared this week in the bankruptcy court and acknowledged that he had got into difficulties with regard to funds collected from the elect to build a new chapel, and borrowed money from various confiding believers to make good the deficiency. He cleaned out one widow of his congregation, but although she has been brought to poverty, no doubt it was the Lord's will executed through the humble instrumentality of his servant, and her chastening will be blessed to her, and compensated for most fully in the new Jerusalem. Another man of God is under remand for decoying a girl of fifteen from her home and effecting her ruin. It is pleasant to read that the Lord is still with him, and stirred up his friends to become bail-bonds, so that he may not be degraded by spending a week in jail with low criminals. These are only two cases of clerical weakness—there are plenty more—though in many instances interest is used to keep them from being publicly known, lest the enemies of the Lord should rejoice.

As I anticipated, Dr. Parker has soon given up his discourses to workingmen; they evidently did not suit him. The home thrusts he received made him feel uneasy, and he must hav confessed to himself what a humbug he really is.

Although it is well known that missionary efforts in the East are dismal failures, but not admitted to be so by those interested in keeping up the farce, the testimony of Mr. Caine, M.P., and Nonconformist, should tend to open the eyes of all who are not absolutely blind. He states that, in the main, the results are "miserable, inadequate, and discouraging." At Serampore the Baptist church has fallen from eighty-five members in 1880 to twenty-four in 1888, and the same tale of decreasing congregations may be told of the churches in other places. In fact, the members are so few that, in the Baptist schools, Hindoo and Mohammedan teachers hav to be employed, and the result is easily to be foreseen. In Mr. Caine's opinion the tendency amongst educated nativs is to exchange Eastern superstitions for Western skepticism, and not for the decaying forms of Western Christianity. The missionary societies must curse him for his disclosures, and will hav all their work cut out to neutralize the effects of his statement at the forthcoming May meeting.

Mr. Waller, part proprietor of the London Times, is about as pious a person as you would be likely to meet, and fully acts up to the example set by the early Christians in lying for the glory of God, and the increase of his own riches. The exposure of his false witnesses this week has been the all-absorbing topic, and shows to what depths of infamy a fervent Christian can descend to injure his fellow-men, who, by the way, are also orthodox believers. Mr. Foote, in his paper, has ably compared these forgeries with those of the Christian fathers, and has shown how easy it would be, in the Dark Ages, for the interested majority to impose all sorts of lying tales on the world. The parallel is extremely apposit, though it will not be seen by those who do not wish to see it.

Mr. Tom Mead, the Shaksperian actor, late of Irving's company, has passed away full of years and honor, and I do not hear that he was converted or died miserably, as Freethinkers are popularly supposed to do. I had the pleasure of meeting him once with Mr. Watts, and found him a most genial and well-informed conversationalist, and hav always regretted circumstances prevented my seeing him again. Such men are the salt of the earth and can ill be spared. J. D.

It is to be presumed that even if McArthur were to die and not liv again, the world would manage to struggle along in some sort of way, and, bidding him a "kindly farewell, would turn its attention" to the next most available curiosity.

McArthur quotes from Milton's "Samson Agonistes" Dalila's words—

> In argument with men, a woman ever
> Goes by the worse, whatever be her cause;

and he professes that Mrs. Slenker has caused him to adopt the sentiment of this quotation. I wish this gentleman would designate the "sections of this country" where he livs; for I hav a curiosity to know if "in these parts educated people in reading a criticism look for and demand" such exuberant displays of chivalry.

He forgets what is due to Mrs. Slenker's age; and generally acknowledged character as an honest, able, candid, conscientious, courteous public writer. He forgets what is due to the sex, all women, even his own mother and sisters. I can imagin Samson weighing over two hundred pounds and standing five feet eleven inches in his stocking feet, and in his rage resembling McArthur, but only in this one thing does Mrs. Slenker resemble Delilah—that is, she has shorn, shaven smooth, yea, pulled up by the very roots, the locks that were thought to be the source of his great strength. All metaphors fail at some point; and try as he may, McArthur cannot, like Samson, by one supreme, final desperate effort, "bring down the house."

It seems that, without my knowing it, my guides hav led me to formulate one of McArthur's "propositions"—to wit, that Materialists are not infallible.

This is the first intimation I hav had that McArthur has any "propositions," and as I am not used to discussing matters in this vague way, perhaps he might, as a sort of preliminary, be induced to write them out, and number, or mark them, for future use or reference. It would be quite laughable after this "tempest in a teapot," if we were to find ourselvs agreed on all these propositions. My special attention is called to a statement of "facts." I am quite willing to admit that, when a distinction is made between inference and experience, that statement relates McArthur's real experiences. For instance, six times, he says "writing was heard." The act of writing can always be seen, but not always heard; besides, a similar noise to that of writing can be made without writing on a slate, or writing on anything. I suppose McArthur will accept this judicial emendation of his statement, so as to read, "a noise like writing was heard."

I am afraid that critical prudence exhausted itself in an examination of the table, for six times an inference in the nature of petitio principii has been substituted for the naked fact. Now, I shall think this was done unconsciously and from the natural bent of the witness, unless he "slops over" like a pettifogging lawyer, and tries to defend the usage. He can say that it is an ellipsis if he choose, but it is vital in this case to supply it, for writing was not heard, at least, not that writing. As a matter of course, the slates, as usual, were marked for the purpose of identification, but I hav heard of Slade, and I would suggest that he also should hav been marked, as he is apt to lose his own identity. But more of this in its proper place, and when I can produce the documents to prove it.

"The power was so very great [inference again] that the medium withdrew the slates and tied them. It certainly took "a force" to tie them; it would take some force to tie any slate. It would also require some degree of intelligence to make even the most simple knot. So I am inclined to say: "Yes; these experiments prove: 1. A force. 2. That this force is intelligent." There you are, up to this date, just where you wish to be; so go ahead and don't mind me if I am a little facetious, for I am built that way and can't help it. Now, if those slates had not been tied they might hav suddenly disappeared like the Sangrael, or they might hav set out tramping around the world like the Wandering Jew, or "Japhet in search of his father." There is nothing like having "a force" intelligently applied to the restraint of such slates. It seems Mr. Macdonald took this experiment à posteriorily, for you say, emphatically, "He sat on them." As the old-time doctors in desperate cases applied leeches about everywhere they could find a place to put one, so Mr. Macdonald's companions seem to hav applied slates in his case. Slates on his shoulder, a slate on his head, one in each hand, and "he sat on them." With slates all around him, too, in utter confusion, he must hav presented the appearance of an animated slate quarry, and might hav passed himself off on some unsophisticated school-marm for a whole class in arithmetic. By the Immense Jubilator! I am surprised that he lived through it! I am anxious to hear from him—very. Above all, I wish to know how much of a medium he is when you fellows are not with him. Now come, Eugene, "honest Injun," can you run the thing "all by your lone self?"

Now, my dear Mr. McArthur, I really wish you could succeed in fairly proving a life beyond this fleeting show that we call life. To me it is not pleasant to contemplate the complete and total obliteration of my consciousness in death. Still, this seems to be what we must expect, and I try to make the best of it. Indeed, it is not very fearful when it is seen in its true aspect, and it can be made useful, too, as an incentiv to right and earnest living, as I know from my own experience. Your séances seem very foolish to me, and I am amused at your childish credulity; but drive right ahead and let us see how you "get there." I will address you directly and seriously hereafter, if you will take off your gaffles.

Sunday Observance.

Verily this is a time that tries men's souls when honest, loyal citizens are forced to bestir themselvs, leave their legitimate work, to rouse their liberty-revering brothers and sisters into action against a superstitious invasion, a horde of tyrannical "believers" whose tyrannous determination is to coerce unbelievers, thinkers, scientists, into observing, or the appearance of observing, with all respect, the day and faith they in their narrow minds hav set aside as the day and faith belonging to their God!

Their day! God's day! The day God demands of man to rest! Is there one man, woman, or child in the universe who, if God could prove his existence, or these believers could prove it, or could prove that he settled on such a day of observance for man, would hesitate an instant to accord him and the day their heartfelt respect? Not one. Nay, if there were a God whom we could define, we would recognize and obey his words whenever he spoke. "Not my will but thine, O God!" would be the articulate love of every soul. Church people know this; they also know that the thinking part of the community hav by careful research proved the Bible a mere book of history exaggerated in the telling and extravagantly translated; they know the "holy standard" under which the world's churches hav been planted discloses too plainly the touch of barbarous fingers, the guidance of a semi-barbarous intellect, for the nineteenth-century thinkers to giv it a chance in the ranks of science; and they know that the standard Science hoists must carry no superstitious element—neught but the cleanest of progressiv truths—hence the blood-bought, agony-bleached, terrorizing church-rag must soon occupy space in time's attic among other outgrown, too-long-worn representativs of torture, if Liberalism, science, and honest thought is not checked directly. So the church lifts her bigoted throat and pours forth her tyrannical voice, asking that the nation force its people to respect her God, whom she cannot prove exists, and yield him one day for glorification out of every seven. Because, says the church, he demands it. It is right, and he knows what is best for the people, etc.

Before the Senate and House respond to this plea by either a yea or a nay, they should insist on actual proof that this God who demands so much is a reality. Irrespectiv of church worship, says the bigoted Christian, we want the people to enjoy the blessed privilege of a day of rest; it is a physical as well as a spiritual need. So it is. But what right has another person, or a body politic or religious, to declare the day I am to rest in? According to my honest necessity I ought to rest on the day in which my system calls for rest and not wait for the health-restoring blessing during several days which must intervene betwixt the day of my need and the day which some religious sect has decreed its day of worship and sanctified repose. Nay, those intervening days will be a drag on my spent energies, harbingers of disease, decay, and death. Human anatomy with its aches and ills cannot accommodate itself to church ordinances, and if we are really living in a civilized era, that incontrovertible fact will be duly and conscientiously weighed by our law-makers before declaring any special day belongs to either rest or God. As well specify the style and size of garment which the people are lawfully enjoined to wear, or the physic every mouth shall swallow on stated days for the general weal.

"Why," says the doctor, "physic will injure the system if not judiciously administered at the hour and on the day when the functional irregularities denote its need. Anyone must be crazy to swallow such doses indiscriminately, and none but heathen governments will prescribe such customs." The doctor speaks with reason here; he will also claim it barbarously health-deteriorating for government to enforce a specified idle day upon those who do not need it—those who may hav been compelled perchance to take a day of rest for health's sake earlier or later in the week, and whose income, being thus docked two days, will not meet life's requirements. Demand, O America, that man rest one day in seven, if you will, but, pray, permit him, as the individual to be benefited, the personal right of selecting that day, he being qualified to recognize his recuperativ need as no sect, creed, or political body can be. Such a law, making man his own arbiter, would relieve him of a multitude of physical ills, restore the bloom of health to his cheek—by removing the strain hitherto imposed on failing strength—renew his manhood, and by ingrafting a new sense of freedom and responsibility throw his mind unconsciously toward scientific educational pursuits—the science of anthropology in particular. Let the church stand on its own merits (if it has any) and giv man a chance to be free—the nation a chance to select her own shoes.

Nature has, by creating all individuals dissimilar, by striking one with illness while the others sing with health, by entombing one while others abound with life, decreed that no specified day can serve a universal purpose with equal profit to each and all. Can the God of a sect perform a beneficial assumption that is not in accord with natural law? Impossible. Another question: Shall the clergy, who are never schooled in anatomical facts, declare what laws shall be enacted for human weal, or shall the schooled and experienced physician be called upon to do this? It is the same ignorant presumption, the same ignorant spirit of persecution, that legalized the Inquisition, which would to-day enforce a Sunday observance on free men. Conceive the instruments of torture used in those dens of religious torment, and the demoniacal insensibility of the priests who applied them to athletic manhood, beauteous womanhood, and tender children until bones were crushed, sinews strained, and idiocy, dementia, and physical and mental wreck in every conceivable form was to be met in all parts of those countries where a Christian God's ordinances reigned supreme. God and religion ruled, and the sacred ordinances of nature, under which man and woman were formed beautiful to look upon, physically robust, able, happy, great, and capable of marvelous development toward yet diviner perfection—these holy, natural ordinances were abused from alpha to omega, their supreme rights respected in no instance. The church never asks: "What shall we do to develop a noble, a perfect, and beautiful race?" It says: "We will be respected as a power though blood flow, discontent, idiocy, cripples, and maniacs abound." In the old days the church was permitted to make the mass believe with it, or at least appear to join with it. Individuals hav never been considered by the church, and never will be. It still tries to bring them all under one mold, into one groove of thought. Behold it to-day, tyrannical and selfish as it dares to be, striving to force a nation of free people into sacerdotal harness, practically obliging them to restrain all aches and ills through six hard days of labor, and in return according them the privilege of consulting its God about these same physical disorders when Sunday comes round. Consulting its God! What a travesty on life.

Again I say, let these believers prove their God exists before giving into his mercy the multiplicity of ills and woes which are every Sunday befalling the human race. Shall the restaurant close when the human stomach continues to work its digestiv organs? Or shall man fast one day—as the church used to insist—and thus disorder his system and entail upon his body diseases, weaknesses, he must suffer from all the ensuing week? And the causes being repeated every first or seventh day, he must, as a consequence, soon become afflicted with chronic ailments, whose vitiating effects will enfeeble his posterity, and decimate the numbers thereof even more largely than those of the first generation religiously experimented on.

The physician must not run his business when others cannot. Neither must the preacher! Shall a sermon-writer be allowed to work all Sunday delivering his wares if you and I may not also hav the privilege of delivering our wares? Clergymen unanimously declare the Sabbath "a very exhausting day," a "day of hard labor." I wish the Sunday law might be tested on these Sunday laborers. They are paid for working on "God's day," paid in the same coin that compensates the compositor, the railway employee, the barber, the counter clerk, and all hirelings, even unto the organist and soloists, etc., who form the church choir. Shall the farmer let his crops become weather-ruined on days wherein parsons and church choristers are earning their salaries? What noble consistency!

I was informed this morning that the signers of the Sunday law petitions in the churches are not confined to adult members, but that all the little boys who could write their names plainly were invited to help the "grand work" along, and did so in large numbers, aided and abetted by parents, deacons, pastor, and Sunday-school teachers. I do not believe my informant falsified. I do not believe he repeated a mere rumor. The churches are so anxious to secure the largest array of signers they will, in my opinion, resort to any method to procure such a result. Dishonesty in the Lord's cause is not dishonesty, you know. Lack of space forbids the entering of quotations from the holy book proving this policy.

I do not suggest that the Liberals and "Saturday observers" follow this fraudulent system. I hope they will be honest and upright in every respect; but I would like the two Houses to investigate the matter before accepting the church rolls and pronouncing them the greatest. Town and state records can be easily compared with the lists sent in, and I hope the comparisons will be demanded.

The majority of the preachers in Vineland hav waited on Mayor Lord, requesting him to enforce Sunday laws, but their plea amounted to nothing in its results. Since then meetings hav been held in the churches for the discussion of a Sunday-law petition, etc., and now petitions are being signed. But the Liberals of Vineland are also working distributing tracts and soliciting signatures for the preservation of our national Constitution in its present wise and civilizing form. All that can be done here to fight a Sunday law will be done. I am sorry to say, however, that the precipitancy of the action taken by the churches found many people not informed on this momentous subject, and a large number are to-day regretting the hasty impulse of signing upon a first invitation. How I wish these first petitions could be made unlawful, so as to giv the populace, now it has had a chance to think, the happy liberty of signing again.

It seems to me it would be more in accord with nature, the natural demands of the human organism, if the two Houses would enforce a night law for the rest of the weary who are commonly kept awake by the howlings of protracted revival meetings, etc. Night law, say I, in preference to the Sunday law, which robs man of activ employments when a blessed sun is shining, and all the sleep-restored energies are responsiv and eager for another twelve hours' tournament with life.

M. E. C. FARWELL.

Vineland, N. J., Jan. 27, 1889.

Canada.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your issue of February 2d contains an editorial which much disturbs my most delightful dream.

For years I hav looked forward with unspeakable joy to that glorious and happy hour when my nativ land shall be added to this great union of states, and never was I inspired with so much hope as when I read General Butler's essay entitled, "Defenseless Canada," in which that great diplomat and statesman showed unquestionably that all British territory north of us "must come to us sooner or later, peaceably if possible but forcibly if we must." No man with such a profound love for the great American republic has more deplored the fact that he was ushered into this world under the rule of a monarchy that lies beyond the "briny deep" than has the writer. And I will furnish ample reasons for entertaining such a belief.

I first saw the light about one and three-quarters miles from the Maine line in the province of New Brunswick.

I was taught to love and also to be ever ready, when old enough, to defend the United States—the loved land of my mother's birth—whose dear old flag was grander to her than all other things of earth.

My paternal parent was not a citizen of the United States when I was born, and of course that made me an alien. I remember, when a child, a visit that I made to my Yankee cousins in Maine. I soon got acquainted with the American children, but as soon as they found out that I was a nativ of New Brunswick they had little use for me. Said they: "You are a pretty good fellow, but you are a foreigner." Oh, but methinks I hear some person say: "Those were children, and their talk childish!" But listen. It was only last winter when the gay and fashionable young American gentlemen with whom I associated were organizing the well-known society called the Patriotic Order of Sons of America. I should hav known by the very name of the order that they excluded all persons not born within the domain of the United States. But it seems I did not, for I applied for membership, with my initiation fees in my pocket, only to be told that they had heard I was a Canadian by birth; that prior to hearing this they thought the world of me, but now they would advise me to go hunt up a Kanuck society.

But I hav seized my pen for the purpose of setting aright our kind and obliging Editor, who never fails to publish the honest opinions and conscientious thoughts of those who contribute to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Our good Editor says: "We do not want Canada. So far as our pen can reach we shall write against the annexation scheme." And after describing the scene in the Parliament House about Cardinal Taschereau growing indignant because the members failed to erect a little throne for that aristocratic, domineering despot, the Editor says farther on: "They are given over to religion and rum, to horse-trading and wife-beating."

Why, sir, if you object to annexation because of the reasons you hav given, it would be consistent if you should object to the union of all the states. Let me, my dear sir, tell you a few things that I know about the Catholic church in the United States. Some years ago in the state of New York there lived a priest to whom it occurred that he ought to build a church, and his parishioners being poor, it devolved upon him to invent some scheme by which he could raise the amount of money needed to complete his edifice of superstition. Well, this is what he did to obtain part of it. He had one thousand cards made, each about two inches wide by four inches long. Then he got an engraver to cut the picture of the proposed church, which was placed on the top of each card, and below were printed these words:

> Whoever contributes twenty-five cents for the above purpose will be entitled to two masses per week, one hundred and four for one year. [Signed] J. J. L., Pastor.

Then these cards were sent to lady acquaintances of the priest who were then living in Montana, and are yet, I think. Well, these women were asked to sell these pieces of paper and send the money to the priest, which they did. I remember meeting the devoted ladies with their "holy cards." How does this compare with the Canadian cardinal's freaks? Again, let me tell another true story. About two months ago I had the good fortune to entertain a guest from Oregon. His name is Joel J. Parker. He is a distant relativ of the immortal Theodore, and this is one of his stories: "About five years ago I was in Arkansas. One Sunday I went to church just for pastime. When it came to preaching, the minister selected a text from the Old Testament. It was on slavery, or, as the Bible calls it, bondmen. The sermon amounted to this: That slavery is just, for the Lord approves of it and commands it. And the preacher perspired freely, for he gesticulated violently, so enthusiastic was he to show that slavery was a holy and commendable thing." Well, how does this compare with the velvet-lined high seat that the cranky Taschereau gave a hint to the members to prepare for him?

Now, in regard to religion and rum and crime in general, do you think, really, that the French Canadians can compare with the Catholic Irish who yearly come to our shores in such vast numbers? I tell you, sir, that the French Canadians—the hospitable, good-natured kind that I hav met in the West, at least—are as different from the Hibernian Catholics as day is from night. No, I beseech you, Mr. Editor, not to use your influence against that for which I am living, and if it was not for the bright star of hope that hovers so brilliantly over my head since the efforts to popularize the scheme on the part of General Butler, and General Butterworth, of Ohio, life to me would be a far more galling load than it now is. And again, I believe there is much in Mr. Parton's opinion that we should not trouble ourselvs about the opinions of others.

What is the mission of Freethought? To endeavor to extricate the minds of men, women, and children from the thraldom of bigotry and priestcraft. Can this be accomplished by denying to 4,300,000 people the pure and priceless prerogativ of becoming Americans?

And is it a fact that the Catholics are liable to get the control of the public schools and the legislatures? I think not. But, if they should get in the majority in the future state of Quebec, can they make laws to conflict with the Constitution? And is it not reasonable, in view of the vast progress that Freethought is making, to suppose—in fact, to believe—that after annexation it will not take many generations before the bigoted people will die out by amalgamation with the energetic Liberal American? Do you not know that if the Dominion had belonged to this Union for the last ten years the former would to-day hav millions more of people than she now has?

In enumerating the advantages of annexation, you mention the fact that "it would settle the fishery question, abolish the custom houses, and do away with the necessity of the Retaliation bill. Then 'Alastor' and C. Watts would be countrymen of ours, and Secular Thought would be an able American journal." And we should also hav the great gold-bearing country called the Youkon, which I understand lies in the northwestern part of the Dominion. It is a vast mineral belt of enormous wealth. The Oregonian, one of the leading dailies in the West, is responsible for the statement that it would pay the United States to acquire Canada, if for no other purpose than to become the possessor of that rich mineral-bearing section, which is left almost untouched on account of the few moneyed men in the Dominion, who could not think of investing their money in a country whose public debt amounts to $300,000,000, with a population of only 4,300,000.

Now in relation to the immigration question. Be it known that it is against the nature of the governing classes of these United States to use their influence against the restriction of foreign immigration. I mean the people that come from Europe. Consider how very difficult was the task of passing the bill for the restriction of Chinese coming to our shores, then you can realize how next to impossible it will be to stop Europeans from coming to our domain.

Now, how shall we make room for these millions of people? Millions of acres of the territory lying north of us are the finest wheat-raising land under the sun; and yet that vast section lies idle because of the unpopularity of the Canadian government and the fact that she is connected with Great Britain.

In conclusion I would say that we can never Liberalize the inhabitants of Christendom by being il-Liberal, which we should be if we kept back any country that was longing to join us.

There must be over a million of Canadians in these United States, every one of whom is enthusiastic for annexation; and all their friends at home sympathize with them. And of course it would not be Liberal in us to help deprive millions of people of the happiness that would result from joining us. Now, I should like well to get the valuable opinions of that great and good man whom I love more than all others of earth, Colonel Ingersoll. I know that his great, loving nature would not permit him to look with disfavor upon the scheme. G. MACAULAY.

What Are We to Believe?

"It seems to be a great source of pleasure to some persons to believe a great deal that may not be true," and allow me to add that many disbelieve much that may be true simply because they do not understand it. The article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 8th, headed "Why Deny?" was written to show those positiv people that it is possible there may be things they do not know, or, at least, cannot explain, and was not written to prove or disprove the existence of deity, as such proof has never been satisfactory to everyone; yet the author of "Why Believe?" seems to know all about it, and perhaps I should hav asked his opinion before writing the article. If so, please excuse. I undertook to say that I could not see how a being of personality could be omnipresent, disproving the Bible idea of God, but my good brother calls me ignorant (which I confess), classes me as a credulous Christian, thinks I hav weak back (I had my back broken once by a positiv saying too suddenly he "knew there was no God"), because I did not say positivly that which cannot be proved.

I, for one, hav learned not to think everyone a fool because he does not think and talk just as I do, for he may hav as good reason for believing as he does as I hav for my belief. Brother Haskell, you greatly err when you think the problem of creation has been properly solved to the satisfaction of all, for many are yet in the meshes of doubt. Your mind may be settled, but everyone is not as easily satisfied as you seem to be.

You say "there is absolutely nothing that anyone should believe without evidence." Wrong again, for we should be a very unhappy people did we not believe much that we hav no evidence for. Christopher Columbus undoubtedly believed there was land toward the setting sun, or he would never hav dared his trip across the Atlantic to discover it. Thomas Paine believed in a God (perhaps only one little one), and probably had what he thought was evidence, for unfortunately you were not born in time to tell him differently. There is none of our so-called sciences true and perfect in all particulars (except mathematics as far as understood), and we may yet learn that there are unknown forces that you may yet know. You scoff at the idea of our senses being our instructors, and say it's our reason, and that it takes brains to understand and explain things. (O that I could hav what brains you hav to spare!) Reason is not an actor in any sense, but the act of the mind in weighing evidence "pro and con," as gleaned from our senses and other sources of information. The brain is simply the storehouse of knowledge and the center of our nervous system, and could never hear a sound were it not for the organs of hearing, much less being the evidence itself. But I am aware I am walking on ticklish ground, and will leave the subject for my professio-philosophico-mathematical author of "Why Believe?" As to the real existence of a deity, I do not care to spend my time to discuss it, as probably no two hav exactly the same idea of a God, and it is as easy for me to comprehend the one plan of creation as the other, viz., that the world has always been, as that God created it out of nothing. Either is beyond a brainless man's power to understand, and I will leave it for Brother Haskell to tell us all about it, as he seems to know everything and its pedigree. A. D. SWAN.

The Church as a Promoter of Morals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Being a constant reader of your valuable journal, I would fain contribute a few ideas to the great mass of honest thought so palatably served up in your regular weekly issues.

How strange the delusion into which the great masses in this land of wondrous opportunities hav fallen! We hav thousands of people in our midst who believe the church is the only promoter and safeguard of public morals, and that without its elevating influence men would soon deteriorate to the level of a savage.

With your permission, I will write a series of short articles illustrativ of the True Nature of Church Influence, from its primitiv state up to the present day.

We often hear the Christian clergy boasting of the goodness and purity of the primitiv church and primitiv Christians. As the apostle Paul was the organizer of the primitiv Christian church, it is presumed that he knew more about the goodness and purity of the early Christians than anyone else. In his letter to the church at Corinth he makes some revelations as to the moral standing of the early brethren that are truly refreshing. In the sixth chapter and fifth verse he says: "I speak to your shame. There is not a wise man among you; no, not one! Brother goeth to law with brethren, and that, too, before unbelievers." In the eighth verse: "Nay, ye do wrong and defraud your brother." In the third chapter and third verse he sets forth the moral standing of the brethren in the following language: "For ye are yet carnal. For, whereas, there is among you envyings, strife, and divisions." In the sixth chapter he declares that the church contained within its sacred pale thieves, adulterers, fornicators, and extortioners, who, however, had been washed and justified in the name of Jesus. In the fifth chapter he declared that it was commonly reported that there was fornication in the church, and such as was not so much as named among the gentiles.

According to this pedigree given to the early Christians by St. Paul, how edifying to contemplate their many excellences! But why blame them for their depravity, when they believed themselvs justified by Christ's righteousness instead of their own?

Planetary Motion.

In reply to D. L. B., in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 2d, let me say that if a planet were attached to a string, and were moving with sufficient rapidity, and if the string did not break or burn off, the planet would revolve in a perfect circle. Now suppose the string should break while it is moving in the circular orbit, the form of the orbit would depend entirely upon the velocity of its motion. If the velocity were such that the centrifugal force exactly equaled the sun's attraction, the orbit would continue circular. If the velocity were greater, the orbit would be elliptical, that point being the perihelion of the new orbit. If the velocity were checked, so as to be less, the orbit would still be elliptical, but that point would be the aphelion of the new orbit. So starting from a motion which may be called for convenience an "original impulse," the orbit depends upon the velocity of the motion as well as upon its direction. But why the motion from which we thus start was greater or less, or in one direction rather than in another, astronomers hav not yet satisfactorily ascertained. We do not know whether the orbit was first circular and became elliptical from a change in its velocity or in the direction of its motion, from the attraction of other bodies, or not. The only reasons we can giv are reasons why the orbits are elliptical now and hav been for many ages. Thus much we do know; but what occurred many ages before that, we do not know. HENRY M. PARKHURST.

The Tides.

Mr. George H. Dawes seems to hav got foundered in his "Tidal Waves." The attractiv force of the sun is only about four-tenths that of the moon, instead of one hundred and twenty times greater, as he estimates it.

The tide on the side of the earth farthest from the moon is caused by the centrifugal force of the revolution of the earth and moon about their common center, which is situated within the earth about three-quarters of the way from the center to its circumference.

This explanation of the tide on the side of the earth farthest from the moon is quite recent. It was vaguely hinted at by Andrew Jackson Davis in a mesmeric state, and his abortiv attempt to explain it will be found in "Nature's Divine Revelations," published in 1847. But a satisfactory elucidation of it appears in Newcomb's "Popular Astronomy," third edition, 1879, which also explains the cause of the high tide in the Bay of Fundy. BURR.

Reflectiv and Intuitiv Thoughts.

Any person who has made observations on the state and progress of the human mind, by observing his own, cannot but hav observed that there are two distinct classes of what are called thoughts—those that we produce in ourselvs by reflection and the act of thinking, and those that bolt into the mind of their own accord. I hav always made it a rule to treat these voluntary visitors with civility, taking care to examin, as well as I was able, if they were worth entertaining; and it is from them I hav acquired almost all the knowledge that I hav.—Thomas Paine, in Age of Reason, Part I.

A Western Religious Editor's Methods of Work.

From his annex editorial rooms on Robbers' Row, Hungryjohnson, the ostensible editor of Bowne's Democrat, leaving his game of pedro and setting down his gin, announces that his next week "Sunday School Lesson" will be from words in Mark viii.

One Influence.

From Life.

Many Christian people regard with alarmed wonder the spread of Infidelity in the land, and the defection of young people from the religion of their fathers, without being able to comprehend that any reasons exist for a decadence of popular belief in divine institutions. Of course the progressiv spirit of the age is primarily responsible for the decline of faith, but there are other influences for which Christian people are responsible themselvs, that assist to bring about the results that alarm them. For instance, there has been disporting himself, under the patronage of leading clergymen in several churches of this city, a blasphemous young acrobat by the name of Harrison, who has been conducting what he calls "revival services," for and in consideration of the sum of one hundred dollars per week and his expenses. The performances at these "revival services" are of a nature to disgust every intelligent person, and arouse the contempt of all who scorn a hypocrit. Religion may be morality touched with emotion, but it is hard to make the non-believer accept a religion that consists of asininity touched with finance.

ON Sunday evening, March 17, 1889, Robert W. Hume, of New York, will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, of Philadelphia, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets. Subject: "A Glance at the Incoming of a New Civilization." The Liberal public are cordially invited.

A Coming War.

The religious strife in Canada is drawing away from the bitter and vituperativ stage—which is the usual plane upon which Christian sectaries liv—and is approaching the open warfare phase. The Jesuits of Montreal hav entered action against the Toronto Mail for $50,000 damages for libel. The special complaint of the plaintiffs is that the Mail published what it alleged to be the oath taken by all Jesuits, in which the pope only is acknowledged as their spiritual and temporal head, and they renounce all allegiance to any heretical king, prince, or state named Protestant, and that in all things Catholic the end justifies the means.

The cause of the trouble just now is the award of $400,000 to the Roman Catholic institutions as payment for estates confiscated years ago. Indignation is further excited by the law that the government cannot divide the money without the consent of the pope, thus acknowledging the latter's supremacy to the civil power. As a sop to the Protestants, $160,000 was offered them, but they prefer to go without it rather than see the Romanists get the $400,000. The publicity given this division of spoils has brought out the fact that the Vatican is the real ruler of Canada East, and the Protestants are angry clear through. Hence the attacks upon the Jesuits of the Toronto Mail.

In reply to the war which the suit foreshadows, the Episcopal Bishop Usher, of Montreal, writes to the Mail that war is inevitable. "I say to the Protestants," he exhorts, "put forth your power to prevent war, civil war, for come it will." To a correspondent of an American paper he spoke equally plainly. "I desire," he said, "to see all hav what I would desire to hav for myself, the fullest religious liberty to worship as conscience dictates, but in the province of Quebec the church of Rome is practically the state church. It rules the province, and rules it to its injury, as seen in the dwarfed city of Quebec, where Rome has undisputed sway. The aim of Rome is to make it the state church of the Dominion. That the aim will be frustrated we all foresee; but there is a vast difference in opinions as to the way this will be done, and for the welfare of Canada let it be remembered that the easiest is the best way, and that ballots are better than bullets. Let every Protestant use them with effect. Let the Dominion Parliament be dissolved and the country be appealed to on the Jesuit bill. That defeated, Rome may take a hint and gracefully back down to her legitimate position. If not, war will come."

No doubt the Jesuits will retort with just as much acrimony, the fight in the courts will breed still more religious hatred, riots may follow, and finally war come. Then England, as a civilized nation and the owner of Canada, will hav to interfere to prevent these children of God and brethren in Christ from cutting each other's throats. It has always been so when the two sects were left alone together.

The prevention of all these religious fights is so simple, the means are so just, the results so gratifying, that it surprises us that all men do not see and recognize them. The formula is: Let every sect subsist by voluntary contributions of its sectaries. The state should never vote a dollar in any way, shape, or manner to any religion. Then, the bone of contention being removed, the dogs could lie down peacefully in the same kennel of superstition.

Our Brethren of California.

The Freethinkers and the German organizations and the Seventh Day Adventists of California hav won a victory over the orthodox hosts on the Sunday bill. The American Sentinel of the 13th inst. says:

"The Sunday bill which was introduced into both houses of the California legislature met an ignominious death in the senate, where it was refused a second reading. This will leave California free from any danger of a Sunday law for two years more, as it is not at all probable that another bill would fare any better. Meanwhile the Sunday law agitators may agitate themselvs to their heart's content."

This shows what effect the glorious climate of California has upon legislators when reinforced by the people. For months the churches hav been striving to obtain a Sunday law which, as printed in Freethought, would compare favorably with some Connecticut legislation of the seventh century. The measure has been fought with great energy by the Freethinkers of the state, by meetings and distribution of documents. Their state convention made the bill a direct object of attack, and S. P. Putnam has since been lecturing in Stockton and Sacramento, the capital, to large audiences. His object was to affect the legislature. He was assisted at Stockton by Schunemann-Pott, who addressed the Germans in their own language. At Sacramento the lectures had a decided influence on the public. The Seventh Day Adventists hav, by means of the Sentinel and anti-Sabbatarian tracts, coöperated most effectually. Though numbering only about twenty-five thousand in the whole country, they are wide-awake, zealous, and ably led in resisting legislation which encroaches on their own peculiar belief.

We notice that Mr. Crafts, the secretary of the American Sabbath Union, is viciously activ in support of a national Sunday law. He reports that when he addressed the Florida legislature he received a very cordial welcome. Why cannot the secretary of the American Secular Union be provided with funds and opportunity of addressing the various state legislatures on national issues? This work is of the utmost importance. It won't do to go to sleep and let the enemy lock their shackles on our limbs. Especially should some good speaker be on hand at the constitutional conventions of the new states of Washington, Montana, and the two Dakotas, though perhaps South Dakota's organic law will answer, if not amended by the churches.

Three cheers for the workers of California—the English and German heretics and the Adventists! Here's to them! here's with them! here's congratulations! and a tiger!

The Art Museum and Its Secretary.

The Sun of this city published last week a statement of facts very damaging indeed to the activ manager of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and rather severely reflecting upon John Taylor Johnston's policy of Sunday closing, a policy which he said must be maintained because of the expense of departing therefrom.

When Sunday opening of the Museums was first called for, Mr. Johnston and Mr. Cesnola said it would cost more money than the museums possessed. Mr. W. T. Walters, of Baltimore, then sent to Mr. Johnston a check for $10,000 and desired that it should be applied to defraying the expenses of keeping the museum open on Sundays. The check was returned. Week before last a daily paper of this city brought the fact to the notice of the public, as of recent occurrence, and quoted it to show how fallacious were the arguments adduced by those of the trustees who are opposed to opening the museum on Sundays. This led Mr. Walters to call attention to the fact that the offer was not recent, but had been made several years ago, and that it still remained in force and was not limited to $10,000, as several persons were aware.

A reporter of the Star then called upon Mr. Cesnola, and obtained an interview upon the subject of the check. In this interview Mr. Cesnola denied the whole transaction. The Sun now says that "Mr. Cesnola knew Mr. Walters made the offer at the time that Mr. Johnston received the check, and consequently did not utter a falsehood by inadvertence." That is, Mr. Cesnola told a deliberate falsehood to the Star reporter about this fund. In this matter we believe the Sun, as we hav had some experience of the inability of Mr. Cesnola to remember important affairs. A petition of twelve thousand persons is not so small an object that it can be presented to a man not inordinately large, nor occupying a position not quite so prominent as the president of the Union, and be at once forgotten and lost; but this is what Mr. Cesnola assured the secretary of the American Secular Union had happened to the petition of the Germans asking for Sunday opening. A man who could forget the reception of twelve thousand names asking for certain action could easily forget the receipt of ten thousand dollars when they were to be applied to making the action possible.

The hypocrisy of the expense objection to Sunday is made still more glaringly apparent by the Sun. That paper proclaims that it is to-day "able to pledge for the purpose of defraying that expense three distinct contributions which aggregate $30,000." But the Sun will urge its friends to withold these and all other contributions until the charter of the museum is amended. Mr. Cesnola told the Star reporter that there were many reasons why the museum should be closed on Sundays:

"Chief among these is that within the next five years we expect to receive works of art valued at from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000, which we believe we would not receive if the museum was thrown open on Sunday. See? Sunday opening will come in due course of time, but any effort to force us will only postpone the opening. The museum is a private corporation, and it fulfils every duty it has contracted for with the city.

"Our charter specifically provides that it is not obligatory for us to keep the museum open on Sunday. The exact language of the charter is as follows:

"'That the exhibition halls of said building shall on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday of each week, and on all legal or public holidays, except Sundays, be kept open and accessible to the public, free of charge, from ten o'clock A.M. until half an hour before sunset, under such rules and regulations as the party of the second part (the museum) shall from time to time prescribe; but on the remaining days of the week the same shall be only open for exhibition to such persons and upon such terms as the said party of the second part shall from time to time direct.'

"There is nothing to prevent us from taking all our pictures and works of art from the museum and putting them in a storehouse if we so desire. A clause was inserted in the charter to cover this in case of any friction. It reads:

"'That the said party of the second part (the museum) may, at any time after the expiration of three and before the expiration of nine months from the date of the service of a notice in writing . . . quit and surrender the said premises and remove all its property therefrom.'

"From all of this you can see that it is not compulsory on us to open on Sunday. My personal opinion is that the museum will be opened on Sundays within the next year or two, but if an endeavor is made to compel us to throw it open now it will only result in postponing that event to a later time."

Two facts in the foregoing, says the Sun, require immediate attention. "First in importance is the nature of the charter and the power it givs to trustees who confessedly will not scruple to use that power. If compelled to open on Sunday, they may legally remove the gifts and acquisitions of the museum to a place of storage, and they threaten that they will do this. The second point concerns those persons who are about to make bequests of the value of from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000 to the museum provided it is kept closed on Sunday. Mr. Cesnola says explicitly that it is proposed to keep it closed in deference to their scruples until they shall hav made over their gifts, and then it will promptly be opened."

The second point, however, the Sun does not press, as it is "only too probable" that the statement that there are persons about to make heavy bequests "is untrue." The proposed treatment of such persons is certainly dishonorable in the extreme. Gifts should not be accepted under conditions as to exhibition, but if accepted should be returned when the conditions are violated. The Sun is entirely right in saying that "if there are any persons contemplating endowments, they want better security for the honest and capable administration of the museum than its present management affords." "And," adds the indignant editor, "we ourselvs are made aware of a most important gift to the museum that will not now be made until this cloud is dispelled." It is evident that the Sun has no confidence whatever in Mr. Cesnola, as it says, judging by his own explanation of the relations between the museum, its patrons, and the public, the management "is incapable, ignorant, and dishonest, and it is fortified by a dangerous privilege. There can be no confidence reposed in it or its purpose while Mr. Cesnola remains secretary, and there can be no belief that he will not defeat its purposes. He has been a blot upon the institution since his first appearance here with his doctored and fictitious antiquities, and the sooner the museum is rid of him the better."

This is strong language, but, perhaps, no stronger than the case warrants, though we believe that in blundering and selfishness John Taylor Johnston, the ex-president, and William C. Prime, now president, are at least as culpable as Mr. Cesnola. For unless the latter spoke falsely, he was, three years ago, personally in favor of Sunday opening, and Johnston, then president, and Prime, then vice-president, were the backbone of the opposition.

What this museum has lost through the stupid Sabbatarian notions of these gentlemen, the city which supports the institution does not know. Thirty thousand dollars and an important art gift we know of through the Sun. But it is more than probable that these are only a small portion compared to what it might receive were it in a condition to attract the attention and receive the confidence of wealthy philanthropists and art gatherers. A public museum can never be successful as private property, managed by a little ring of incompetents, though they may be sharp enough to make the public pay for their fad. But now that the people hav found them out, they can rest assured that they will not much longer be allowed to use millions of the people's money to house and care for a museum which is the private property of a few old gentlemen, some of them more or less estimable, and some not at all so. This exposure by the Sun is, we believe, the beginning of the end.

The German Contingent.

It is exceedingly pleasant and encouraging to note the interest the German social societies and German papers are taking in fighting ecclesiastical encroachments upon American liberty, and their disposition to join forces with the American Secular Union.

In Milwaukee the Liberals and the Germans hav for a long while been more or less working together in the Personal Liberty League, but it is only recently that the German social organizations hav voted on Liberal issues. Among the papers the Freidenker, of course, takes the lead, and as it is the organ of thousands of Germans its work is most effectiv. In Chicago and other Illinois towns the various vereins hav been vigorously opposing Mr. Blair's bill. Secretary Stevens has spoken before several of the societies, and one week received invitations to speak at three such meetings in one day. He could only speak at two. At the recent Freethought convention in San Francisco, the Turners of the Pacific coast sent a committee to assure the Liberals of their coöperation and willingness to become an auxiliary Union to the national Freethought organization. At Stockton, the week after the convention, the local verein and the Stockton Liberal League joined forces and held a large meeting to protest against the passage of Sunday laws. Schunemann-Pott spoke in German and S. P. Putnam in English, and the Stockton Express reported the meeting fully, giving both speakers great credit for their efforts.

These things are indeed encouraging, for the Germans will make noble allies, and there are thousands of them. In some cities they hold the balance of political power. Of course their methods are different from American methods, but their votes are identical, and the final settlement of the church claims will be by ballot—freemen on one side, tyrants on the other. There are only three kinds of Germans—Lutherans, Catholics, Freethinkers. The Lutherans are few, mostly in cities. The Catholics are the agricultural class who hav enabled the priests to obtain so strong a hold in Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. The great body of intelligent Germans —artisans and merchants—are Freethinkers. They pooh-pooh Christianity as a superstition they hav long since outgrown, and the chief censure to be passed upon them is that they are too indifferent to take any means to resist the legal encroachments of the church. That they are now waking up is a healthy sign, and they will also find that it is necessary for them to act if they wish to preserve the liberties they hav hitherto been enjoying as a matter of course. They hav found that this is not the free country they imagined, and cannot be so long as the church is in power.

It is not probable that the vereins will join the Union en masse, for habits and language will still form a barrier to as close personal association as is desirable, but it is sufficient that they are with us in the war, and that they will be found voting on the right side. Their scholars hav done an infinit deal in their own country to upset and break down theology, and in elucidating the science of evolution no one has surpassed Haeckel and his fellow-workers. It is eminently fitting, therefore, that those who hav left the mother country should join the Freethinkers here in perpetuating the liberty given America by her heretical forefathers. Here's a welcome to them all!

A Flat Earth.

Mr. James H. Wilson, of Augusta, Wis., has asked this question:

"Will you please tell me where in the Bible I can find where the earth is flat and stands on four pillars? I hav read it and forgot to make a note of it, and I send my TRUTH SEEKERS off to do missionary work, so cannot refer to them."

Mr. Wilson's custom of sending his papers out on missionary visits is a commendable one. The paper cannot get a too large circulation, and if some new subscribers proceed from his efforts we are sure he will not regret it.

The texts supporting the theory of a flat earth are many. In fact, until the fifteenth century all the Christians thought the earth to be flat. They "imagined the earth to lie upon a flat, and that the heavens rested upon its extremities." From St. Augustine to Luther this erroneous notion was held by the church. They rejected the germ-ideas, as Professor White calls them, of the pagans as to the rotundity of the earth, and denounced and damned everybody who held the pestilent notion. They went so far as to deny salvation to any believer in the theory. In the fourteenth century Cecco d'Ascoli was burnt alive for holding the heretical view that the antipodes do exist. Cosmas in the sixth century formulated the doctrin held by the church, which was that the earth is a parallelogram, flat, and surrounded by four great seas. At the outer edge of these seas rise immense walls, closing in the whole structure. These walls support the vault of the heavens, whose edges are cemented to the walls. The sun and stars were moved by angels. At night the sun, according to Cosmas, was pushed behind a great mountain. Some of the commentators, however, held that it was dropped into a great pit, to be pulled out in the morning.

The texts to support this theory of the church, are scattered all through the Bible: Genesis i, 6, 7; vii, 11; Exodus xx, 4; Job ix, 6; xxvi, 7, 10, 11; xxxviii, 4–6; Psalms xxiv, 2; cxxxvi, 6; cxlviii, 4; Isaiah xl, 22, and 2 Peter iii, 5. It is Job who talks about the pillars.

The church has made a great many mistakes in science, but those in regard to the shape and motion of the earth are perhaps as gigantic as any.

Changing Officers.

The change of the political parties at the nation's capital, and swearing in of some new Senators, hav set the more restless of the members of the Republican party to thinking of changing offices all around.

The Senate is Republican now, as it was before the expiration of the Fiftieth Congress, and the chaplain is a Republican, as well as a Lutheran, but denomination seems to count more than party, and the ministers of the other churches are casting sheep's eyes toward his position. The new Senate will be asked to oust Dr. Butler and let somebody else hav a chance. The preachers hav already begun their lobbying.

The present chaplain is said to be quite popular because he makes his prayers short, and judging by their attendance the senators employ him only for form's sake. It would be as well if they cared as much to be honest in using the people's money and to uphold the Constitution as they do to placate the church.

ANY of our friends having copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 23d and March 2d that they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to this office.

MR. CHARLES WATTS has been holding a four-session discussion with Clark Braden at Salt Lake City. The Salt Lake Times of February 28th says: "The debate finished last night, but Braden was finished the first evening." Naturally. Braden is no debater (though some say he is in order to enhance the value of their inevitable victory over him), and has the weaker side. Mr. Watts is a first-class debater, and has the truth with him. In his paper Mr. Watts is going to explain why he met Braden. We await the statement with curiosity.

A MANUFACTURER whose goods and trade-mark were being counterfeited to his serious loss employed a detectiv to catch the culprit. He was found in a Canadian town, and is described as "a prominent politician and Sunday-school and church worker." Who says religion has no connection with morality?

THE Popular Science Monthly will next month print the article by Professor Huxley which is concluded in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The Monthly is a little behind the procession, but as it reaches other readers than this enterprising journal, it will do much good by its reprint.

THE way of the converted Catholic is not smooth in Catskill, N. Y. The members of the abandoned sect conceive that they hav, somehow, the right to say what a man's religion shall be, and with the spirit of tyranny so common to Christians, they make life unpleasant for the apostate. About a year ago Joseph Reilly left the Roman Catholic church and united with the Methodists. Since then he has been boycotted, threatened, insulted, and derided; and now the Catholics hav borrowed the title of White Caps and sent him this cheerful note:

"JOSEPH REILLY: This is to let you know that we are well aware that you didn't heed our notice that we sent you three weeks ago.

"Now we will giv you another chance to mend your ways. The plain way to tell you is this: the faith of your father is good enough for you, or ought to be good enough for you. Now, you damned apostate, if you continue going amongst them damnable Methodists, disgracing your wife and your people, you will in the near future be taking tea with the devil, for we will blow your brains out of you. There never was known in Catskill any Irishman that done what you hav done. You know that every time that you go to these so-called prayer-meetings you crucify again the son of God and make a mockery of him. Now you hav your choice to stop this sort of conduct; if not, leave the town in forty-eight hours, or mark the consequences from your friends."

Mr. Reilly has, of course, the sympathy of the Protestants, and as they possess political influence, the matter will be brought before the grand jury.

THE letter of our London correspondent tells us of the death of Tom Mead, "full of years and honor." Mr. Mead visited this country twice with Irving's company, and many Americans will therefore hear this news with deep regret. At his first visit he was, if we recollect aright, nearly seventy years old, but no one would credit him with so many years by looking at him. Between his first and second trips he was knocked down in a London street, near his home, and on the second visit here showed the effects of the cruel blows received about the head. But he still stepped nimbly, his voice was sound, his mind vigorous, and when Irving was sick and unable to appear on the stage, he took that great actor's part with such perfection that the audience never knew of the substitution, and indeed applauded extraordinarily heartily, as though Irving were excelling himself. Mr. Mead was a warm personal friend of Mr. Watts, as of all prominent English Atheists. He had little patience with the new name of Agnostic. New Yorkers will recollect his splendid elocution on the occasion of a Liberal Club festival, and readers of our ANNUAL of 1885 hav been entertained by his recollections of an English general election fifty years before. The one ambition of his later life, he said, was to meet Colonel Ingersoll, and it was gratified on his last trip here. He and the Colonel discussed Shakspere and poetry till about twelve o'clock, and though they did not agree on very many points, Mr. Mead said afterward that it was the event of his life. His admiration of Colonel Ingersoll was genuin and profound. In his death a truly noble man has gone, and all who knew him will share with us a pang at parting.

DURING the month of February we mentioned with gratitude in our Thanksgiving service the names of Mr. J. D. Steves, for seventeen new subscribers sent us while he was rustling through the West; Mr. J. R. McIntyre, Greensboro, Pa., for four; Messrs. S. F. Haselton, Bristol, Wis., and M. J. Draper, Prairie City, Iowa, for three each; Messrs. H. W. Williams, Buena Vista, Cal., D. W. Isenhart, Montpelier, O., Edwin N. Beecher, Marion, Ct., C. G. Austin, Rochester, N. Y., C. B. Reynolds, North Parma, N. Y., for two each, and Messrs. D. L. Styles, Dexter, Minn., H. E. Burnham, Saginaw, Mich., J. H. Barber, Big Creek, N. Y., C. Bauman, Carbon, Ind., W. S. Wood, Kalamazoo, Mich., N. R. Howard, Boulder, Col., W. L. Johnson, Highlands, N. C., B. R. Hopkins, McKeesport, Pa., Dr. H. Patrick, Concordia, Kan., G. S. Croft, Austin, Nev., Wm. Morey, Milford, Mass., W. Baxter, Urbana, Ore., R. Stine, Washington, D. C., J. Pennington, Twin Bridges, Mont., and A. Sorenson, N. Lake, Wis., for one each. Others desirous of sharing in the benefits derived from the services aforesaid know how to do it. We cannot guarantee that those sending new subscribers will go to heaven, but we will guarantee that they won't go to the other place. At any rate, they will hav the satisfaction of knowing that they hav done good in this world in giving pleasure and profit to those they induce to subscribe and by helping sustain the laborers—not unworthy, we hope—in a good cause.

BUTLER, PA., Jan. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Through the columns of your valuable paper I desire to inform our Liberal correspondents that the editor of the Pittsburgh Penny Press has opened up his heart, and also a column in the above-named paper, for the discussion of all subjects, and as a great deal of soft solder in favor of superstition has appeared in his paper, I would like to see some of our Liberal correspondents represent our cause in the Press. J. O. FULLERTON.

DES MOINES, IA., Feb. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The presidential election threw me off my reckonings somewhat. I wish the folks would let the hens alone. Let Powderly work the hens, and he will make them lay if the pope is egg-hungry. If a squirrel is on the side of a tree and you with a gun after him, and he just keeps out of bullet's reach, you following in a circle round and round the tree, and the squirrel all the time keeping the same distance from you, do you go around that squirrel? Let the hens rest and go for the squirrel, boys. Well, I send inclosed $7.75—$5 to be credited to A. M. Foster. Giv me credit for $2.50, and send me the ANNUAL; and oblige a Christian, or a couple of them. CAPT. T. J. KENNEDY.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Feb. 3, 289.

MR. EDITOR: The petition against the Blair bill is being circulated at Salina with good results, and to tell the truth, I hav had something to do with it myself. And to my great surprise, there are lots of men and women who, after knowing me for two years past, and that, too, in a business way, believe that such as I need a law passed to keep us from injuring their God, just as though he were not able to take care of himself. And they are about right; he certainly will get left if there are not some human laws to protect him.

I want to offer a substitute for the Blair bill: Art. 2. That there be a law passed to teach the Christians, if possible, common sense. Art. 3. Be it enacted that no person is a competent juror who is not ready and willing at all times to hear all sides of all questions. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

HARRINGTON, CAN., Feb. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot get you a new subscriber in this priest-ridden section, but one thing I can do—renew my own subscription. Inclosed find money order for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER another year. I hav taken it for eight years, and it is now a settled conviction in my own mind that I shall hav to keep renewing every year so long as I liv. I am the only outspoken Infidel around here, and require THE TRUTH SEEKER to help me defend myself. No church dues nor pew rents to settle, which is quite annoying to the dear minister and his dupes. True, they all treat me with respect, and consider it very unfortunate that a man honorable to deal with and generous when charity is a duty does not belong to the church. One prominent member, a lady, told me quite lately, if I would only join the church, I should soon become a leader in church matters. My reply was, I felt infinitly above being such.

As you are my teacher, one thing I ask. There was a verse in one of the back numbers purporting, I think, to be a Methodist hymn. I quoted it as such, and it was denied. If it is to be found in any of the Christian hymn-books, please direct. The verses ran thus:

> How blest must be the ransomed soul's
> When they in glory dwell,
> To see the wicked as he rolls
> In quenchless flames of hell.

PETER STEWART.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Feb. 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am surprised, worse than that, I am utterly dumfounded, to find in your issue of January 26th a letter from a Liberal young lady trying to block the wheels of progress by keeping young America in the old style of spelling.

Some men don't know anything, some are idiotic, and some are hopeless damphools. It is my private opinion that Webster and Worcester had the three diseases all at once, and had them bad. Else they would hav kicked the letters c and q entirely out of the alphabet, making all words take k or s where c hard and soft are now used. They would hav let g hav its present hard sound and given its soft sound to j. The present use of the letter c is the most abominably outrageous of anything I can conceive.

Beautifully and truly does Miss Collier say that rude language and incorrect spelling are unpardonable—and I am astonished that a person using such fine language as she does in her letter can possibly fellowship our present barbarous spelling.

I hav two little cubs now trying to master the English speller—McGuffy's—and I do pity them from the very bottom of my boots up. Just fancy a child learning to spell "roulette!" By the way, I'd like to ask what possible use we hav for the letter "doubleyou." Let us spell "cow," see-oh-doubleyou—kou. Why not spell it see-oh-wheelbarrow—kou? Can anything be more inveterately barbarous? Nothing, except compelling our dear little ones to commit the outrageous barbarism to memory.

I do hope the time will soon come when some one of the states will adopt a United States alphabet by publishing a set of school-books under state direction, and furnish them to the schools of the state at net cost, or even free to introduce them. Then soon the other states would fall into line. Then we should talk United States, spell United States, and be a nation.

Children would learn to read and spell in one-tenth of the time they now do. Of course it would look odd to us old folks, but to the next generation it would look all right and be all right. There is so much capital interested in the present system that it would be folly for private enterprise to try to effect the change. A state could easily accomplish it.

I hav a large scrap-book filled with Heston's cartoons. I keep it on my center-table, and it attracts everyone that calls. Everyone that examins it, if only for an instant, gets either a blessing or a bomb. Long liv Heston.

When I came to Chattanooga five years ago it was all one's life was worth to proclaim one's self a Freethinker. Then it had a population of ten thousand. Now it has over forty thousand, and, I believe, a majority of Freethinkers—but, alas, unorganized. A man can affirm with his hands in his pockets or behind his back if he chooses. Life is very tolerable here now. We need a good lecturer and an organization.

There has been no snow here this winter, and the ground has not frozen over an inch or two in depth. Persons desiring a genial climate in a healthy country should not fail to visit east Tennessee.

Last spring I advertised for "a ghost—black or white, old or young, male or female, holy or unholy—correspondence solicited." I got no ghost or correspondence either. It is very strange that not one of the eighty thousand that get a living by the Ghost would giv me any consolation. I don't believe they hav a ghost, or ever had one.

L. L. GOODWIN.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Feb. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: This is rather cold weather outside the churches, and evidently the spirit of God is cold in the would-be revival of religion our Methodist neighbors and friends are trying their level best to conduct in the Methodist Episcopal church, which is, from all appearances, a decided failure. Possibly it would not be out of place to giv them a few pointers. In the first place, the members should not look like the last rose of summer, but look more like the first rose of spring—not melancholy when they don't feel that way, but cheerful and pleasant in deportment and speech. If they then would infuse a little life in their sermons, coupled with historical evidences and an occasional flight of rhetoric and eloquence, backed up by sweet singing, short but earnest and fervent prayers and testimonies, and hav good teasers to work a racket on the minds almost persuaded, all working hand and heart together, they might possibly reclaim some of their lost sheep and tender lambs who hav fallen from grace.

I will say, for my part, I can't accept all the teachings imputed to Christ, for he taught that those who cannot believe on him shall be damned (Mark xvi, 16). Oh, what infamy! Can a person be damned justly for not being able to believe anything that he or she cannot believe? He might just as well be damned for not being twenty feet high, or as strong as the Philadelphia giant. Nonsense! Christ also taught to take no thought for to-morrow. This, you see, if obeyed, would actually place us beneath the beasts of the field, and sweet and happy feathered children, birds of the air.

I hav often, in my boyhood, watched birds working away for three or four days building their nest in Mr. Dow's woods—not to sleep in, for they roosted on a limb every night—but the little bird was thinking of the eggs it was going to deposit in that nest, and we often stoned the little birds, just as boys hav often done before, I suppose, for mere devilment, getting their ears twisted afterward for their naughty behavior. Mr. Editor, I apprehend yon hav had experience in ear-twisting. Birds do not think, eh? Admitted. But would to gracious the Mohammedan, Buddhistic, Jewish, or Christian gawky—I mean the veritable, religion-struck gawky, not one of those hypocrits—would think half as much as the little birds (Matt. vi, 25, 34). Christ also taught us to hate our friends and relations and love our enemies. He did, didn't he? Yes, you know he did (Luke xiv, 27, 28). Christ said: "He that is not with me is against me" (Matt. xii, 30; Luke xi, 23). "And he that believeth not on me is my enemy; and my enemies that would not that I should reign over them, bring them hither and slay them before me." I say, most unjust, most damnable tyrant! A Nero, or the devil, if there be one, couldn't express himself worse than your Christ did. "I come to set a man at variance against his father." Kick him out. Don't let him fool about my son. "And the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law" (Matt. x, 35). Oh, horrors! What a terrible hot-house! I must refrain. I can't say I admire such cussedness, fiendishness, else I might write more showing up this bloody tyrant. I do wish you would refer me to just one good doctrin that was taught by Jesus Christ and that was not taught long ages before the time he is said to hav lived—by Confucius, Buddha, and others.

Please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC, for which please find inclosed twenty-five cents. Brother H. O. Burt, one of your old subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, also givs me twenty-five cents, and wants me to hav you send him the ALMANAC. R. R. JONES.

PITMAN GROVE, N. J., Feb. 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The "Letters from Friends" in THE TRUTH SEEKER are gratifying to me, and through them a great deal of that which is useful is to be gained. One learns with what degrees of success other Freethinkers meet in various portions of this great country of ours, and in them finds more or less to console him as he sees that others are subjected to the same persecutions and privations. It requires a stiff upper lip and a good supply of nerve to stand up even to-day and say, I am a follower of the just, honest, and honorable Robert G. Ingersoll. We hav lots of battles to fight and much to contend with, and the whole business has got to be done without prayer. Now, Mr. Editor, and fellow-readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we must work without ceasing. The great trouble with Liberals is this—they keep their light under a bushel. They are, some of them, almost afraid to let bystanders at the news-stands know that they buy the Liberal papers of the day, and quietly ask for their favorit, or say, "Hav you got my paper?" and slip it in their pockets before they could say Robert Elsmere. We must not fear to proselyte, as the church fanatics are at it all the time, and the way they press their claims is to a person of my disposition outrageously disgusting. Whenever the opportunity offers itself for the undersigned to get in his work, he does, with as much neatness as possible and all the dispatch at hand. It is my lot to ride on the railroad twice a day, and often my misfortune to be placed in front of, behind, or between a couple who take delight in parading their piety. Sometimes it happens that one of the pair takes exception to some of the other's assertions, and on some points expresses doubt. Now, my fellow-Liberal, there is a chance for you to do a little missionary work. Not then and there, but one thing you can do, and that is, fix that doubter's features in your mind and lay for him or her. If you are a man and the doubter is likewise, try and get into a conversation, which is not a difficult thing to do, since you meet twice a day on the train. Keep up this mode of warfare and in a very short time you will be surprised at the progress you are making. This can be done without giving offense. Only a few evenings ago, whilst riding on the train to Woodbury, a young fellow who is studying for the position of Bible-pounder commenced his work on a young lad seated with him. He got off a good bit of the old, old story (should read, stale, stale lie!), and the young lad tantalized him with questions, then apologized, sufficiently to convince me that the young lad was on the fence when it came to religion. Pretty soon the would-be Bible-pounder got off, and that gave me a chance to ventilate my views. I hopped on the young lad like a hen on a June bug. I told him since, according to that young man's account, all trouble of whatever nature emanated from the devil, and since God almighty was the supreme ruler of the universe, it would be a good idea to petition His Royal Upness to kill said devil. He said he would ask the Bible-pounder why it was that God did not kill the devil. I gave the young lad some good, sound arguments—something for him to think over. And whether he is or is not a Liberal by this time, I had the happy experience of pointing out to him a portion of the other side of the question. Liberals, I will giv you a good pointer. Purchase the "Bible Inquirer," by Jacobson, at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Keep that in your pocket all the time. If you make an assertion, that handy little book will save you heaps of trouble and often lead you to a grand victory. When I get into a controversy I instinctivly place my hand in my inside coat pocket. Parties ask, "What hav you there?" "Ah," I say, "my ready reckoner." It is small, but gets there the whole twenty-five cents' worth every time.

I started in to speak with Liberals about the new story that Mrs. Ward has just written. It is, "Robert Elsmere's Daughter," and it promises to be very good. It is just the thing needed in this good, great country of ours, and I hope every Liberal will make it a point to read it. It is published in the New York Family Story Paper, commencing in No 802.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Feb. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Secularism has just scored a great and, we believe, a lasting triumph in this city, far exceeding the expectation of its most sanguin adherents.

The quiet, dignified, and scholarly way in which it has been presented by Messrs. Underwood and Watts has inspired almost universal respect, and the impression that had hitherto prevailed among some classes that our representativ men were superficial and inclined to treat the important questions at issue in a flippant and undignified manner, has certainly been dissipated.

Many persons of education and refinement outside of our faith hav in the most earnest and cordial way spoken of these two worthy representativs of modern thought in very flattering terms.

Mr. Underwood gave four scientific lectures in the Opera House in January, which would hav been a brilliant success but for the parsimony of the proprietors in trying to economize on fuel at the expense of the comfort and health of the audience. The place was so uncomfortable that it was found necessary to adjourn to the federal court room, where the lectures hav since been given.

Mr. Watts followed with four lectures also, and from the first had large and enthusiastic audiences. He has a strong, pleasant voice, and his evident training for the stage has added a charm to his oratory that places him amongst the foremost in his profession. His language is lucid and logical, and he never fails in impressing his audience with his earnestness and candor. He is gentlemanly and dignified in his deportment, and always commands the respect of his auditors, although many may differ with him on the questions at issue.

Mr. Watts has just finished a four nights' debate with the notorious Clark Braden, which resulted in an overwhelming defeat of Braden and the church militant.

The religious element in this city did not seem to be acquainted with Clark Braden or his antecedents, neither were they willing to be enlightened by one not of their faith, but were determined to indorse him as their representativ. This they made one of the conditions of the debate.

Although Mr. Watts was ready to meet any respectable and honest opponent, he at first declined to hav anything to do with Braden on account of his previous history and conduct. After much solicitation upon our part, however, Mr. Watts consented to debate upon the express understanding, to be in writing, that he was discussing with the representativ of the Christians of this city, and that Braden would retract, also in writing, a false and malicious statement that he had two years ago caused to be printed and circulated about Mr. Watts.

Braden had in his plausible way related to the various ministers of the city how he had pulverized the anatomy of every Liberal lecturer in the field, that the scalp of Underwood was now hanging from his belt, that he had driven Putnam from the field, and that Ingersoll dare not meet him, and that time and opportunity were all that was needed to chain Charles Watts to his chariot wheels.

This was quite enough! he must need be a man sent of God to be able to wipe out Infidelity from amongst our people. The presiding ministers of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches sent our society a challenge for Mr. Watts to debate "Christianity vs. Secularism" with their champion. Arrangements being completed, the discussion commenced on February 19th, and lasted four nights. Each speaker had two speeches of thirty minutes every evening.

The first two evenings Braden affirmed, and used manuscript that surely must hav been written for some other proposition than the one under consideration, as many portions of it were irrelevant and not at all suited to the question under discussion.

It was evident throughout the debate that Braden was no match for his opponent, although some of the church-members seemed at first sanguin. This feeling, however, was of short duration.

One very noticeable feature in connection with the matter was the fact that while at a meeting of all the ministers of the orthodox churches in this city Braden was unanimously indorsed by that body, but few indorsed him by their presence after the first night.

A very good illustration of the estimation in which he is held by the church people here can be shown by referring to a lecture given by him in the church where the debate was held, the night following its close, on "The Fallacies of Infidelity." There were present twenty-two persons, including the writer.

The lecture was tame, consisting of the most exaggerated assertions regarding the character and teachings of Secularism and Secularists, and laudations of the great ability and wonderful attainments of Clark Braden.

We wish to state that the ministers who conducted the de- for Braden hav the thanks of our society for the spirit fairness and cordiality with which they conducted their part of the program. There was not the slightest ill-feeling exhibited, and everything went off in the most harmonious manner. They kindly offered us the choice of churches in which to debate, and the Methodist was accepted. Mr. Watts was congratulated by the ministers for the masterly way in which he presented his side. Good feelings prevailed, and we hav no doubt that beneficial results to Secularism will follow. Full houses greeted the disputants each night. and great interest was manifest throughout. M.

Cass City, Mich., Feb. 4, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I inclose with this a funeral address delivered at the grave of Mary A. Dew, my dear wife, on the 7th of November last at her home in Wood Lake, Neb. I send it to you for publication if it meets your approval, many friends having expressed a wish to see it published. The deceased was a stanch admirer of the grand old Truth Seeker, also of its founder. She used to say she could not keep house without it. She lived and died a Freethinker stanch and true, outspoken at all times, yet by her life commanding the respect of Christians as well as Infidels. William Dew.

My Friends: We owe to each other in this life constant obligation. The ties of friendship demand from each of us many duties. It devolves upon me, a friend of the deceased, and a frequent recipient of her kindness, to pay unto her this final tribute of my respect. To me it is a duty I cannot avoid and which I would not evade. I shall say but little, and speak nothing but the truth. To do less would be a great wrong to her, sleeping sweetly and at rest. In the midst of life we are in death. In a moment the hopes and aspirations of humanity are blasted. And yet the lesson it teaches is well for all of us. Life is an eventful drama. Its many adversities, allurements, and attractions are a warning to us that there are responsible duties enjoined upon us to perform. We should so conduct ourselvs that life meets the approval of our own conscience and fulfils the daily requirements as we are given the understanding to discharge them. Charity, the basis of religion, should cover with its flowery mantle the loved one called to a final account. Death, even when we are admonished, has its pangs and its doubts. But when with its sickle it cuts down the old and the young, it is well to remember that such is the inevitable destiny of all, and a penalty which must be paid. What shall I say to you in simple justice to the dead? I know that as she understood and believed them she faithfully performed in this life all of the obligations of wife and mother. True to her noble instincts, she never faltered or hesitated in sunshine or in storm when sacrifices were necessary to promote the family good. In broken health she surrendered her personal ease and comfort, and with one left almost alone, planted in your midst a new roof-tree for the children. Possessed of a strong will, which ill health never checked, her only wish was that before she crossed over to the other side the children should be so situated as to be enabled to acquire a comfortable and an honest living. To them she ever inculcated precepts of morality, urging upon them with tenacity to establish a good name and a spotless character.

Possessed of a kind nature, she yielded readily and imperceptibly to the most generous impulses. She fed the hungry and clothed the naked and sheltered the oppressed. She practiced the religion which bade her do unto others as we would they should do unto us. She practiced no guile; she lived and died for her family. She was sincere in all of her professions, and allowed to others full credit for their belief. The deceased was in many respects a peculiar character. She was an apologist for the frailties of others and not disposed hastily to credit statements injuriously affecting human character. She ignored self, if necessary, to contribute to suffering humanity. An alms-giver, her charity was not ostentatious. A recent bereavement only strengthened her desire to do equal and exact justice to those left behind, as she recently expressed it to me. In fits of despondency she had words of cheer for him who has so manfully struggled with her. Her idea was that the domestic hearthstone should be a haven of peace and that no disappointments in life should disturb its quiet. Thus she lived and died within its sacred precincts. She never doubted or faltered in her belief that all was well. She was not afraid to die, but ever regarded death as but a prelude to life eternal. Unfettered by human creeds, bound by no dogmas, no manacles of prejudice controled her actions. The human spirit took its flight on the wings of benevolence and charity. Under the weight of affliction she complained not but endured all unto the end with patient resignation. Gloomy forebodings of the future disturbed her not, but she died with an abiding confidence of a terminated suffering in a better world. Her last mission on earth was an errand of relief to the suffering sick. To all such she was always the good samaritan. Speaking ill of none, she excused rather than accused. She opposed cant, abhorred hypocrisy, and espoused right. She was slow to pass judgment upon others, and never sought the popular side until she ascertained the truth. She always declined to be a censor of others' conduct. As the ivy clings to the majestic oak, so the deceased adhered with a constant and an irresistible tenacity to these stricken ones. Her home was her church.

She worshiped at her family altar and communed with her husband and children. She was, in fact, a constant aid and attendant to him whose name she bears, never failing him in her delicate condition, and this must be a lasting solace to him in this hour of deep affliction. None excelled the departed in maternal tenderness. The springs of her love never ceased to flow. Daily visiting the grassy mound holding the remains of a loved one, she planted upon its surface evidences of her remembrance. This is but an additional laurel in her crown. Let these plants she nurtured and cared for blossom over her grave. This is her due. May her motherly devotion, her unselfish life, and her insatiable love be a constant incentiv to these mourners to imitate her daily example of loyalty to them, and may they cherish forever her sainted memory.

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my troubled days!
Whilst others mourn I miss thee,
Resting in an honored grave.

To the stricken husband and father I offer words of heartfelt sympathy. I know well that human language is inadequate to assuage his silent grief. This broken circle is but a natural result. Links from the chain of life are gradually severed and death comes to all. As the autumnal leaves fall to the ground, wither, and decay, so man and woman must yield to the inevitable decree of nature. Be watchful of the domestic tree as she watched it with a womanly tenderness. Watch and water with the dews of affection the nativ trunk. Other branches will be sundered. Remember to treasure all of them, even when in decay. Requiescat in pace!

This the wink of an eye, the draft of a breath,
From the morning of life to the evening of death;
From the gilded salon to the bier and the shroud.
Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

James W. Davis.

Des Moines, Ia., Feb. 1, 1889.

Mr. Editor: "The reliances of error must be shaken, or truth must remain silent." Having written on the topic of the Jesus Christ myth recently in The Truth Seeker, it is only because it is the cornerstone in the theological structure that I return to it, after a fuller and more careful investigation of its claims, fully believing that until the question is incontrovertibly settled the light of truth will beam with but a faint glow throughout the wide—but lessening—orthodox domain. "Robert Elsmere" is the mythical "John the Baptist," the pioneer, which is "going before" and stirring up the soil of fossilized bigotry and conservatism, preparing it for the sowing of the seed of Rationalism, which ere long will culminate in the ripened harvest of the sway of reason and truth, in all their divine and omnipotent supremacy. When the popular mind arrives at the pass of reading that "miracles never occurred" and that the resurrection is fable, it is at a point where it will naturally inquire, "If these fundamental principles of the Christian scheme are spurious and baseless, what else in that scheme is sure and steadfast, and can be accepted as reliable?"

Christianity was born, not in Palestine, but in Rome; not as Minerva, leaping from the brain of Jove in full armor, but by increments of dogma and doctrin, until, running through nearly sixteen centuries, it came forth full-fledged in the King James version of the New Testament. It came as the substitute of moribund, declining pagan religion; and here, in confirmation of this, it is well to pause and inquire, "If the name of Jesus Christ was the only passport to heaven, why was his advent delayed four thousand years, and humanity left without a savior?" Simply because not until that date, assuming the Mosaic record as a basis, was there a demand for such a being. Jesus Christ is a composit creation, made out of, first, the Christna of India, and doubtless embellished and "plumped" by investing him with the achievements of Apollonius of Tyana; while his first name is probably a Latinization of the cabalistic "I.H.S.," metamorphosed into Jesus. Hence Christianity was vamped out of the mythologies of India and Egypt. There is nothing original in it, not even the rite of baptism, which was in vogue among nations of the East hundreds of years before the apocryphal time of Christ.

A person who will read the New Testament with an eye to flaws and discrepancies will not need to go outside for evidence to invalidate the claim of its entire structure; not only as regards the verity of a Christ, but of the whole catalog of characters who figure as its prominent actors. "Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus;" if the parts are faulty, the whole must be so of necessity. The internal evidence of fraud in the New Testament is stamped upon its pages throughout. Beginning with the genealogy of Christ in Matt. i, we find twenty-six generations from David to Joseph, husband of Mary, while Luke givs forty-three, and no two names agree in their order. Matthew, again, has the flight of Joseph, his wife and child, into Egypt, while Luke states that Christ was circumcised eight days after his birth, and forty days afterward he was presented in the temple, and that when the legal ceremonies were performed he went with his parents to Nazareth. At his baptism by John, the "chestnut" protrudes a trifle "too steep" to render credulity a facil operation except to those whose deglutitionary powers, like young robins', are of such capacity that the size of the object opposes no hindrance; as witnessed in the white dove performance and the calling out of heaven, "This is my beloved son"—all of which, analyzed and sifted, means that Christ's putativ father, the "Holy Ghost," performed the dual feat of descending from heaven in the form of a dove and at the same time calling out of heaven announcing the sonship of the man Christ.

The most befitting and appropriate delineation of this trinity scheme is found in the story of the Dutchman who had been taking in a series of revival meetings, and who afterward applied to the officiating minister for admission to the church. "Me vants to jine your church, I does," was the introductory announcement of the new convert to saving grace. "Yes," responded the delighted shepherd, "that is very necessary in order to make your calling and election sure, but before admitting a member we wish to ascertain whether he is sound in the faith. Who made you?" "It bes Got," was the ready reply. "Yes, that is correct," responded the man in black cloth and white necktie; "who died to save you?" "It bes Got, too!" "Uc, uc! Christ, God's son." Then, with a puzzled air, "A-a-a-h! ish dot so? It vash der poy den! Me tinks all der time is vash der old man!" There is no joking when it is said the unsophisticated Hollander gave as clear and intelligent an exposition of the trinity and "atonement" muddle as the most astute doctor of divinity is capable of rendering. Cicero said that no two pagan priests could look each other in the face without laughing, in view of the hollow farce they daily played on the unthinking multitude, nor can I conceive it possible that modern ministers and priests can treat on the bugaboo of orthodox theology without indulging in a huge fit of laughter in their sleeves.

Instead of any Holy Ghost being his father, the Jesus Christ of the New Testament had as many fathers as Penelope had suitors; nearly all of the patristic writers of gospels, epistles, and ecclesiastical history contributing something to his ideal make-up, somewhat as all the gods lent a hand in forming Pandora, the first woman of Grecian mythology. And how perfect the endowment was in the matter of astronomical knowledge will be seen from Matt. v, 34, 35: "Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; nor by the earth, for it is his footstool." Were I a Heston I would regale the readers of The Truth Seeker with a visual delineation of this profound piece of cosmical verity; in defect of which, let the reader giv loose wing to imagination and attempt to conceive of the picture as an actual fact. Portray a huge anthropomorphic being seated on an ivory throne above the clouds, with legs depending from the airy perch and feet resting on the earth—revolving at the equator a thousand miles an hour—and forests, cities, and oceans knocked into splinters, and scooped up in tidal waves upon the land. Talk about the moon causing the tides, when here—to a reverent believer in "inspiration"—is a cause for this phenomenon so plain and palpable that an average Hottentot would take in the problem at a glance. But to attempt to treat this question with anything like interest or dignity, is about on a par with a savant discussing with a lot of cheesemongers the probabilities of the moo being composed of green cheese, with the breed of kine tha furnished the lac, the proportion of rennet to form the curd, and the kind of press used to extract whey. We take leave of it.

The Bible and theology are being weighed in the balance of reason, and when examined are found wanting. What next? Agnosticism and Materialism I regard with leniency and toleration, as implying a loyalty to conviction that will not tamely and blindly subscribe to the dicta of dogma and creed makers, as the infant imbibes from the bottle of the nurse; still, Agnosticism does not know but there may be hereafter. If there is, and this life has any relation to it, as a school of preparation, it is material that we know as far as possible what that relation is. Were the ante-natal state one of mental exercise, reasoning from analogy, there would doubtless be as much skepticism regarding any other existence, or the present one, as there is in this life any certainty of a future, spiritual existence. Paine postulates this problem in a manner the most rational, yet simple, that it is possible to conceive, when he says: "I trouble not myself about the manner of future existence. I content myself with believing, even to positiv conviction, that the power that gave me existence is able to continue it, in any form and manner he pleases, either with or without this body; and it appears more probable to me that I shall continue to exist hereafter, than that I should hav had existence as I now hav, before that existence began." This is the equivalent of saying, it is easier for a railroad engineer to continue the motion of a heavy train on an up-grade than it is to start it on the same grade while it is yet in a state of rest.

Whether it be correct to say that the human mind is prone to skepticism, or that that skepticism is the result of the inability of the mind to span the unknown, but probable and possible, is perhaps an open question and onc of not easy solution. Were I not a lifelong Spiritualist, I should perforce be an Agnostic or Materialist. I am too far along in the space of The Truth Seeker to discuss the pros and cons of this latter question, and will not now attempt it. I am often amused to see how affirmativ certain ones can be in the negativ of this question—but "it is all of a lifetime," and no one can be a Spiritualist by any process of vicarious absorption and assimilation of evidence, but all must travel the road singly, and if happily "converted," when they embark in the missionary business of evangelizing others to the faith, they will, in classical parlance, "know all about how it is themselvs." V. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Quiet Ways are Best.

Selected for the Corner by J. T. Reed.

What's the use of worrying,
Of hurrying
And skurrying,
Everybody flurrying
And breaking up their rest,
When everyone is teaching us,
Preaching and beseeching us
To settle down and end the fuss,
For quiet ways are best?
The rain that trickles down in showers
A blessing brings to thirsty flowers;
And gentle zephyrs gather up
Sweet fragrance from each brimming cup.
There's ruin in the tempest's path,
There's ruin in a voice of wrath,
And they alone are blest,
Who early learn to dominate
Themselvs, their violence abate,
And prove by their serene estate
That quiet ways are best.

Nothing's gained by worrying,
By hurrying
And skurrying;
With fretting and with flurrying
The temper's often lost;
And in pursuit of some small prize
We rush ahead and are not wise,
And find the unwonted exercise
A fearful price has cost.
'Tis better far to join the throng
That do their duty right along;
Reluctant they to raise a fuss,
Or make themselvs ridiculous;
Calm and serene in heart and nerve,
Their strength is always in reserve,
And nobly stands each test;
And every day and all about,
By scenes within and scenes without
We can discern, with ne'er a doubt,
That quiet ways are best.

A Chat With Young Truth Seekers.

Old age is drawing near, life is uncertain, and I thought, while the privilege is still spared to me, that I would like to giv a few words of counsel to the young readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Those who hav parents who are able to giv them a liberal education will, of course, be directed by them, and therefore need no advice from me. But even to those a good suggestion may not prove unprofitable.

I wish to address myself to those—far the larger class—whose advantages are limited, and to whom good words may be spoken which may prove useful at the critical time when they are starting out on life's journey. The character of this class and their success in life will depend in a great degree upon what they read and how they read.

There is scarcely a boy or girl in any neighborhood who cannot obtain books, which, if properly read, will build up for them a noble life. Indeed, the bent of the mind depends almost entirely upon what is read. It has been said that "reading makes the full man." This was eminently true in the case of Abraham Lincoln. His reading was his sole education. So much depends upon what is read and how it is read, that I wish to dwell at some length upon this point. I am not afraid to warrant distinction to any boy or girl who will pursue the right course in regard to what they read and how they read. Many believe that if they are to know a great deal they must read a great many books. This is a great mistake. A few books thoroughly studied are worth more than an undigested library. Books which are really worth reading are worth studying. It will be seen at once that if books are to be studied, only first-class books should be selected. As I hav laid so much stress on reading, I would like to giv you a few hints as to how you shall read.

To read understandingly, three books are necessary, viz., a dictionary, a cyclopedia, and an atlas. These books may be regarded as tools, or helps, or teachers.

In reading, pass no word the meaning of which you do not fully comprehend. Turn to your dictionary, and be sure you get the full meaning as it is used in the sentence.

When you read of a place, take your atlas and find where it is situated, and fix its location firmly in your mind. Then take your cyclopedia and read what is said about the place. The cyclopedia will also giv you sketches of the lives of eminent men whose names are mentioned, which should be read with the utmost care.

You may think it would take you a long time to read a book in this way, and so it would; but then think what you hav accomplished, what a step you hav taken, when you hav read a book in this way. Suppose it is a history of the United States. If you hav read as I hav directed, you hav learned the meaning of every word in the book. You will know the name of every city, where it is located, its commercial importance, etc. You will know the name of every river, how far it is navigable, where it rises and empties. You will know the name of every man who has figured in American history, when he was born, and what part he acted. You will probably know much about the government, how the laws are enacted, how its officers are chosen, their respectiv terms of office, and many other things which will prove useful in after life. Rigidly pursue this course with every book you read. Books which are not worth reading by the young in this way would better be thrown aside.

Every boy and girl can go through a history of the United States as I hav directed in one year, and then he or she will hav obtained more solid information than most people possess at middle age. Then think how this information will come in play in reading other books, and what an advantage it will prove to you all through after life.

In reading other books you will not hav to consult your dictionary nearly as often, because you will hav learned the meaning of most words. The same will be true in regard to the other "helps."

Then I would hav you remember how the knowledge of one fact or circumstance helps you to remember another. Facts and circumstances bear such a peculiar relation to each other that the mention of the one brings to the mind the other to which it is related.

For instance, you read that General Washington was commander-in-chief, and was engaged in many battles of the Revolution. The mention of his name will probably bring to your mind the battles in which he was engaged. So Charlestown will suggest the battle of Bunker Hill, and the battle of Bunker Hill will suggest the names of Generals Putnam, Warren, and Gage who were engaged in the battle. Thus you will see how the acquisition of one fact helps you to remember another.

Such little scraps of knowledge may seem insignificant in themselvs, but it should be borne in mind that the largest oak was produced from an acorn, and that grains of sand will make a mountain, and that while you are acquiring this information you are all the time training the mind for greater achievements.

Every boy and girl should strive to get a few useful books at least. While you are young, in selecting books, keep your mind on the good and the useful. When you are older, and the judgment matured, I am sure you will see the propriety of the course recommended. Such a course is within the reach of nearly all the young readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, even the poorest. And it will make you useful in the world, and giv you a fund of information which many with better opportunities might well be proud of.

I would hav you read the lives of Benjamin Franklin and Abraham Lincoln. You will then see how it is possible, by dint of perseverance, to rise, unaided, from poor, penniless boys to the highest stations among men.

Although reading is the great source of information, it is not the only one. In almost every neighborhood there are men and women who are proficient in some branch of knowledge. Try to engage them in conversation in regard to the study which they hav made a specialty. If they find out that you are really interested and trying to learn, they will take pleasure and even pride in giving you information. When you hear intelligent men and women in conversation, listen to what they say with the utmost attention. A great deal of useful information may be picked up in this way. Always endeavor to lead men and women to talk about what they best understand, then you always hav them at their best.

So you must learn to turn the knowledge which others hav acquired to your own advantage. You will be all the richer, while they will not be impoverished in the least.

Every day you are surrounded with teachers if your eyes and ears are only open. There are "sermons in stones and books in running brooks." Every hill and valley and stream has a lesson of instruction. Nature's great school is constantly open to you, in which the richest lessons may be learned. The way to obtain a store of knowledge is to keep constantly gathering. The largest rivers are made up from small streams.

In the morning of life accustom yourselvs to the improvement of all your spare moments. If you let the moments run to waste life will prove a failure, for life is made up of moments. Do not allow yourselvs to form careless habits. Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well. Be thorough in whatever you undertake. Habits formed in youth will be the glory or shame of old age. Bad habits are like dead weights, they grow the heavier the longer they are carried. Cultivate a courteous spirit. Above all, show a decent respect for old age. Be truthful and punctual. When you giv your word, let it be kept with the most scrupulous exactness. If you mean to fill the stations of noble men and women, you cannot begin to shape your course and character too early. Now is the time to begin.

I wish I could make you understand how much depends upon a right start in life. It is sad to think that a single misstep in the morning of life may cause a cloud to hang over you as long as you liv. Try to ascertain what occupation or calling in life will be best suited to your taste and condition. Many a man has made a failure in life by choosing some business repugnant to his nature, and for which he had no aptness. But where a business is suited to a man and a man to a business, it is ever a pleasure, and generally a success. In this matter good judgment and great caution should be used. Having decided upon your course, pursue it with unbending energy.

In all the transactions of life let reason be your pole-star. Remember that the laws of nature will never lead you astray. They are ever truthful, ever constant.

There is much more that I would like to say, but my article is already too long. If you follow the hints which I hav given, you will certainly make the world better by living in it. And it is the next thing to impossible to make the world better without being made better yourselvs.

JOHN PEOK.

Correspondence.

ARMSTRONG, IA., March 4, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My mother has been very sick for a month, and is getting better now. Our school was just out yesterday. I study reading, penmanship, arithmetic, and spelling. Papa has had a headache for two or three days. The weather has been very fine. We hav had only two storms this winter. I hav a two-year-old colt. She has a white spot on her forehead; her mane is a white color, and she has a white foot. She is very nearly as big as her mother.

ROBERT BURT.

BOULDER CREEK, CAL., Feb. 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines for the first time. I will be thirteen years old the 21st of next month. I liv miles from town. In the summer time there is a school here, and we hav about twenty-five scholars, most of them boys. I am living with my father and brother, and my sister is married and has a little boy named Earl. I guess I will close this time.

Your Liberal friend, DORA HAY.

P.S.—My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years, and likes it very much. I like the pictures. If some of the girls will correspond with me, I would like it.

D. H.

TILDEN, NEB., Feb. 12, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines to let you know how I am getting along. My school is very nearly out, and I hav not missed a day. This term I hav won two prizes; one at the close of each month, for not whispering. I got a writing-box and a lead pencil. I received a letter from Miss Lucy L. Churchill; she wanted me to take the agency for several articles, but I could not, because I liv in the country. There are no Liberals here at all, except my father. I am going to write to Miss Churchill, and send for one of her pictures.

Your true friend,
GEORGE WHITNEY.

MCMINNVILLE, ORE., Feb. 11, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, and I hav often thought that I would write to you, as I wish to know if the "Story Hour" of 1889 contains the same reading as former ones, as my papa got me one some years ago and I enjoyed it very much. Would be glad to hav another if it contains different stories. I am ten years old. This is my first letter to the Corner, so excuse mistakes.

Your little friend, LILLIE BALL.

[The reading matter of the "Story Hour" is the same as formerly. Some time, perhaps, the editor of the Corner may hav another book of stories for her friends and patrons.]

METAMORA, Feb. 14, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Three cheers for Satie and her list shown in the Corner. Heap up the cow money. I send Satie my ten cents. I cannot stand back when such noble work is going on; do not stop until you hav money enough to buy a better cow than he had before. During such times let us remember the words of D. M. Bennett, "Where man fails, God can't help." If man had failed, Mr. Casey would not hav lost his cow, for God would not hav foreclosed the mortgage. Again, if man fails now, Mr. Casey will not get another cow. God will not send him one, because he cannot make a six-year-old cow in a minute. I will be thirteen years old next month. Went to school steadily all winter. School will be out in three weeks. Would be glad to see this letter in print.

Your Liberal, CLARA V. BURG.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

One of the brightest of Elmira's little five-year-old girls was taught an appropriate verse to repeat in Sunday-school last Sunday. She had also recently learned a little nursery rhyme which had profoundly impressed her. In Sunday-school, when her teacher called upon her to giv her verse, little Miss Five-year-old forgot all about the hymn, and electrified the whole infant department by rising and solemnly repeating the following:

The owl and the eel and the warming-pan,
They went to call on the soapfat man.
The soapfat man was not within,
He had gone to ride on a rolling-pin,
So they all came back by way of the town,
And turned the meeting-house upside down.

A complaint came up from the kitchen the other day, where the writer's Small Girl was an unwelcome visitor, and she was called to account. "Mary tells me, Small Girl, that you were rude to her, and told her you had a better right here than she had." "Well," with the utmost sweetness, "havn't I?"

"How did you get along at school to-day, Tom?" asked the old man at the supper table. "Papa, our physiology says that conversation at meals should be of a pleasant character," replied Tommy. "Let's talk about the minstrels."

Teacher: "Now, children, I will giv you three words—boys, bees, and bears—and I want you to compose a sentence which will include all three words." Small boy: "I hav it." Teacher: "John McCarthy, you may giv us your sentence." John McCarthy: "Boys bees bare whin they go in swimmin'."

Fond mother (teaching her child the Bible lesson): "Yes, Gracie, had not Eve eaten the apple we would never hav known sin or suffering. Ah, me! It saddens me to think of it." Gracie (consolingly): "Well, never mind, mamma, if Eve hadn't eaten it some other lady would; so there, don't be sad."

There is a little boy residing not many miles from Boston who rather astonished his parents and a visitor at the house not many days ago. The child's teacher had announced the fact to her pupils that they were to hav a new graded school, and, scarcely able to retain the important information, the little fellow burst in upon his parents and their visitor with the announcement: "Oh, ma! We are goin' to hav a large, degraded school!"

FIELD-INGERSOLL

DISCUSSION.

FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

—o—

Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Dr. Field is one of the exceedingly few Christians who hav opposed Colonel Ingersoll kindly and courteously, and the Great Agnostic has used him accordingly. Dr. Field's arguments, however, are broken in pieces.

"The Principles of the Christian Religion."

AN ACT

Supplementary to an act entitled, "The Blair Sunday Law," and for the purpose of promoting "religious worship," sustaining the "principles of the Christian religion," cultivating Christian Morality, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representativs of the United States in Congress assembled, for the honor and glory of almighty God and his precious son Jesus Christ, at the suggestion and with the hearty concurrence of Rev. W. F. Crafts, Senators Blair, Hale, and Edmunds, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, his holiness the pope of Rome, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Reformed Presbyterians, the National Reform Association, and the blessed Hardshell Baptists.

SECTION 1. If any citizen of the United States shall be smitten on one cheek by anybody whomsoever, and shall not quietly and in godly manner turn the other cheek to be also smitten by the party aforesaid, such citizen shall be deemed guilty of a grievous offense against Christian Morality, and shall be punished by a fine not less than $100 nor more than $500 (to be paid into the treasury of the Holy Ecclesiastical Office), and by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the Holy Ecclesiastical Office aforesaid.

SEC. 2. If any man shall sue a good Christian at the law and take away his coat or his cow or his horse, and the Christian aforesaid shall not at once, and in meek and godly spirit, render also to the man aforesaid his cloak or his calf or his ass to go with the respectiv articles aforesaid, then the Christian aforesaid shall be tried and punished as set forth in Sec. 1 of this law, as an offender against one of the fundamental "principles of the Christian religion."

SEC. 3. If any man shall by force of arms (or boots) compel a Christian to "go a mile with him," on any road whatever, by a tie-pass or any other pass whatever, for good and lawful purpose or for any other purpose whatever, and the Christian aforesaid does not immediately and cheerfully "go twain with him," by the means and for the purposes expressed or unexpressed aforesaid, then the Christian aforesaid shall be apprehended, brought before the Holy Ecclesiastical Office, and punished as in Sec. 1 of this law, as one who utterly disregards one of the finest and most popular of Christian Graces.

SEC. 4. If any professing Christian, when brought before the Holy Ecclesiastical Office, cannot giv sound and convincing proofs that he "hates his father, mother, brother, sister, wife, children," as well as his mother-in-law, as taught by the holy Lord Jesus Christ, he shall be deemed guilty of a flagrant disregard of the command of Jesus Christ aforesaid, a violation of "Christian principles" and "Christian Morality," and shall be condemned to sit in the stocks for three days, be flogged with fifty lashes on the bare back by the truly Christian correctiv, the cat-o'-nine-tails, and to pay a fine of $500 to the Holy Ecclesiastical Office aforesaid.

SEC. 5. If any citizen of the United States shall assert or maintain the right of private judgment in interpreting the holy scriptures, or shall question the authority or decisions of the Holy Ecclesiastical Office, either in its penalties inflicted for crimes against "the principles of the Christian religion" or its interpretation of those "principles," or shall teach that there is any violation of the sciences to be found within the holy Bible, or any contradictions, or any lying, or any deception, or any whoremongering, or any butchering of men and debauching of women at the command of almighty God, or any anger, or jealousy, or revenge, or repentance, or mistakes of the aforesaid God to be found within the lids of the Most Holy Bible, then such citizen shall be punished by the Holy Ecclesiastical Office with a fine of $2,475, to be paid in lawful money to the Holy Office aforesaid, and shall be forever disfranchised from the exercise and enjoyment of any and all political rights.

SEC. 6. If any person whomsoever, male or female, old or young, shall, by speaking, writing, or gesture, attempt to throw discredit on the most holy power of the holy pope of Rome aforesaid, or his holy priests and prelates, to forgiv sins already committed, or to grant indulgences to commit any sin whatever (the necessary fee always to accompany the application for the privilege of committing sin), such person shall be adjudged by the Holy Ecclesiastical Office to be guilty of a most atrocious crime against the most holy "principles of the Christian religion" and against "Christian Morality," and shall be punished by being placed in the stocks and having the feet religiously roasted over a slow fire, and by a fine of $1,500, to be paid to the Holy Ecclesiastical Office aforesaid.

SEC. 7. If any person shall question the right of the parties mentioned in Section 1 of this law, to wit, Almighty God and his son Jesus Christ, the Rev. W. F. Crafts, Senators Blair, Hale, and Edmunds, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, his holiness the pope of Rome, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Reformed Presbyterians, the National Reform Association, and the blessed Hardshell Baptists, to determin just what "the principles of the Christian religion" are, or what shall constitute the Christian Graces and Christian Morality, such a person shall be deemed guilty of a sin against the Holy Ghost and shall be punished by any penalty which the Holy Ecclesiastical Office aforesaid shall see fit to inflict, not excepting death by torture to the culprit.

SEC. 8. If any person whomsoever shall sneer at, cast odium upon, or deny in any manner whatsoever the Infallibility of his holiness the pope of Rome aforesaid, or question his right to be the Temporal Ruler of the World, or discredit his divine successorship of the most holy St. Peter, or deny the power of Mary the mother of God to successfully intercede with almighty God aforesaid, to confer full kingly powers on his well-beloved son Jesus Christ aforesaid in all things relating to this earth, or deny that the aforesaid Christ can and does use the pope aforesaid as his Vicegerent on Earth, then such person shall be adjudged as guilty of outrageous sacrilege and shall be punished by the Holy Ecclesiastical Office aforesaid as follows: If a man, he shall be stretched upon the rack and hav his bones broken and dislocated; if a woman, she shall be stripped naked, hav her hands tied behind her, and shall thus be suspended by the hands till her feet are free from the floor, and shall hav her feet, while thus suspended, roasted to a crisp over a slow fire, in both cases their estate to be confiscated to the uses of the Holy Ecclesiastical Office aforesaid, and then shall be burnt at the stake. If the offender shall be a child, then it shall be the duty of the Holy Ecclesiastical Office, without discretion, to cast the miscreant at once into the den of wild and savage beasts, kept for that purpose, as a warning to all other children to respect and adore the attributes, offices, and infallibility of the most holy pope of Rome aforesaid.

SEC. 9. In all questions in controversy as to "the principles of the Christian religion," Christian Graces, and Christian Morality that may arise before the Holy Ecclesiastical Office, the Rev. W. F. Crafts, Senators Blair, Hale, and Edmunds, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Reformed Presbyterians, the Young Men's Christian Association, the National Reform Association, and the blessed Hardshell Baptists, all aforesaid, shall meekly submit their views and arguments before his holiness the pope, aforesaid, or his duly accredited cardinals, archbishops, priests, or prelates, and, in case they are at variance with the practices and traditions of the Holy Mother Church, they shall, with all due reverence for the pope and church aforesaid, waive and abandon their convictions in deference to those of the church aforesaid, under the pains and penalties of excommunication from all hope of eternal life, and absolute and unconditional expulsion from any and all future share in any acts or deliberations of the Holy Ecclesiastical Office aforesaid.

SEC. 10. An emergency existing in the shape of a rapid increase of scientific knowledge and an alarming tendency of the ungodly mind to investigate the laws of nature, to the manifest detriment of the welfare of the churches and "the principles of the Christian religion," and "Christian Graces and Morality" aforesaid, this act shall be operativ and take full and immediate effect from and after the date of its passage; and all other acts or parts of acts, and all clauses, sections, or parts of the Constitution of the United States at variance with any of the provisions of this law are hereby repealed, revoked, and forever annulled.

The foregoing law I hav carefully prepared to save the labor of the bigoted Senator Blair and his no less bigoted and blinded religious colleagues, to follow right on after the passage of his Sunday law and his amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Some such law as this is the logical and inevitable sequence of the present attempt to connect church and state, if it succeeds. The aim is to remand us to the ignorance and religious barbarism of the Dark Ages, and it is well for us to know just what that means. The above act will giv but a partial glance of the horrors in store for us, if the enlightened public opinion of this nation does not set its seal of condemnation on the insidious efforts now being made by religious fanaticism to undermine our form of government and giv us the horrors of an ecclesiastical despotism. I commend the law I hav prepared to the careful consideration of Senator Blair and all his misguided coadjutors. The logic of their efforts is to be found in the act I submit for their consideration.

Obituary.

DIED.—In Newark, Mich., on Nov. 10, 1888, of hemorrhage of the lungs, Mrs. Elizabeth Gabrion, wife of Isaac Gabrion, aged 48 years 6 months and 15 days.

Mrs. Gabrion was born in Rutland, N. Y., April 25, 1840, was married Feb. 9, 1864, and moved with her husband to St. Johns, Mich., March 11, 1864, then moved from Clinton county to Northstar, Mich., in March, 1872, and lived in Gratiot county until her death. She leaves an invalid husband and six children to mourn her loss. She was a kind, affectionate, and devoted wife and mother, and a good neighbor. She was loved and respected by all good, intelligent people who knew her. I hav been informed that some one has started a story that she was afraid to die, and that she said she was going to hell. It is not true. She had her reason till the last breath, and never did a mortal cross the dark river with more courage or less fear of death or the future than did this noble woman, and whoever started that story is a slanderer and a liar. She was an honest and conscientious Spiritualist, and was not afraid to speak her honest thoughts. She had the moral courage to be honest, and if those who started that story, and are so sure she is lost, were one-hundredth part as honest and truthful and good as she was, they would hav no reason to fear hell or an angry God. As Ingersoll said of his brother at his grave, I can say of my dear, departed wife: This brave and tender woman in every storm of life was oak and rock, but in sunshine she was vine and flower. She was the friend of all heroic souls; she had climbed the hights and left all superstitions far below, while on her forehead fell the golden dawning of a grander day. She added to the sum of human joy, and were everyone for whom she did some kind service to bring a blossom to her grave, she would sleep beneath a wilderness of flowers.

A Liberal Spiritualist lady conducted the funeral services, as requested by my wife. The following are the lines read at the grave:

Sweet rest at last.
At last the hands are folded
Upon a pulseless breast,
And a soul tired, of earth's great burden weary,
Hath found sweet rest.

Sweet rest at last.
A long and faithful worker
On life's broad, beaten road,
Reaching the confines of a life immortal,
Lays down her load.

Sweet rest at last.
No longer thorns are pressing
Upon a careworn brow,
But from the heavens a fadeless crown of blessing
Rests on it now.

Sweet rest at last.
No more earth's fretting discord
Distnrbs the holy calm,
But angel choirs chant to the listening spirit
Their peaceful psalm,

Sweet rest at last.
We clasp our hands in silence,
And only hope to be
Some time with those who enter at the portal,
And heaven to see.

Sweet rest at last—
Some time amid the realms of fadeless beauty,
Earth's toils and sorrows past,
Find with the dear ones who hav gone before us,
Sweet rest at last.

THOUGHTS ON SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS.

BY JOHN WILSON, M.A.

The object of the book, as expressed in the preface, is to giv a correct sketch of the main lines of modern thought in small compass, and in language simple enough to be easily understood. In other words, it is a condensation of more voluminous writers, and classification of their definitions of science, theology, and ethics, and a statement of what belongs to each. As a text-book to clear thinking and logical reasoning, and a guide in forming scientific conclusions, this book is invaluable. The Literary Guide ranks it as "one of the foremost works of the present century;" while the Freethinker, in "heartily recommending it" as "simple and lucid in style, correct in thought, and ample in information," declares that it "is just the thing to put in the hands of a plain man who desires the best ideas on evolution in relation to science and ethics in a moderate compass."

Third edition, carefully revised and enlarged.

Read the following extract from a letter by Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds:

"The 'Bible Inquirer' is better than a Concordance as a reference, to speedily find the teaching of the Bible, on any subject. It is a sledge-hammer in demolishing error, yet the most devout Bible-worshiper can find no cause of offense. Using no word of argument, it simply permits the Bible to destroy all faith in the Bible, by giving chapter and verse—word for word—showing its palpable absurdities and contradictions."

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

News of the Week.

JUDGE O'CONNOR, of San Jose, Cal., has endowed a chair in the American Catholic University.

THE Italian cabinet has been reorganized, Signor Crispi, the valiant Freethinker, fortunately continuing at its head.

REV. CHAS. SMITH, of Boston, committed suicide on the 9th.

RIVAL faith cure congregations are fighting in Jersey City, N. J.

HARVARD will probably reënact compulsory attendance at prayers.

THE captain of Montreal's Salvation Army has defaulted with $500.

THE Minnesota legislature has refused to submit a Prohibition amendment to the people.

Two bishops and forty priests hav left Paris with the American pilgrims for Palestine.

PEOPLE are flocking to new gold fields that hav been found near Ensenada in southern California.

CONTINUED investigations show more and more the wretchedly neglected state of our schools, especially in large cities.

REFUGEE boodlers in Canada are rumored to be collecting money to bribe the Canadian parliament to reject an extradition bill.

THE duke of Norfolk and the marquis of Ripon presided at a recent meeting in England protesting against the anti-papal action of Italy.

IT is suggested that a government bureau for the facilitation of the finding of situations by the unemployed, like the one at Paris, be established.

THE Kansas legislature celebrated the inauguration by rising at the hour when it took place and singing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

IN Waltham, Mass., on the 10th, a Catholic lady was buried without a church funeral because the burial work had been given to a Protestant undertaker.

SAYS the World: "This is going to be a very religious administration." Senator Aldrich says it "is going to be a good Presbyterian administration."

THE legislature of Columbia, S. A., has enacted that on each New Year's day a service of thanksgiving to God be held by the people in a form approved by the church.

CAPT. JOHN ERIOSSON, to whom the world is indebted for a long succession of valuable inventions in mechanics, especially in appliances for locomotion, has died, aged eighty-six.

A MAN named Abbott Harvey, probably crazy on religion, tried to drown himself recently at New York city because "the people at his church refused to offer special prayers or him."

THE North Carolina legislature is taking steps toward establishing an educational qualification. Unfortunately, the motiv is not zeal for education but desire to disfranchise negroes.

DR. MCGLYNN keeps up his attacks on parochial schools, saying that trusting churches with education of the people would be like trusting the care of sheep to a council of foxes or wolves.

THE cabinet are: secretary of state, James G. Blaine, of Maine; secretary of the treasury, William Windom, of Minnesota; secretary of war, Redfield Proctor, of Vermont; secretary of the navy, Benjamin F. Tracy, of New York; secretary of the interior, John W. Noble, of Missouri; postmaster-general, John Wanamaker, of Pennsylvania; secretary of agriculture, Jere. Rusk, of Wisconsin; attorney-general, W. H. H. Miller, of Indiana.

AN INSPIRED WAY OF GETTING RID OF TEMPTATION.

If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; . . . thou shalt surely kill him; thy hand shall be first upon him to put him to death.—Deut. xiii, 6-9.

LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION.

BY

Colonel ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
Hon. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, and
General STEWART L. WOODFORD.

PRICE, TEN CENTS PER COPY.

It should be extensivly circulated, as it teaches the doctrins of Liberalism on the most important subject of the world—the right to think and speak and write. The superiority of our doctrins on Liberty over the creeds of Catholicism and Protestantism was never better set forth, and must be manifest to any Christian who possesses the power to reason. Odds and Ends.

TEACHER: "Master Bronson, you may tell me one of the chief industries of the ancient Trojans." Master Bronson: "I don't know, ma'am, unless it was the laundry business."

"You won't go to heaven if you're such a naughty boy, Michael!" "Oh, well, one can't expect to go everywhere! I went to the circus yesterday, and to the pantomime the day before!"

PENNSYLVANIAN: "I suppose Maine will never vote for tariff reform, will it?" Maine man: "Wall, I dunno. Some of us who liv near the young-herring canneries is mighty anxious fer a heavy tariff on imported sardines."

TENTH avenue landlord: "And why is it that you havn't enongh money to pay your rent? You've been working steadily." Tipperary tenant: "Sure, sor, Oi've had to pay me conthribution to aid the evicted in Oirland!"

A PARIS paper wonders why the American press pays so much attention to the affairs of Ireland, and adds that the average daily has one hundred lines about Ireland to one about France. Wait till the British lion has France by the scruff of the pants as it has Ireland, and the French people will get their share of lines.

"I TRUST, Robert, when you grow up you will show yourself on the side of temperance and morality by voting the Prohibition ticket." "Oh, rats! Why, aunt, water's killed more folks 'n liquor ever thought of doing." "I am ashamed of you, Robert! Can you think of one instance in which water, judicially applied, has caused death?" "Well, what's the matter with the flood?"

"MY SOR," said the solemn passenger, tickling the young man's neck with his breath, "remember that integrity is the foundation of character and character is the vital principle of all moral life. I never see a life just crystallizing from youth into manhood's prime, like yours, that I do not feel impelled to impress these great truths upon the mind." "Excuse me," replied the young man, languidly, laying down his paper, "but—er—did you speak?"

"WHAT'S all this talk about preserving the 'anatomy' of the Samoan islands?" remarked a Congressman-elect to a member of the House foreign affairs committee. "So far as I can understand it," responded the able foreign affairs man, "it's saving the bones of what's left after the treaty powers hav treated themselvs to all they want." "Ah! I see now," rejoined the new member; "a sort of joint protectorate."

EMINENT statesman (walking up to reporter): "My face is familiar to you, I presume?" Reporter: "I hav certainly seen you somewhere, and yet I cannot exactly——" Eminent statesman: "There is no use in trying to keep anything from the watchful eye of a reporter. You recognize me, of course, as Congressman Blank?" Reporter: "Why, so it is! May I inquire, sir, the object of your visit to our locality?" Eminent statesman (with dignity): "You may say, sir, that I am traveling through here in a quiet way, and as far as possible avoiding publicity."

MODERN novelist (to stranger just arrived in Boston from Hayseedville): "I like your placid countenance, sir. What is your walk in life?" Stranger: "Me? I liv 'bout ten miles from Hayseedville, an' I raise chickens fer a living, with incubators." Modern novelist: "Ah, incubators! Methinks I scent a clue to a great American novel at last. Do all the chickens hatch?" Stranger: "No; some of 'em don't hatch, an' some of 'em what do hatch die." Modern novelist: "Die! Horrors! I fear the literary materials to be found on an incubator farm would be too exciting for modern taste."

MRS. SPRAGUE is a member in good standing of the first church (Presbyterian), and brings up her children in the way they should go. They hav all, upon reaching a suitable age, united with the church. While I was in there one day last week, making a friendly call, Fred, the youngest boy, came into the parlor in a very demoralized condition. He was covered with mud, and looked very much as if he had been the under dog in a fight. His elder sister, Alice, said, by way of an explanation of Fred's appearance, that he was going to join the church at the next communion Sunday, and there were three boys on that street he wanted to whip before then.

Gems of Thought.

IN the estimation of good orthodox Christians, I am a criminal, because I am trying to take from loving mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, husbands, wives, and lovers the consolations naturally arising from a belief in an eternity of grief and pain.—Ingersoll.

IT may be stated, I believe, as an invariable truth, that whenever a religion which rests in a great measure on a system of terrorism, and which paints in dark and forcible colors the misery of men and the power of evil spirits, is intensely realized, it will engender the belief in witchcraft or magic. . . . It is impossible to leave the history of witchcraft without reflecting how vast an amount of suffering has, in at least this respect, been removed by the progress of a Rationalistic civilization. . . . All these sufferings were the result of a single superstition, which the spirit of Rationalism has destroyed.—Lecky's History of Rationalism.

THE considerations I hav adduced in the first part of this chapter will be sufficient to show how injurious hav been the effects of the doctrin of exclusiv salvation. We hav still, however, one consequence to examin, before which all others fade into insignificance. I mean, of course, religious persecution. This, which is perhaps the most fearful of all the evils that men hav inflicted upon their fellows, is the direct practical result of the principles we hav hitherto considered in their speculativ aspect. If men believe with an intense and realizing faith that their own view of a disputed question is true beyond all possibility of mistake, if they further believe that those who adopt other views will be doomed by the almighty to an eternity of misery which, with the same moral disposition but with a different belief, they would hav escaped, these men will, sooner or later, persecute to the full extent of their power. —Ibid.

IF you approach them [books] they are not asleep; if investigating you interrogate them, they conceal nothing; if you mistake them, they never grumble; if you are ignorant, they cannot laugh at you.—De Burg.

THE Freethinkers of every community should combine to engage a teacher, or at least facilitate home instruction by collecting text-books of Secularism.—Professor Oswald in The Bible of Nature.

WE might consistently claim that all advance is due to the principle of unbelief. The progress of mankind depends on investigation of phenomena and diffusion of knowledge. Skepticism is necessary to secure this. Doubt is the father of knowledge. Liberty to examin is the idea of Freethought. The authority of a church or a Bible is fatal to this principle.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

GUARD with jealous attention the public liberty. Suspect everyone who approaches that jewel.—Patrick Henry.

THEOLOGY has an influence which, instead of sustaining and strengthening the ascendency of the moral code, cuts at its very root.—John Wilson, M.A., in Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

ACCORDING to Mr. Black, the man who does not believe in a supreme being acknowledges no standard of right and wrong in this world, and therefore can hav no theory of rewards and punishments in the next. Is it possible that only those who believe in the God who persecuted for opinion's sake hav any standard of right and wrong? Were the greatest men of all antiquity without this standard? In the eyes of intelligent men of Greece and Rome, were all deeds, whether good or evil, morally alike? Is it necessary to believe in the existence of an infinit intelligence before you can hav any standard of right and wrong? Is it possible that a being cannot be just or virtuous unless he believes in some being infinitly superior to himself? If this doctrin be true, how can God be just or virtuous? Does he believe in some being superior to himself? . . . In order to know the difference between right and wrong, you must believe in the right God—in the one who established slavery. . . . The idea of justice is not the child of superstition—it was not born of ignorance; neither was it nurtured by the passages in the Old Testament upholding slavery, wars of extermination, and religious persecution. Every human being necessarily has a standard of right and wrong; and where that standard has not been polluted by superstition, man abhors slavery, regards a war of extermination as murder, and looks upon religious persecution as a hideous crime. If there is a God, infinit in power and wisdom, above him, poised in eternal calm, is the figure of Justice. At the shrine of Justice the infinit God must bow, and in her impartial scales the actions even of infinity must be weighed. There is no world, no star, no heaven, no hell in which gratitude is not a virtue and where slavery is not a crime. According to the logic of this "reply," all good and evil become mixed and mingled—equally good and equally bad, unless we believe in the existence of the infallible God who ordered husbands to kill their wives.—Ingersoll.

THOSE SABBATH BELLS.

Notes and Clippings.

IT is reported that a bill making church property taxable has passed the Michigan legislature.

LENT has one good effect in this town. Our Catholic politicians are drinking soft drinks on account of the holy period.

THE missionaries recently captured by the nativs of Zanzibar hav been released on the payment of $3,000. This shows, says the irreverent World, that next to terrapin, missionary meat commands the highest price among edibles.

A SPEAKER before a farmers' institute in Massachusetts the other day argued that farming had more bright sides than any other business if the farmer only knew it. Unfortunately, the farmer didn't always know it. Then he used this illustration: "Do you hear that delightful music?" said a traveler to his comrade, as he heard the soft baying of a hound. "No," was the reply; "that devilish dog makes such a racket I can't hear anything."

THE Boston Herald thus slanders President Harrison, the idol of Brother Bowen, the Prohibitionist: "The crowd may hav thought that it was cold tea of which the president and vice-president partook on the reviewing stand to drive off the chill, because it was taken from teacups, but it was a good strong brand of toddy, with a rich flavor that was grateful to the nostrils of the shivering bystanders." Mr. Harrison will get a churching if he isn't careful.

THE Philadelphia Inquirer, in casting up the creeds of the occupants of the presidential throne, finds this result: "Seven Presbyterians, five Episcopalians, three non-classible, two Unitarians, two Methodists, one Dutch Reformed, and one Disciple." Why not be honest and put Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln down as Freethinkers? George Washington was a Deist, Thomas Jefferson a Materialist, and Abraham Lincoln a Freethinker, inclined on public occasions toward the faith of Washington.

THE assembly has adopted an amendment to the Central Park Museum bill under which that institution may be kept open on Sundays. The provision is a desirable one, says the Sun. The greater part of the people of the city are unable to visit the museum on the working days of the week, and these people, as well as others, contribute to the public fund from which it is supported. Its doors should be unbarred every day of the year, and this would not be in violation of the Fourth Commandment.

THE Palmer, Mass., Journal of a recent date says: An interesting and instructiv portrayal of an unsatisfied life was given at Boston last Sunday, in a lecture by George Chainey (formerly of San Francisco), from the text: "For there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Relating his religious experience, Mr. Chainey said he was first a Methodist minister, but becoming full of doubt he broadened his views and entered the Unitarian ministry. Soon he came to the point of Infidelity, and then went through Spiritualism, Theosophy, Rosicrucianism, hermetic philosophy, and esoteric culture, but the further he went in these lines the more unhappy he became, and his search for a new faith and peace brought him finally back to the good old way, and in his joyous relief he exclaimed, "I will go unto all the world and preach this gospel."

A FRENCH writer tells this story: A certain French Jew was anxious to fill some position under the government, for which he was well qualified, but was debarred in consequence of his creed. On bemoaning his fate to a friend, who was a Catholic, the friend said: "My dear fellow, why do you allow your religion to stand in the way of your advancement? Change it, change it at once." "Ah!" said the Jew, "I never thought of that. I certainly will." He did so, and the valuable post became his. Shortly after his promotion he was met by his Catholic friend, who had heard of his advancement, and after congratulating him upon it, said: "When I advised you to change your religion, I meant that you should change it for the only true religion, the Catholic. Now I hear that you hav turned Protestant." "To be sure," said the Jew; "I wanted to be as little of a Christian as possible."

THE Toronto Mail, although it is threatened with a $50,000 suit for libel, still keeps up its tremendous attacks upon the Jesuit order. It appears in no wise dismayed at the prospects of a law-suit, and in a long series of masterly articles tells the Canadian public its opinion of the society which it characterizes as the most gigantic engin in the world for the maintenance and consolidation of popery. It has shown by what process the Romish church reduces its members to a condition of blind instrumentality, and in how subtle a manner it contrives to gain influence in every class of society, and in every country in the world, acting like a leaven of spiritual corruption upon the mass of mankind. It has dilated upon the immorality of Jesuit casuistry—the iniquity of their code, to the utter abrogation of all laws whenever they may militate against the interests of the order. In fact, it has proved its case, and the liberty-loving Canadian is beginning to realize the fact that he is face to face with a dangerous foe.—Secular Thought.

THE Methodists are holding out their hands to the Catholics on the school question. The Nashville, Tenn., Christian Advocate (the Methodist official organs are all labeled Christian Advocate, as though that church were the only advocate of Christianity) says: "It is agreed among Christians that Christian education, distinctivly such, is a necessity. Secular schools do not and cannot meet all the needs of education in our country. This the Christian conscience and judgment universally affirm and maintain. It is generally agreed, also, that Christian education means denominational education. The Christianity that is not denominational in this country is hard to find, and when found does not amount to much. All the churches hav practically settled the question for themselvs that they will hav their own schools. Education is in this country universally recognized as a function of the Christian church. There will be no retrogression on this line. On the contrary, the conviction is deepening that the church must do more than it has ever done for Christian education. The more fully the subject is canvassed the more urgent does this necessity appear."

Humanity's Gain from Unbelief.

From the North American Review.

As an unbeliever, I ask leave to plead that humanity has been a real gainer from skepticism, and that the gradual and growing rejection of Christianity—like the rejection of the faiths which preceded it—has, in fact, added, and will add, to man's happiness and well-being. I maintain that, in physics, science is the outcome of skepticism, and that general progress is impossible without skepticism on matters of religion. I mean by religion, every form of belief which accepts or asserts the supernatural. I write as a Monist, and use the word "nature" as meaning all phenomena, every phenomenon, all that is necessary for the happening of any and every phenomenon. Every religion is constantly changing, and at any given time is the measure of the civilization attained by what Guizot described as the juste milieu of those who profess it. Each religion is slowly, but certainly, modified in its dogma and practice by the gradual development of the peoples amongst whom it is professed. Each discovery destroys in whole or part some theretofore cherished belief. No religion is suddenly rejected by any people; it is, rather, gradually outgrown. None see a religion die; dead religions are like dead languages and obsolete customs; the decay is long, and, like the glacier-march, is only perceptible to the careful watcher by comparisons extending over long periods. A superseded religion may often be traced in the festivals, ceremonies, and dogmas of the religion which has replaced it. Traces of obsolete religions may often be found in popular customs, in old wives' stories, and in children's tales.

It is necessary, in order that my plea should be understood, that I should explain what I mean by Christianity; and in the very attempt at this explanation there will, I think, be found strong illustration of the value of unbelief. Christianity in practice may be gathered from its more ancient forms represented by the Roman Catholic and the Greek churches, or from the various churches which hav grown up in the last few centuries. Each of these churches calls itself Christian. Some of them deny the right of the others to use the word Christian. Some Christian churches treat, or hav treated, other Christian churches as heretics or unbelievers. The Roman Catholics and the Protestants in Great Britain and Ireland hav, in turn, been terribly cruel one to the other, and the ferocious laws of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries enacted by the English Protestants against English and Irish Papists are a disgrace to civilization. These penal laws, enduring longest in Ireland, still bear fruit in much of the political mischief and agrarian crime of to-day. It is only the tolerant indifference of skepticism that has repealed, one after the other, most of the laws directed by the Established Christian church against papists and Dissenters, and also against Jews and heretics. Church-of-England clergymen hav in the past gone to great lengths in denouncing nonconformity; and even in the present day an effectiv sample of such denunciatory bigotry may be found in a sort of orthodox catechism written by the Rev. F. A. Grace, of Great Barling, Essex, the popularity of which is vouched for by the fact that it has gone through ten editions. This catechism for little children teaches that "dissent is a great sin," and that Dissenters "worship God according to their own evil and corrupt imaginations, and not according to his revealed will, and therefore their worship is idolatrous." Church-of-England Christians and dissenting Christians, when fraternizing amongst themselvs, often publicly draw the line at Unitarians, and positivly deny that these hav any sort of right to call themselvs Christians.

In the first half of the seventeenth century, Quakers were flogged and imprisoned in England as blasphemers, and the early Christian settlers in New England, escaping from the persecution of Old-World Christians, showed scant mercy to the followers of Fox and Penn. It is customary, in controversy, for those advocating the claims of Christianity to include all good done by men in nominally Christian countries, as if such good were the result of Christianity, while they contend that the evil which exists prevails in spite of Christianity. I shall try to make out that the ameliorating march of the last few centuries has been initiated by the heretics of each age, though I quite concede that the men and women denounced and persecuted as Infidels by the pious of one century are frequently classed as saints by the pious of a later generation.

What, then, is Christianity? As a system or scheme of doctrin, Christianity may, I submit, not unfairly be gathered from the Old and New Testaments. It is true that some Christians to-day desire to escape from submission to part, at any rate, of the Old Testament; but this very tendency seems to me to be part of the result of the beneficial heresy for which I am pleading. Man's humanity has revolted against Old Testament barbarism, and, therefore, he has attempted to dissociate the Old Testament from Christianity. Unless Old and New Testaments are accepted as God's revelation to man, Christianity has no higher claim than any other of the world's many religions—if no such claim can be made out for it apart from the Bible. And though it is quite true that some who deem themselvs Christians put the Old Testament completely in the background, this is, I allege, because they are outgrowing their Christianity. Without the doctrin of the atoning sacrifice of Jesus, Christianity, as a religion, is naught; but unless the story of Adam's fall is accepted, the redemption from the consequences of that fall cannot be believed. Both in Great Britain and in the United States the Old and New Testaments are forced on the people as part of Christianity, for it is blasphemy at common law to deny the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be of divine authority, and such denial is punishable with fine and imprisonment, or even worse. The rejection of Christianity intended throughout this paper is, therefore, the rejection of the Old and New Testaments as being of divine revelation. It is the rejection alike of the authorized teachings of the church of Rome and of the Church of England, as these may be found in the Bible; the creeds, the encyclicals, the prayer-book, the canons, and the homilies of either or both of these churches. It is the rejection of the Christianity of Luther, of Calvin, and of Wesley.

A ground frequently taken by Christian theologians is that the progress and civilization of the world are due to Christianity, and the discussion is complicated by the fact that many eminent servants of humanity hav been nominal Christians of one or other of the sects. My allegation will be that the special service rendered to human progress by these exceptional men has not been in consequence of their adhesion to Christianity, but in spite of it; and that the specific points of advantage to human kind hav been in ratio of their direct opposition to precise biblical enactments. Take one clear gain to humanity consequent on unbelief—i. e., the abolition of slavery in some countries, the abolition of the slave trade in most civilized countries, and the tendency to its total abolition. I am unaware of any religion in the world which in the past forbade slavery. The professors of Christianity for ages supported it; the Old Testament repeatedly sanctioned it by special laws; the New Testament has no repealing declaration. Though we are at the close of the nineteenth century of the Christian era, it is only during the past three-quarters of a century that the battle for freedom has been gradually won. It is scarcely a quarter of a century since the famous emancipation amendment was carried to the United States Constitution; and it is impossible for any well-informed Christian to deny that the abolition movement in North America was most steadily and bitterly opposed by the religious bodies in the various states. Henry Wilson, in his "Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America;" Samuel J. May, in his "Recollections of the Antislavery Conflict," and J. Greenleaf Whittier, in his poems, alike are witnesses that the Bible and pulpit, the church and its great influence, were used against abolition and in favor of the slave-owner. I know that Christians in the present day often declare that Christianity had a large share in bringing about the abolition of slavery, and this because men professing Christianity were abolitionists. I plead that those so called Christian abolitionists were men and women whose humanity—recognizing freedom for all—was, in this, in direct conflict with Christianity. It is not yet fifty years since the European Christian powers jointly agreed to abolish the slave trade. What of the effect of Christianity on these powers in the centuries which had preceded? The heretic Condorcet pleaded powerfully for freedom, whilst Christian France was still slaveholding. For many centuries Christian Spain and Christian Portugal held slaves. Porto Rico freedom is not of long date, and Cuban emancipation is even yet newer. It was a Christian king, Charles V., and a Christian friar, who founded in Spanish America the slave trade between the Old World and the New. For some eighteen hundred years almost all Christians kept slaves, bought slaves, sold slaves. bred slaves, stole slaves. Pious Bristol and godly Liverpool, less than one hundred years ago, openly grew rich on the traffic. During the ninth century Greek Christians sold slaves to the Saracens. In the eleventh century prostitutes were publicly sold in Rome as slaves, and the profit went to the church.

It is said that William Wilberforce was a Christian, but, at any rate, his Christianity was strongly diluted with unbelief. As an abolitionist, he did not believe Lev. xxv, 44–46; he must hav rejected Ex. xxi, 2–6; he could not hav accepted the many permissions and injunctions by the Bible deity to his chosen people to capture and hold slaves. In the House of Commons on Feb. 18, 1796, Wilberforce reminded that Christian assembly that Infidel and Anarchic France had given liberty to the Africans, whilst Christian and monarchic England was "obstinately continuing a system of cruelty and injustice." Wilberforce, whilst advocating the abolition of slavery, found the whole influence of the English court and the great weight of the Episcopal bench against him. George III., a most Christian king, regarded abolition theories with abhorrence, and the Christian House of Lords was utterly opposed to granting freedom to the slave. When Christian missionaries, some sixty-two years ago, preached to Demerara negroes under the rule of Christian England, they were treated by Christian judges, holding commission from Christian England, as criminals for so preaching. A Christian commissioned officer, member of the Established Church of England, signed the auction notices for the sale of slaves as late as the year 1824. In the evidence before a Christian court martial a missionary is charged with having tended to make the negroes dissatisfied with their condition as slaves, and with having promoted discontent and dissatisfaction amongst the slaves against their lawful masters. For this the Christian judges sentenced the Demerara abolitionist missionary to be hanged by the neck till he was dead. The judges belonged to the Established church; the missionary was a Methodist. In this the Church of England Christians in Demerara were no worse than Christians of other sects. Their Roman Catholic Christian brethren in St. Domingo fiercely attacked the Jesuits as criminals, because they treated the negroes as though they were men and women, in encouraging "two slaves to separate their interest and safety from that of the gang," whilst orthodox Christians let them couple promiscuously and breed for the benefit of the owners, like any other of their plantation cattle. In 1823 the Royal Gazette (Christian) of Demerara said: "We shall not suffer you to enlighten our slaves, who are by law our property, till you can demonstrate that, when they are made religious and knowing, they will continue to be our slaves."

When William Lloyd Garrison, the pure-minded and most earnest Abolitionist, delivered his first anti-slavery address in Boston, Massachusetts, the only building he could obtain in which to speak was the Infidel hall owned by Abner Kneeland, the "Infidel" editor of the Boston Investigator, who had been sent to jail for blasphemy. All the Christian sects had, in turn, refused Mr. Lloyd Garrison the use of the buildings they severally controled. Lloyd Garrison told me himself, how honored deacons of a Christian church joined in an actual attempt to hang him. When abolition was advocated in the United States in 1790, the representativ from South Carolina was able to plead that the Southern clergy "did not condemn either slavery or the slave trade," and Mr. Jackson, the representativ from Georgia, pleaded that "from Genesis to Revelation" the current was favorable to slavery. Elias Hicks, the brave Abolitionist Quaker, was denounced as an Atheist, and less than twenty years ago a Hicksite Quaker was expelled from one of the Southern American legislatures because of the reputed irreligion of these Abolitionist "Friends." When the Fugitiv-Slave Law was under discussion in North America, large numbers of clergymen, of nearly every denomination, were found ready to defend this infamous act. Samuel James May, the famous Abolitionist, was driven from the pulpit as irreligious, solely because of his attacks on slaveholding. Northern clergymen tried to induce "silver-tongued" Wendell Phillips to abandon his advocacy of abolition. Southern pulpits rang with praises for the murderous attack on Charles Sumner. The slayers of Elijah Lovejoy were highly reputed Christian men.

Guizot, notwithstanding that he tries to claim that the church exerted its influence to restrain slavery, says (European Civilization, vol. i, page 110:)

> It has often been repeated that the abolition of slavery among modern people is entirely due to Christians. That, I think, is saying too much. Slavery existed for a long period in the heart of Christian society, without its being particularly astonished or irritated. A multitude of causes, and a great development in other ideas and principles of civilization, were necessary for the abolition of this iniquity of all iniquities.

And my contention is that this "development in other ideas and principles of civilization" was long retarded by governments in which the Christian church was dominant. The men who advocated liberty were imprisoned, racked, and burnt, so long as the church was strong enough to be merciless. The Rev. Francis Minton, rector of Middlewich, in his recent earnest volume (Capital and Wages, page 19) on the struggles of labor, admits that "a few centuries ago slavery was acknowledged throughout Christendom to hav the divine sanction. . . . Neither the exact cause nor the precise time of the decline of the belief in the righteousness of slavery can be defined. It was, doubtless, due to a combination of causes, one probably being as indirect as the recognition of the greater economy of free labor. With the decline of the belief, the abolition of slavery took place." The institution of slavery was actually existent in Christian Scotland in the seventeenth century, where the white coal-workers and salt-workers of East Lothian were chattels, as were their negro brethren in the Southern states thirty years since, and "went to those who succeeded to the property of the works, and they could be sold, bartered, or pawned" (Perversion of Scotland, page 197). There is, says J. M. Robertson, "no trace that the Protestant clergy of Scotland ever raised a voice against the slavery which grew up before their eyes. And it was not until 1799, after republican and irreligious France had set the example, that it was legally abolished."

Take the further gain to humanity consequent on the unbelief, or rather disbelief, in witchcraft and wizardry. Apart from the brutality by Christians toward those suspected of witchcraft, the hindrance to scientific initiativ or experiment was incalculably great so long as belief in magic obtained. The inventions of the past two centuries, and especially those of this nineteenth century, might hav benefited mankind much earlier and much more largely but for the foolish belief in witchcraft and the shocking ferocity exhibited toward those suspected of necromancy. After quoting a large number of cases of trial and punishment for witchcraft from official records in Scotland, J. M. Robertson says: "The people seem to hav passed from cruelty to cruelty, precisely as they become more and more fanatical, more and more devoted to their church, till, after many generations, the slow spread of human science began to counteract the ravages of superstition, the clergy resisting reason and humanity to the last."

The Rev. Mr. Minton (Capital and Wages, pages 15, 16) concedes that it is "the advance of knowledge which has rendered the idea of satanic agency, through the medium of witchcraft, grotesquely ridiculous." He admits that "for more than fifteen hundred years the belief in witchcraft was universal in Christendom, and that "the public mind was saturated with the idea of satanic agency in the economy of nature." He adds: "If we ask why the world now rejects what was once so unquestionably believed, we can only reply that advancing knowledge has gradually undermined the belief."

In a letter recently sent to the Pall Mall Gazette against modern Spiritualism, Professor Huxley declares "that the older form of the same fundamental delusion—the belief in possession and in witchcraft—gave rise, in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, to persecutions by Christians of innocent men, women, and children, more extensiv, more cruel, and more murderous than any to which the Christians of the first three centuries were subjected by the authorities of pagan Rome." And Professor Huxley adds:

> No one deserves much blame for being deceived in these matters. We are all intellectually handicapped in youth by the incessant repetition of the stories about possession and witchcraft in both the Old and the New Testaments. The majority of us are taught nothing which will help us to observe accurately, and to interpret observations with due caution.

The English statute book under Elizabeth and under James was disfigured by enactments against witchcraft passed under pressure from the Christian churches, which acts hav only been repealed in consequence of the disbelief in the Christian precept, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." The statute 1 James I., c. 12, condemned to death "all persons invoking any evil spirits, or consulting, covenanting with, entertaining, employing, feeding, or rewarding any evil spirit," or generally practicing any "infernal arts." This was not repealed until the eighteenth century was far advanced. Edison's phonograph would, two hundred and eighty years ago, hav insured martyrdom for the inventor; the utilization of electric force to transmit messages around the world would hav been clearly the practice of an infernal art. At least, we may plead that unbelief has healed the bleeding feet of Science and made the road free for her upward march.

Is it not also fair to urge the gain to humanity which has been apparent in the wiser treatment of the insane consequent on the unbelief in the Christian doctrins that these unfortunates were either examples of demoniacal possession or of special visitation of deity? For centuries, under Christianity, mental disease was most ignorantly treated. Exorcism, shackles, and the whip were the penalties, rather than the curativs, for mental maladies. From the heretical departure of Pinel, at the close of the last century, to the position of Maudsley to-day, every step illustrates the march of unbelief. Take the gain to humanity in the unbelief, not yet complete, but now largely preponderant, in the dogma that sickness, pestilence, and famin were manifestations of divine anger, the results of which could neither be avoided nor prevented. The Christian churches hav done little or nothing to dispel this superstition. The official and authorized prayers of the principal denominations even to-day reaffirm it. Modern study of the laws of health, experiments in sanitary improvements, more careful application of medical knowledge, hav proved more efficacious in preventing or diminishing plagues and pestilence than hav the intervention of the priest or the practice of prayer. Those in England who hold the old faith that prayer will suffice to cure disease are to-day termed "peculiar people," and are occasionally indicted for manslaughter, when their sick children die, because the parents hav trusted to God instead of appealing to the resources of science.

It is certainly clear gain to astronomical science that the church which tried to compel Galileo to unsay the truth, has been overborne by the growing unbelief of the age, even though our little children are yet taught that Joshua made the sun and moon stand still, and that for Hezekiah the sun-dial reversed its record. As Buckle, arguing for the morality of skepticism, says:

> As long as men refer the movements of the comets to the immediate finger of God, and as long as they believe that an eclipse is one of the modes by which the deity expresses his anger, they will never be guilty of the blasphemous presumption of attempting to predict such supernatural appearances. Before they could dare to investigate the causes of these mysterious phenomena, it is necessary that they should believe, or, at all events, that they should suspect, that the phenomena themselvs were capable of being explained by the human mind (History of Civilization, vol. i, page 345).

As in astronomy, so in geology, the gain of the knowledge to humanity has been almost solely in measure of the rejection of the Christian theory, a century since almost universally held, that the world was created six thousand years ago, or, at any rate, that by the sin of the first man, Adam, death commenced about that period. Ethnology and anthropology hav only been possible in so far as, adopting the regretful words of Sir W. Jones, "intelligent and virtuous persons are inclined to doubt the authenticity of the documents delivered by Moses concerning the primitiv world."

Surely it is clear gain to humanity that unbelief has sprung up against the divine right of kings; that men no longer believe that the monarch is "God's anointed," or that "the powers that be are ordained of God." In the struggles for political freedom, the weight of the church was mostly thrown on the side of the tyrant. The homilies of the Church of England declare that "even the wicked rulers hav their power and authority from God," that "such subjects as are disobedient or rebellious against their princes, disobey God and procure their own damnation." It can scarcely be necessary to argue to the citizens of the United States of America that the origin of their liberties was in the rejection of this faith in the divine right of George III. Will anyone, save the most bigoted, contend that it is not certain gain to humanity to spread unbelief in the terrible doctrin that eternal torment is the probable fate of the great majority of the human family? Is it not gain to hav diminished the faith that it was the duty of the wretched and the miserable to be content with the lot in life which providence had awarded them?

If it stood alone, it would be almost sufficient to plead, as justification for heresy, the approach toward equality and liberty for the utterance of all opinions achieved because of growing unbelief. At one period in Christendom each government acted as though only one religious faith could be true, and as though the holding, or, at any rate, the making known, of any other opinion was a criminal act deserving punishment. Under the one word, "Infidel," even as late as Lord Coke, were classed together all who were not Christians, even though they were Mohammedans, Brahmans, or Jews. All who did not accept the Christian faith were sweepingly denounced as Infidels and, therefore, hors de la loi. One hundred and forty five years since, the attorney-general pleading in our highest court, said (Omychund vs. Barker, 1 Atkyns, 29): "What is the definition of an Infidel? Why, one who does not believe in the Christian religion. Then a Jew is an Infidel." And English history for several centuries prior to the commonwealth shows how, habitually and most atrociously, Christian kings, Christian courts, and Christian churches persecuted and harassed these Infidel Jews. There was a time in England when Jews were such Infidels that they were not even allowed to be sworn as witnesses. In 1740, a legacy left for establishing an assembly for the reading of the Jewish scriptures was held to be void (D'Costa vs. D'Pays, Amb., 228) because it was "for the propagation of the Jewish law in contradiction to the Christian religion." It is only in very modern times that municipal rights hav been accorded in England to Jews. It is barely thirty years since they hav been allowed to sit in Parliament. In 1851, the late Mr. Newdegate, in debate (3 Hansard, cxvi, 381), objected "that they should hav sitting in that House an individual who regarded our redeemer as an impostor." Lord Chief Justice Raymond has shown (1 Lord Raymond's Reports, 282 Wells vs. Williams) how it was that Christian intolerance was gradually broken down: "A Jew may sue at this day, but heretofore he could not; for then they were looked upon as enemies, but now commerce has taught the world more humanity." Lord Coke treated the Infidel as one who, in law, had no right of any kind, with whom no contract need be kept, to whom no debt was payable. The plea of "alien Infidel," as answer to a claim, was actually pleaded in court as late as 1737 (Ramkinsenseat vs. Barker, 1 Atkyns, 51). In a solemn judgment Lord Coke says (Coke's reports, Calvin's case): "All Infidels are, in law, perpetui inimici, for between them, as with the devils whose subjects they be, and the Christians, there is perpetual hostility." Twenty years ago the law of England required the writer of any periodical, publication, or pamphlet under sixpence in price to giv sureties for £800 against the publication of blasphemy. I was the last person prosecuted, in 1868, for non-compliance with that law, which was repealed by Mr. Gladstone in 1869. Up till the 23d of December, 1888, an Infidel in Scotland was only allowed to enforce any legal claim in court on condition that, if challenged, he denied his Infidelity. If he lied and said that he was a Christian, he was accepted, despite his lying. If he told the truth and said that he was an unbeliever, then he was practically an outlaw, incompetent to giv evidence for himself or for any other. Fortunately, all this was changed by the royal assent to the Oaths Act on the 24th of December. Has not humanity clearly gained a little in this struggle through unbelief?

For more than a century and a half the Roman Catholic had, in practice, harsher measure dealt out to him by the English Protestant Christian than was, even during that period, the fate of the Jew or the unbeliever. If the Roman Catholic would not take the oath of abjuration, which, to a sincere Romanist, was impossible, he was, in effect, an outlaw, and the "jury-packing," so much complained of to-day in Ireland, is one of the survivals of the old, bad time when Roman Catholics were thus, by law, excluded from the jury-box.

The Scotsman of Jan. 5, 1889, notes that, in 1860, the Rev. Dr. Robert Lee, of Greyfriars, gave a course of Sunday evening lectures on "Biblical Criticism," in which he showed the absurdity and untenableness of regarding every word in the Bible as inspired, and adds:

> We well remember the awful indignation such opinions inspired, and it is refreshing to contrast them with the calmness with which they are now received. Not only from the pulpits of the city, but from the press (misnamed religious) were his doctrins denounced. And one eminent U. P. minister went the length of publicly praying for him, and for students under his care. It speaks volumes for the progress made since then, when we think that, in all probability, Dr. Charteris, Dr. Lee's successor in the chair, differs, in his teaching, from the Confession of Faith much more widely than Dr. Lee ever did, and yet he is considered supremely orthodox, whereas the stigma of heresy was attached to the other all his life.

And this change and gain to humanity are due to the gradual progress of unbelief alike inside and outside the churches. Take, from differing churches, two recent illustrations. The late principal, Dr. Lindsay Alexander, a strict Calvinist, in his important work on "Biblical Theology," claims that "all the statements of scripture are alike to be deferred to, as presenting to us the mind of God." Yet the reverend doctor of divinity also says: "We find in their writings [i. e., the writings of the sacred authors] statements which no ingenuity can reconcile with what modern research has shown to be the scientific truth." At the last Southwell diocesan Church-of-England conference, at Derby, the bishop of the diocese presiding, the Rev. J. G. Richardson said of the Old Testament that "it was no longer honest, or even safe, to deny that this noble literature, rich in all the elements of moral or spiritual grandeur, given—so the church had always taught and would always teach—under the inspiration of almighty God, was sometimes mistaken in its science, was sometimes inaccurate in its history, and sometimes relativ and accommodatory in its morality. It resumed theories of the physical world which science had abandoned and could never resume; it contained passages of narrativ which devout and temperate men pronounced discredited both by external and internal evidence; it praised, or justified or approved, or condoned, or tolerated conduct which the teaching of Christ and the conscience of the Christian alike condemned." Or—as I should urge—the gain to humanity by unbelief is that the "teaching of Christ" has been modified, enlarged, widened, and humanized, and that "the conscience of the Christian" is, in quantity and quality, made fitter for the ever-increasing additions of knowledge of these later and more heretical days. What is a Preacher?

A preacher is a pendulum wagged by a creed.

A preacher is a puppet who closes his eyes and ears to reason's "open questions."

A preacher is a noisy jack, braying on the highway of thought as the car of philosophy passes.

A preacher is an astronomer trying to eclipse the sun of reason with the shadow of hell.

A preacher is an insurance agent offering life policies payable after death—the premium always payable in this world.

A preacher is a keeper of a toll-gate on heaven's highway.

A preacher is a vulture plucking geese.

A preacher is a member of a board of trade dealing in futures for pay.

A preacher is a scarecrow, to frighten children and dupe the timid.

A preacher is a ram's horn of Gideon, to make a noise.

A preacher is a clock set to run backward.

A preacher is a pilot in a fog—he doesn't know any more than the passengers.

A preacher is a doctor of divinity when it gets sick. GEORGE ENDERTON.

IF the ministers of the church hav often permitted the people to revolt for the interest of heaven, they hav never permitted them to revolt for their own deliverance from real evils and known oppressions.—D'Holbach.

The American Secular Union.

R. B. WESTBROOK, President.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary, - 16 Union Park Place, Chicago.
OTTO WETTSTEIN, Treas., - - - - - - Rochelle, Ill.

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN, Chair. Fin. Com., 241 Washington Boulevard, Chicago.

The American Secular Union and Its Board of Directors.

From H. L. Green's Freethinkers' Magazine.

We present the likenesses of the board of directors of the American Secular Union—Judge R. B. Westbrook, of Philadelphia, president of the association; E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, the secretary; Mrs. M. A. Freeman, of Chicago, chairman of the finance committee; Dr. E B. Foote, Jr., of New York city, chairman of the executiv committee; and Otto Wettstein, of Rochelle, Ill., treasurer.

By the constitution of the Union, these officers constitute the board of directors, which board is intrusted with the general management and control of the affairs of the Union, and all appropriations from the treasury are made by this board of directors. We are sure that the Pittsburgh congress could not hav selected a better board of directors, and one in which the Liberals and Secularists of this country would hav had more confidence. They are each and all intelligent, honest, earnest advocates of the entire separation of church and state, and possess, in a large degree, those business qualifications that admirably qualify them for their respectiv positions. They are entitled to the hearty and unanimous support of the friends of state Secularization, and, if they can hav such support, will achieve a grand work for the association.

In these days we hear much of an "American party," but the only real American party in this country is the American Secular Union. That is the only association that fully maintains the principles upon which this government was founded, and every friend of our republican form of government should be a friend of this association. The Secular Union, at its last congress, planted itself squarely upon the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which were formulated by Francis E Abbott, and adopted at Philadelphia on the fourth day of July, 1876. These Demands hav been rightfully declared to be the second Declaration of American Independence, and they more clearly state the true American doctrin than does the former immortal document. That doctrin is simply this: "No connection of church and state shall be allowed in this country." That was what the fathers of our country, the Jeffersons, Paines, and Franklins, and their co-workers, intended when they established this nation, but the doctrin has not been fully maintained. It is everywhere violated, and attempts are now being made in the national Congress and state legislatures to further violate that sacred and only safe and consistent principle. Our limited space will not allow of a more specific statement. We can only say here that the attempt to pass the Blair Sunday law is the fire upon Fort Sumter in the irrepressible conflict between Mental Liberty and Mental Slavery, and it ought to arouse and enthuse every friend of our American institutions as did the fire upon Fort Sumter at the opening of the civil war.

It is the church, led by the priests against the people; an attempt to place the cross above the stars and stripes; to establish the church as the supreme power in this country; to make it a crime to think; an attempt to disfranchise and debar from citizenship every non-Christian in the United States. No such blow as the Blair bill was ever before attempted to be struck at civil liberty in this country. It is the culmination of all the diabolical work that the God-in-the-Constitution party has been doing for the last twenty years, the most un-American party that ever existed. It is a more dangerous attempt to overthrow the institutions of this country than was the war of the Rebellion, for it comes clothed in the garb of piety and religion, and is falsely named the "Blair Educational bill," and, under the guise of liberty, it attempts to establish the worst kind of despotism.

Both the Protestant and Catholic churches are now making a desperate attempt to obtain the control of this government, and about the only hope of safety seems to be the prospect that each may succeed in preventing the nefarious designs of the other. The new "American party" is fighting valiantly to keep the Catholics from taking control of the government, but, to a careful observer, it can readily be seen that their zeal to keep the Catholics out is largely kindled by the desire to get control themselvs. They would like to put the Catholics out of the school boards, so that they may get the Protestant Bible into the schools. As between these two great Christian sects it is only a fight for supremacy.

Christianity proper cannot hav any love for a government that derives its power from the people, so that if our institutions are to be protected it must be by those who are not distinctly Christian. This is not saying but that there are thousands in the Christian church who are only nominally Christians, and who totally reject these old church and state theories. This large class of true Americans are the people who now need to hav their eyes opened to what the God-in-the-Constitution party is attempting to do. We feel confident that if these patriotic people, and that other numerous class who never attend church or make any public profession of Liberalism, could be fully educated as to the work these bigots are now attempting, they would place themselvs squarely by the side of the friends of Secularization. To educate these two classes is the important duty of the American Secular Union.

Now, in these perilous times, is it not the duty of every Liberal in the land to lay aside all minor objections to the Union and its officers, if they hav any, and heartily unite in a grand attempt to make the Union a power for great good in this country? The Union has but one object in view, to maintain our free institutions against the seemingly united attack, at the present time, of all the bigots in our land in an attempt to destroy them. Its only platform is the Nine Demands of Liberalism, to which every Liberal in this country subscribes. Each member is at perfect liberty to hold and advocate such views as may seem reasonable to him, outside of this organization. All the association demands is that he or she honestly subscribe to the Nine Demands. If persons cannot do that, they belong to the God-in-the-Constitution party, and should there enlist. There are but two sides to this question. All who are not for a secular government are against it. Either the government must be run by the people or the church; there can be no safety in a union of the two, and we propose it shall be run entirely by the people. We make no war on the church, only demand that it keep its hands off the state. God can rule in heaven, if there be such a place, but we do not propose that he rule our government through his earthly representativ, the church. This is a very square issue.

The chief working officer of the Union, Secretary Stevens, has thoroughly proved his fitness for the position since he was chosen. We candidly admit that on account of some views Mr. Stevens expressed before he was elected to the place, we were a little prejudiced against him at the first, but we hav watched his course very carefully, and we can truthfully say that we fully indorse his administration. He has shown himself an efficient secretary; he has worked with a vigor and energy worthy of the cause he represents; he has proved himself to be an able, thoughtful, and judicious officer, and he is entitled to the cordial support of every friend of state Secularization in this country. All the other officers are eminently worthy, as we hav heretofore stated. The president is just the man for the position. No better selection could hav been made.* Otto Wettstein is the proper man for treasurer. Money will be safe in his hands. Dr. Foote is the right man for chairman of the executiv committee, and we hope he will soon wake up the members of that committee and set them to work. Mrs. Freeman is one of the best female Freethought workers in this country, an able writer and speaker, and will thoroughly discharge the duties of her office.

What the association needs most just now is money. Without money it can do but little. Will the Liberals of this country fully supply this want? This is the important question. The platform is right, the cause is just, and the officers are the right persons for their respectiv positions. There is no good reason at this time why there should not be an enthusiastic union of all our forces. Every Liberal paper should hoist the flag of the Union; every speaker ought to work for its success, and every friend of the cause should put his hand in his pocket and pay into the treasury every dollar he can spare. Those who are financially able should pay in their hundreds, those who are not so able, smaller sums. Everyone should pay something. As you hav seen by the constitution, not a dollar can be used until it is voted by this eminently qualified board of directors. Are you not willing, my Liberal reader, to intrust a few dollars to their control? If so, before you forget it, send what you can afford to Treasurer Otto Wettstein, and he will duly receipt it. A distinguished Freethinker said to us: "The trouble with our cause is, we hav too many professed Liberals who are only Liberals because they are too damned stingy to pay pew-rent." To that class we do not appeal for aid.

*In the April Magazine we shall publish a full-page likeness of President Westbrook and a short sketch of his life, that we are sure will very much interest our readers.—ED.

"The Limitations of Toleration."

It is such a rare occurrence to meet with an Irish name in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I feel something like duty-bound to avail myself of the opportunity to furnish our Irish friend, Mr. Jeremiah O'Brien, with the exact truth he is so honestly seeking.

He feels by his sound, natural common sense, that there is something out of order in that discussion about "The Limitations of Toleration." But what that thing is, where it lies, what sort of mistake it must be, he cannot discover.

Before pointing out that latent stone where every passer-by must stumble, I wish to make a few general remarks.

There is such a rush toward realities in our day that even our education, literature, and the very sciences are carried away with it. People are satisfied with a superficial, varnish-like education, mostly got through newspapers, reference-books, dictionaries, and encyclopedias. Take the clergymen for example. Most of the applicants are ex-farmers, blacksmiths, laborers, etc., who, too lazy to work, begin to feel calls to a "vocation," upon which they enter colleges, run through in three or four years—perhaps two years more in so-called "theology." Then he comes out ready, prepared, "ointed" to preach and teach. With more obscure sects it is still worse. This rule applies also to lawyers, doctors, engineers, architects, and almost the whole of modern American society. Few men enter, even upon the professorial vocation, systematically and conscientiously prepared, which, of course, can easily find excuse in the fact that such a preparation takes eighteen to twenty years of your life. This is the reason why even our greatest public men are not well versed in the elements of sciences. They devour the works of great authors and thinkers. They fish out ideas, and these ideas are rapidly brought into circulation, and men talk about them. They become the common property of all, and those who are not familiar with the same ideas are wondered at as being so far behind. Yet—and I am sorry to say—we see our greatest public men display a perfect, a full ignorance of the elements. I do not allude to any individual person just now. I used to read articles in our high-toned, pretentious magazines. I find the same faults. You read modern scientific books, articles, listen to political or church orations, always the same. I found preachers who are regarded much like pyramids of learning. Come down to the bottom with them—not up to the top—and you find them invariably ignorant of the elements and principles.

Let us apply these remarks now to "The Limitations of Toleration," and see first the general character of the discussion. I felt sorry that I could not be present, although Mr. Courtlandt Palmer had invited me, both orally and by ticket.

The first we see is that the discussion never reached as far as the question of toleration, except that Colonel Ingersoll touched upon it in quite a sensible, Voltairean way. In the second place, "limitation" never came under discussion.

In my mind, the controversists had the appearance of three men starting somewhere "West," but falling out when the question of the route arises. One claims the Erie, the other the Pennsylvania, still another the Baltimore & Ohio, to be the proper route. The first mistake is in the too general term West—that is, in the wording of the title, "The Limitations of Toleration." Mr. Courtlandt Palmer's mind was to put this question: Which are the reasonable limits of free discussion? Or, to put it in a more scholarly phraseology, The reasonable (moral, philosophical, advisable, etc.) limits of free speech? For, as Colonel Ingersoll so well remarked, the term "toleration" implies tyranny and theology, and consequently no man has the right to say, "I tolerate you."

The second, and the really fatal mistake, like a misplaced switch, was that none of the three disputants has given a definition, and the consequence is, that all three orators spoke of three different matters. Colonel Ingersoll insisted, in his brilliant diction, upon free thought. Mr. Coudert, in his boorish insults, galloped up and down upon blasphemy, personalities, argumenta ad hominem, destruction, murder, Anarchy, dynamite bombs, etc., as results, consequences of free speech. What a mental condition, what a narrow insight, this man must hav, who had not a single reasonable phrase on his lips, not a solitary logical thought in his brains! General Stewert L. Woodford, in a thoughtful, urbane, and gentlemanly manner, gave his reasons for the restriction of unlimited free speech. That is, all three spoke about three different subjects.

Now Mr. Jeremiah O'Brien comes in, quotes the colonel's words: "What is thought?" and adds: " . . . . but neglects to giv any definit answer." You hit it, Mr. O'Brien; for the colonel, instead of having given a firm definition that he could hav found in any elementary or manual book of logic, continues: " . . . It is the result of nature—of the outer world—first upon the senses," etc. But our philosophical friend, Mr. O'Brien, does not hit, rather falls himself into the same ditch, when he says: "My answer would be, that thought is an elaborate product of the mind, including the brain and nervous system." In one word, he could hav said: Thought is a brain-work. Does Mr. O'Brien think that the question is brought to a greater light by his answer? You are near it, the colonel was near it, Mr. Coudert was near it, so was General Woodford. But why did they all not come to the point? That would hav given an altogether different turn and direction to the whole discussion.

My answer is: Because none of the participants—direct or indirect—were drilled in the elements of logic while students, and made no use of any manual while preparing their respectiv speeches. Any logician can see that in a "jiffy."

Only for the sake of Mr. O'Brien I shall solve this question, the simplest in the world, if a person knows it.

Question. What is thought?

Answer. An unexpressed judgment.

Q. What is judgment?

A. Judgment is an act of our mind comparing two terms, which, if they agree, are connected by the copula is; if they disagree, separated by is not.

Q. What is a term?

A. A term is an idea expressed by a word.

Q. What is an idea?

A. An idea is a conception of which we become conscious.

Q. What is a conception?

A. A conception is an image impressed upon our mind of exterior objects through the instrumentality of our senses.

The first element is the conception; this becomes an idea, but remains in our mind; if we express it by a word, it becomes a term, otherwise writing, or some other sign. Two terms compared giv a judgment; if this judgment remains in our mind, it is called thought; if expressed, it becomes a proposition.

Mr. O'Brien thinks that thought can be checked by disasters, calamities, etc. No. Thought is spontaneous—even the delirious think, the insane think, the animals think—but he means our judgment. This is right. So is Colonel Ingersoll. Thought is free. Even judgment is free. But the judgment can commit mistakes on account of the misrepresentations of our senses, which often deceive us. It is the proposition which is not free, which is interfered with. Therefore to say "free thought" is absurd, except as indicating, in a translated sense, independence from theological suggestions and dictation.

They had to dispute about the "Limits of Free Speech"—where it may become reasonable to check it by authority or law, where the individual lacks necessary prudence. This was to be discussed—not the liberty of thought, nor the evil results of an excess, nor finally any theology. There is not the least contradiction, logically speaking, between Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Coudert; therefore there can be no dispute. The colonel says: "My thought is free. I am bound to think, and I am allowed to express my thoughts." This is one step farther than he was allowed. Mr. Coudert: "Yes, your thoughts are free, you damned Infidel; but I protest against your spoiling my children." He did not show that the colonel is not free to express his thoughts. He jumps from A to C—contradicts a thing that the colonel did not assert and never would assert.

Now, one word about that "Limitations of Toleration," or, as it was meant, "The Reasonable or Moral Limits of Free Speech."

"I feel sleepy"—am I free to say this? Yes.

"Hurrah for the republic!"—am I allowed to say this? In America, yes; in Russia, no.

"If you hav no money, go to the one who has; steal from him; and if he resists, murder him!" Am I allowed to say this? You say, No. Why not? What constitutes the "limits?" Religion? Religion committed more murders than any other cause. Laws? Laws hang, shoot, murder. Society? Society is full of murders. Nature? Nature knows no such restriction. What, then? It is the developed sense of justice of which an individual, a member of civilized society, must be conscious, that constitutes a limit to the act of murder as well as to the instigation to the same.

Mark well that this is an excess, an abuse, of free speech.

Did Colonel Ingersoll defend this excess and abuse of free speech? No. What should he be attacked and insulted, then, for?

If he says, "Hurrah for the republic," you assent.

If he says, "I feel sleepy," you say, "What do I care for it?"

But if he says, "All religions are a humbug," is he allowed to say that? Does natural justice forbid that? No. Who does forbid it? The religious. Who forbids him to say, "Hurrah for the republic?" The monarchist. Well, here you hav them—the theologian and the tyrant.

Hence natural justice opposes the abuse of free speech. Social (individual) injustice opposes natural free speech. There are, of course, minor subdivisions, such as time, place, circumstances, prudence, etc., that may, and do, influence free speech, but the above two propositions are two absolute principles.

Unfortunately for us all, the elements of sciences, because they constitute the studies of our boyhood, are generally scorned by all in advanced age, when they are all forgotten—and in most cases they were never thoroughly acquired. There follows the absurdity that, when we see positivly that a person does not know a syllable of these elements, we must, in order that we may not slight him, suppose him to know them. This is a great evil—an intolerable hypocrisy.

Every lecturer, writer, and speaker ought to hav the definitions of all terms in philosophy in his memory as much as the spelling of the words used, and hav a small classbook or manual always at hand before a Webster. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred there is a chance for an Agnostic or Atheist lecturer to bounce a preacher by compelling him to giv an accepted definition of terms, like nature, person, etc., and if he is unable to furnish them, compelling him to acknowledge that he does not know what he is talking about; while the Liberal can send to the next bookstore for such a manual, if the opponent doubts his given definition. It is of no use to go into high sciences. To convince and bounce a common preacher, lawyer, or any other man not a specialist in a certain science, a common elementary book is worth more than a whole library of the highest philosophical and scientific books. It is no disgrace for a man to learn what he does not know.

May I hope that Mr. Jeremiah O'Brien is satisfied with this explanation? We hope that a clear-headed Irishman as he is, judging by his philosophical scruples, will find no reasons to attack our great Col. R. G. Ingersoll.

The Church—Its Moral Status.

In our first article on this subject we referred to the primitiv church founded by St. Paul, and from the testimony of that individual, which should be authoritativ with Christians, we proved these "early Christians" to be both immoral and depraved. However, we write in no spirit of censure, as we should not reproach the many shortcomings of Christians in any age, as their standards of morality are lamentably low. Any class of men who can accept Noah, Lot, Jacob, David, and Solomon as favorits of God and exemplars of morality, should excite our pity and commiseration as well as our disgust.

Ireneus, one of the distinguished church fathers, who lived about the commencement of the third century, in his fourth book against Heresies, chapter 31, refers to Lot's incest with his daughters as typical. Lot represents God and his daughters, the elder and younger church. And as Lot gave increase to his daughters, so does God giv increase to the elder and younger church. Some ecclesiastic writers whose natures were better than their religion protested against this illustration; but before we get through with this series of short articles, we expect to prove this comparison of Ireneus between Lot and the Christian's God and Lot's daughters and the elder and younger church to be a most suitable one, and strictly in harmony with the future of things.

Luther branded the elder church as being the Mother of Harlots, and her Protestant daughters hav proved themselvs to be strictly in moral harmony with the old harlot mother that gave them birth.

The early fathers of the church were bitter in their denunciations of the heathen, but Paul, as quoted in my previous article, accused the primitiv brethren of outrages against morality and decency such as were not even mentioned among the gentiles, while the pious Wesley, in speaking of the church during the first century of its career, declares that "Christians in general were scarce distinguishable from the heathens, except by their opinions and modes of worship" (Wes. Ser., vol. i, page 63).

In speaking of the church and its devotees in the second century Tertullian (an eminent Christian writer of that period) stated that, "Not only the tempers of the Christians were exactly the same with those of their heathen neighbors (pride, passion, and love of the world reigning alike in both), but their lives and manners also" (Wes. Ser., vol. ii, page 63). Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, about the middle of the third century, stated that the church at that time was "immersed in ambition, covetousness, envy, luxury, and all other vices." Now, our modern clergy are familiar with the depraved and venal character of the early Christians, based upon the testimony of their own historians, and yet they preach millions of sermons and write thousands of books to prove that the Christian church, in every age since its origin, has had an exclusiv monopoly of justice, truth, and virtue. If they are ignorant, they are inexcusable; if they are informed, they are dishonest disseminators of falsehood and misrepresentation of the most damaging character. Perhaps they know better, but, like Paul and Eusebius, their illustrious predecessors, are simply lying for a purpose—the "glory of God and the advancement of the church."

Dangerous Legislation in Texas.

From the Denison Sunday Gazetteer.

"The school bill was again taken up and the reading began. The amendment looking to the permission of the instruction of the Christian religion of the Bible in the schools was debated for an hour and much zeal for the churches was exhibited. The Bible amendment was adopted."

The above paragraph appeared in the house proceedings as published in the Dallas News of last Wednesday. While the Gazetteer has too much confidence in the good sense of the members of the senate to believe they will pass such a bill in the face of the plain language of the state constitution prohibiting legislation of a religious character, the sentiment manifested in the house as revealed in the above action is sufficient to warrant a vigorous protest from all those who believe the stability of our institutions depends upon the education of the people, and that to make education universal the public schools of the state must be sustained. If this bill should become a law it would prove the entering wedge to the destruction of the free schools of Texas. There are too many opposed to making our public schools agents of the church to submit to such an innovation without an earnest protest, and that protest would manifest itself in a refusal to pay their school tax. To introduce the Bible as a reading book in the free schools would, moreover, give rise to the question, Which Bible shall be adopted—the Protestant version or the Catholic; the new translation or the old; the Old Testament of the Jews or the New Testament of the Christians? Then would come the objection of the Agnostics and the Freethinkers, comparativly few in numbers to be sure, but equally citizens of the state, and entitled to like protection under the Constitution, who are opposed to being taxed to educate the rising generation in dogmas they do not approve. If this bill becomes a law the next step will be an effort to secure a division of the school fund, for it will be as impossible for Catholics and Protestants to agree to the use of the same Bible as a text-book as it is for oil and water to mingle, and this secured, our magnificent free school system, now the pride of the state, will be destroyed. An earnest protest should go up to Austin from all parts of the state against this infamous measure.

The Great Discussion.

From the Investigator.

We finish in this number the discussion between Colonel Ingersoll, the Hon. Mr. Coudert (Catholic), and Governor Woodford (Protestant). Last week we gave the answer of the colonel's two opponents, and now we publish his incontrovertible reply to both. It is a settler and a crusher—that is to say, it settles theology and crushes its pretensions.

The New York Truth Seeker Liberals hav done an excellent thing by printing this great discussion in pamphlet form, and as we wish to help circulate it all we can, we notify our readers that we hav it for sale at this office—price, ten cents a copy. Itdeserves, and we hope it may receive, a circulation of hundreds of thousands, for it is truly a mind-opener.

Information for Brother Heister.

"H. H.," of "Glenwood, Pa.," in Ironclad Age.

Why, bless your innocent soul, Brother Heister, you seem to be exceedingly child-like and bland. Did you really imagin it was the mission of "a leading Liberal journal" to recognize merit and devotion to Liberalism wherever found simply because they are such? Where hav you been sleeping during the last seven years? Hav you not heard that D. M. Bennett is dead, and in his place sits one "who knows not Joseph!"—one whose selfishness is only equaled by his egotism.

Remember that Lincoln's successor was Andrew Johnson and do not rebel against fate; you hav plenty of company. Reports of Liberal lectures, celebrations and picnics—no matter how important, how well or by whom written up—invariably land in the limbo of "a leading Liberal journal's" waste-basket if they happen to mention the name of some unfortunate knight who has not bowed the knee to this Scotch-yankee Baal, or brought grists to his "Secular" mill.

Uncle Bill on the Preachers.

From the National Guardian, Calcutta, India.

They tell me this, and they tell me that,
And they tell me everything,
The road forks here, and the road forks there,
And the road goes round in a ring.
They giv me wheat, and they giv me chaff,
And they call it the bread of life;
They claim religion is pleasure and peace,
They claim it is penance and strife.

They reason from love that God is good,
From hate—and they make him bad;
They preach, "His mercy forever endures"—
They preach that he will get mad;
They figure and twist and make him one,
They twist him again—he is three;
They split his kingdom in two, and yield
The devil, the earth, and sea.

They muddle my brain with doubt and dirt,
And talk of his marvelous light;
They say I am blind when I cannot see
A dawn through eternity's night;
They stand me up in a row and draw
A crooked line in the dark,
And tell me to toe the scratch, and say
I'm damned if I straddle the mark.

They prove the Bible is true, and prove
It teaches an endless hell;
They prove it is truer than that, and prove
That all shall at last be well.
They say that it says what it does not say,
And what it does say—deny,
And, say what you will, if you say they are wrong,
They say what you say is a lie.

But how in the devil, or how in the Lord,
Such mysteries may abound,
And celestially be all the truer because
They are not terrestrially sound,
Is more than my noddle can manage, and so
I say to the preachers: go on!
What God wants of me he can tell it to me
As well as he could to St. John;

And I say to the Lord, and believe that the Lord
Has got the good sense to see,
He needn't to send any drummers around
When he has any business with me.

It appears from the Theosophist, published at Adyar, Madras, India, that the great electrician, Thomas A. Edison, is a believer in the mystical doctrin of Theosophy. He joined the society in 1878, and "his signed obligation form, framed, hangs on the wall of the secretary's office at Advar." At the time of his affiliation he had in mind, says the Theosophist, "the idea of the mechanical application of a force which, if ever realized, will be regarded as his greatest discovery." Mr. Edison's friends over here are wondering what that force is?

Labor and Capital.

Many of your readers being interested in the labor question, I will offer a few ideas respecting it. The inequality between labor and capital makes necessary labor agitators; they serve as a check to the encroachments of capital, but can do but little toward bettering the condition of labor. The present condition of society, and the narrow and selfish ideas of life prevailing, make any great improvement in the affairs of the laboring people impossible. As long as the chief aim and ambition of men is to acquire wealth, ease, and comfort for themselvs, and to store the wealth away where it cannot be used, with no care or thought for the welfare of others, and as long as capital is educated and labor ignorant, the present inequality will endure.

A great change in the ideas of life must come about before the wrongs of labor will abate. A grander and more communistic idea of life must prevail—the aim and ambition of every man must be to make every other man just as comfortable and happy as he is; and then will inequality disappear and joy reign supreme in every home.

The truth of this is apparent when we realize that there is enough of everything in this world to keep every living creature in comfort.

It is plain that new principles hav got to be bred into human nature; and generations will come and go before it can be accomplished. All ideas inculcated by the church must be eliminated before the new principle will make progress. A communism that springs from natural feelings cannot fail to spread happiness everywhere; but a communism created by law, with present conditions, would be abortiv. There are many ideas which, could they be carried into effect by law, would help the labor classes, but constant agitation is about the only thing they can do now. Agitation means education. Increased intelligence on the part of labor will help. But all they can do will make hardly a perceptible change in the respectiv conditions of labor and capital in this generation, even should beneficial laws be made. Capital is shrewd enough to combine—to be of one mind. The superior education of its holders enables them to control large numbers of laborers at election time, and to actually deceive many into believing that the very hand that oppresses them is beneficial to them. Many laborers are led to believe that a diminution of the hours of labor would be disadvantageous to them. Laborers were deluded by the thousand into believing a tariff for protecting a a certain class of people at the expense of another class was beneficial to both classes. So it is evident that it is easy for the rich and intelligent class to control in a great measure the poor and uneducated many; and also is it plain that a reform will only come through a change in human nature.

Worcester, Mass., March 3 289. A LIBERAL.

"Something Outside of Man."

Of course there is; who has said there was not? Does "Pericles" misunderstand me purposely? I thought I was sufficiently clear in my last to avoid all misconception. I hav no fears of being ridiculed by Christians. I only fear giving them reason to call us to account for our inconsistency in sexing a god that we declare impersonal, the same as they do their personal God.

"Pericles" quotes, "If any gender is used, we want a word that comprises all genders, since the Great Cosmic Unity is the All." Very well, does the masculin gender comprise all genders any better than the neuter? Let us see. We write, for instance, "The Universe, . . . it is the All." Here the pronoun "it" stands for the noun Universe—or the Cosmic Unity—and includes the masculin, feminin, common, and neuter genders, since it expresses the universe. Now, again, we will write, "The Universe. . . . He is the All." Now, does this masculin pronoun "he" express the universe as fully as the genderless "it?" "Pericles's" reiteration, "the great fear that seems to possess the lady that, if the masculin gender was used, it would be thought to exclude the feminin," is entirely gratuitous, the intended thrust not finding a vulnerable point, as I parried that fling in my last with a jest, and will now only add, if the reformers are determined to hav a person to worship, I greatly prefer it should be baptized god instead of goddess, even if the feminin is excluded.

"Pericles" again quotes and criticises: "Man is superior to the whole universe." Will he tell me of anything that the universe has evolved that is superior to man, in itself? If he can, let us cease boasting. "Man is the crowning glory of the universe!" God—the Great Cosmic Unity—makes an eye, the vision of which limits the stars to little points. Man makes a telescope that extends that vision to the beholding of immense suns. Now where is your Great Cosmic Unity? Just where Barnum said he was after the close of Jenny Lind's first concert in New York city, "nowhere"—nowhere in comparison with the sweet singer.

"Such is the absurd and monstrous conceit of Materialism!" "Pericles" exclaims. There he is in advance of me, for I profess not to believe in Materialism, if I understand what it is.

I hav not intimated that I desired to destroy the old truths, as THE TRUTH SEEKER readers will bear me witness, but merely objected to using the old words that obscure the new interpretations and mislead those to whom the new views would be accessible, but for these words and phrases that to them convey the same meaning as when used by the orthodox. If "the essence of worship is nothing but admiration," why not call this essence "admiration," and leave "worship" to those who hav a personal being to reverence and bow down unto? If "the essence of religion is nothing but pure science," as "Pericles" affirms, why not call it "pure science," and leave the cruel word "religion"—that has caused more strife, crime, and error than any other evil—to those who believe in persecuting for Christ's sake, even unto the death, as in olden times. I think this is the only difference of opinion between "Pericles" and myself, the words to be used to define our nearly similar views, and I regret to see the main issue buried under a war of words. The question is, Is it wise to use these old cruel, misleading words to express the new interpretations? I should be most happy, with the permission of our obliging Editor, to hear the opinions of some of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers on this important subject.

I would not take space to urge my views, but that I find so many putting the new wine of truth into the old bottles of error that I cannot refrain from uttering a warning that in the establishment of these new facts of science, we build right, so that our foundation will not need to be overturned by our successors, even as we are toppling over the towers of the past by undermining their superstructure, the strongest base of which is, a superstition resting on a belief in non-existent Gods and their supposed attributes. ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Fate of a Previous Sunday Bill.

I see by the papers, not only at Washington, but all over the country, the Blair bill is having pretty rough handling, and will continue to hav unless it is withdrawn, and if not, it will be looked upon as was the uninvited man at the wedding, "not having on a wedding garment," and will share about the same fate as did he—be sent into utter darkness, where there is weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth, that is, if such a place is to be found.

It is now sixty years since, and within my memory, the priests, with their followers, presented a petition to Congress praying that body to make it unlawful to transport the United States mails on the Sabbath day, and this petition, like the Blair petition, had only the names of the clergy and those who were their hearers and supporters. This, I think, was the first attempt of church people to get special favors granted by the general government to legalize any religious rites or ceremonies belonging to any church societies. This petition, like all such petitions, was got up and circulated among the class who sympathized with the movers of the plan, and done without the care or concern of people at large. When the petition was presented to Congress, and the nature of the petition was learned, viz., that no United States mail in the United States should be opened, or mail matter delivered, or mail matter moved, on the Sabbath; that all such important accommodations for the public should be stopped one day in every week, and for all time to come, to, the petition said, please "almighty God," the people at large were as much surprised on hearing of this unexpected movement as they would hav been to hear war was declared against the United States by some foreign nation. As there were then, and always hav been, individuals in Congress who favored such schemes, the petition was received and entered on the files of the House. A committee was selected to consider the subject of stopping the circulation of the United States mails on the Sabbath for the main object of pleasing "almighty God," as set forth in the petition, and this committee was to make a report of its discoveries in the matter. Col. Richard M Johnson, of Kentucky, was chairman of this committee. This committee gave due consideration to the subject of the petitions, and, in due time, made a report of their doings and their conclusions, together with the reasons why they reported unfavorably to the petitions. Much time must hav been devoted to the merits of the petition by this committee, for they, in their report, a public document of about one hundred pages, gave a history of the doings and extent of the United States mail, the amount of its usefulness, as well as the extent of the service.

This lengthy report was entitled, "Logic and Law," and copies of it were sent to all parts of the country, creating disgust in the movers and advocates for such change as would follow the granting of the petitions.

This report named many reasons wherein the good of the public would suffer if the United States mails were to become useless one-seventh part of the time, having nothing in view in so doing, except the pacifying of almighty God in his anger toward us.

This report underwent much criticism by those who were displeased by it. Among the many inconveniences the public would suffer if the United States mails were to be crippled, as set forth in this report, one was the contingency of a war with some other power, in which all national dispatches of importance would be compelled to be delayed.

In the criticisms of those who were so dissatisfied by Mr. Johnson's report, they had an excuse for the objections in this report. I remember the remedy they offered for not transporting the mail on the Sabbath in case of war, and that was, "No nation would dare to make war on a people whose God was the Lord." All their criticisms were of about the same sort.

This report put to silence all the religionists, of whatever name, as far as asking of the general government religious favors, until, about twenty-five or so years since, this same class of people circulated a petition among themselvs asking that Congress amend the Constitution and put God in the United States Constitution, with his son Jesus Christ, who had been dead about two thousand years, as ruler of nations. This petition was presented with as much apparent confidence as was Mr. Blair's Sabbath bill.

When it became known what an absurd request was made by a small portion of the people, and that an expression from the people at large should be made against such a foolish change of the United States Constitution, such a flood of petitions from the people came from all parts of the United States that the petitioners were frightened at the storm they had created, abandoned their scheme, and hav kept pretty still until the present movement. Now Mr. Blair is at the head of a scheme to persuade Congress to pass a national Sabbath law—a law of pains and penalties if not strictly obeyed.

This last movement is looked upon not only with disfavor, but great dislike, if the press of the country is an expression. I hav not seen a journal that approves of the movement, unless it be religious ones, and those say they depend upon the Lord for success. Now, what would be the condition of things were Congress and the president united in passing this Sabbath law—a law that would fine and imprison, or both, a man that did not respect and keep the Sabbath day, as it is regarded by this proposed law? A man that did not believe the Sabbath was a better day than any other, would he be willing to submit to this new law? Would he willingly obey it, when he knew no one was harmed by his breaking a law that nine-tenths of good, moral, and learned people had no relish or respect for? A law, as its advocates claim, to keep a mythological God from being angry, a God no one knows anything of, not even the petitioners themselvs—would people submit to and cheerfully keep and respect a law for such a purpose? It is very certain they would not! And if not, what would be the consequence, and what would follow? I hav heard it said the law would not be enforced if made; that it would be a dead letter; that no one could be found willing to enforce it.

If anyone believes this Sabbath law, as contemplated by Mr. Blair, would be a dead law for the reason that no one would enforce it, he would find that he had made a mistake.

Let this request of those petitioners be acquiesced in and allow this Blair bill to become the law of the land, the first thing, the clergy would say to their followers: "Organize yourselvs. Appoint a law-and-order committee whose duty will be to watch this nine-tenths of the people who don't believe in God's command to keep his Sabbath holy, and are not willing to obey this new Sabbath law. Hav them arrested the first thing Monday, and see they are put through."

Enough could be found that would act the part of "game constables," and enough could be found ready to defy this pious law, and arrests would follow, with crowds of witnesses and spectators.

A question: What would be done with the fines collected for violations of this proposed Sunday law? Such moneys would be a fine help to enlarge the services of the priests, and help spread what, by some, is called the "gospel of peace." There would be ways enough to use up the money obtained from Sabbath-breakers. But that petition for such a law will never, never be granted. There is too much good sense in the men who compose our House and Senate to enact a law recognizing Sunday as more sacred or holy than any other day, for every intelligent person, whose mind is not warped by religious superstition, knows that this planet which we occupy, as well as the unnumbered thousands or millions of other planets of greater magnitude than this, were not made in six literal days, and but six thousand years since. Everybody that knows anything knows this thing is not so, and the ministers now are beginning to own that Moses's description of the creation of the world, of time and things, is nothing but an allegory unworthy the acceptance of intelligent people. And to ask or expect people of this or any other day to respect or observe the Protestant Sunday as above any other day, is asking too much—is asking more than will ever be granted. CARLTON RICE.

Hamilton, N. Y.

Sunday Legislation in Illinois.

A. O. Tait, in the American Sentinel.

A bill was introduced in the House of the Illinois legislature, January 25th, which is another evidence of the drift toward enforcing religious beliefs by civil law. Notwithstanding the fact that the constitution of Illinois provides for the "free exercise and enjoyment of religious professions and worship, without discrimination," these apostles of church and state want to compel, contrary to the supreme law of the state, the observance of a religious institution. Following are the first two sections of the bill:

Section 1. Be it enacted by the people of the state of Illinois, represented in the general assembly: That whoever shall keep open on Sunday any shop, store, factory, or other public place, for the manufacture, or preparation, or packing, or sale, or other disposition of any goods, wares, or merchandise, except as in this act expressly provided, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not less than $50, nor more than $500, for each offense, and shall be committed to the common jail till the fines and costs are paid.

Sec. 2. Whoever shall procure, or permit to be employed in any secular business on Sunday in any of the places mentioned in section 1 of this act, any clerk, workman, or other person, except as in this act expressly permitted, shall be deemed guilty of a like misdemeanor, and shall suffer the like penalty as is prescribed in the foregoing section.

These sections prohibit only a certain class of labor. However, the mover of the bill says privately that it does not cover all they want. But if they make the bill too sweeping on the start, they fear it will be defeated; and he thinks that half a loaf is better than no bread. This will prove a stepping-stone toward getting stronger legislation in the future in favor of Sunday. True to the watchword of Sunday law advocates, the standard of the ideal Puritan Sunday is erected in the background, and they try to lead us on cautiously, step by step, till we shall be hemmed in on all sides, and the only thing allowable on Sunday will be to go to church to listen to the lengthy disquisition of some prosy divine. But even as an initiatory measure, on the class the bill touches, it imposes a fine that would soon use up a small fortune. The author of the bill frankly stated to me that it was intended to protect the religious interests of Sunday. It seems strange to hear men talk of imposing such fines if we refuse to observe in sacred style a dogma of disputed origin in the Christian church. Think of it! from $50 to $500! Would it not be well before making such laws in favor of what he thinks to be the Christian religion, to examin the records to see if the author of the Christian religion would be in harmony with such action?

According to these sections of the bill, the offender "shall be deemed guilty of high misdemeanor." The criminal code of the Illinois statutes divides offenses into "felonies," "misdemeanors," and "infamous crimes," but I do not find anything referring "to high misdemeanor." In view of the fact that this is only a "stepping-stone" to the legislation they want in favor of Sunday, I suppose it was deemed unwise to call a violation of this act either "felony" or "infamous crimes." And yet the simple term of "misdemeanor" in the statutes is not strong enough, so the term "high misdemeanor" must be used. The Library of Universal Knowledge defines "high misdemeanor" as "an offense short of, but closely bordering on, treason." And in the Articles of Confederation between the original thirteen states (article iv) we hav the expression, "If any person guilty of or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor," etc., thus associating "high misdemeanor" with treason and felony. Fellow-citizens, are we ready to be classed with those guilty of the infamous crime of treason just because we choose to dissent from the idea of observing a religious institution, no matter whether we are conscientious about it or not? God does not in the Christian dispensation delegate to anyone the authority to inflict temporal punishment on the violators of his law. Would it not be well for these would-be defenders of the Christian religion to be more moderate in their proposed enactments? The third section is as follows:

Sec 3. This act shall not apply to the printing or circulation of newspapers, nor to the sale of medicin, nor to the delivery of milk, nor to the running of railroad or street-cars, or other means for the necessary transportation of the people for all lawful purposes, nor to the circulation of proper books, tracts, or papers, nor to any other work of necessity or charity. In case of any question whether any particular work be a work of necessity or charity, any person may apply to any court having equity jurisdiction, to enjoin the same, and upon such application the question aforesaid shall be determined.

This section very graciously exempts newspaper men, druggists, milkmen, and railroad and street-cars, because, as the father of the bill says, they do not care to hav the opposition of these industries at present. After they get the bill passed, they will be able to use it as a lever to get stringter legislation, and stop everything on Sunday. But the worst feature of this section is the loose way in which it leaves works of "necessity or charity." The bill says that "in case of any question whether any particular work be a work of necessity or charity, any person may apply to any court having equity jurisdiction, to enjoin the same, and upon such application the question aforesaid shall be determined." We are here informed that there really are works of necessity and charity. But the only way to find out "in case of any question whether any particular work be a work of necessity or charity" is to go ahead, do the work, and be subject to the caprice of any person who wishes to "apply to any court having equity jurisdiction, to enjoin the same," and by a suit at law hav the matter determined. Our statutes should be so framed that we may know what is lawful and what is not, without first having to do some deed and be "enjoined," and hav a lawsuit in order to ascertain what the law is. Such a law would be expected from a tyrant, but is not becoming to a free people. An article in the special edition of the October Sentinel, entitled, "The Savor of Tyranny," is to the point here, and we request all our readers who hav not a copy of the paper to send and get it. The article is well worth reading and re-reading. The bill continues:

Sec. 4. In addition to the penalties in this act provided, the several remedies hereinafter specified may be had for any offense described in this act. A fine not exceeding $200 may be recovered in a common suit, before a justice of the peace or police magistrate, commencing by summons in the name of the people of this state, on the relation of any person who may make complaint. Each and every of the offenses described in this act is hereby declared to be a nuisance, and it shall be the duty of all courts of equity in this state, upon the proper application, to enjoin and prohibit the same, and no bond shall be required of the complainant in such a case. A bill, or petition for injunction, may be filed, by any person aggrieved, either in his own name, or in the name of the people on his relation.

This section endeavors to provide "remedies." But instead of remedies it furnishes the most unobstructed liberty to those who may desire to show their religious zeal by harassing those who may not desire to observe Sunday so strictly as their Puritan neighbors. Chapter 6, paragraph 9, of the Illinois statutes, under the caption of "Injunctions," reads: "In all other cases [except injunctions to enjoin a judgment] before an injunction shall issue, the complainant shall giv bond in such penalty, and upon such condition and with such security as may be required by the court, judge, or master granting or ordering the injunction, provided, bond need not be required when, for good cause shown, the court, or master is of opinion that the injunction ought to be granted without bonds."

This provides that in case a person has an injunction served on him or is enjoined to cease doing anything, the person so enjoining shall be required to giv bonds to cover the damage done the defendant, in case the injunction proves to be unjust. For instance, a man is building a house, and his neighbor concludes that when the structure is up it will prove a damage to him. So he has an injunction issued to hav the building stopped. This will necessitate the stoppage of all the hands on the building, and everything in connection with its erection must cease. Anyone can see that this would involve a big expense to the builder. To cover the damage thus accrued, in case the injunction proves to be unjust, the law requires that the complainant shall giv bonds.

If such bonds were not required, we should be exposed to the caprice and malice of any unprincipled person who might, to annoy us, keep asking a continuous round of injunctions on the pretext of various "grievances." This would not only be very annoying, but would involve much expense on the part of the person enjoined. But the statute, to prevent such annoyance and injustice, provides that bonds must be given, except in cases where "the court, judge, or master is of opinion that the injunction ought to be granted without bond." The framer of this Sunday bill would claim, perhaps, that it should come under this provision of the statute, thinking that Sunday desecration is so clear an offense as to require no bonds. But he was not so clear on the subject when he was framing section 3, for there we are left in doubt as to what are works of "necessity or charity." And the only way to find out what such works are is to get "enjoined" and go before the court for a decision. Could anything be worse? Leave a law so loose that we cannot tell just what it means, and then hav the effrontery to presume that an injunction provided by such law was so obvious and palpably clear that the complainant, no matter who, if he be only "aggrieved," may pray for an injunction without giving bonds

There are diversities of opinion in regard to works of "necessity or charity," as well as works of privilege among many who observe Sunday; and there is also a respectable class of Christians who do not believe in keeping Sunday at all, but observe the original Sabbath or Saturday. And still outside of these there is a large number who claim the privilege of skepticism in regard to all religious beliefs, and consequently hav no conscience upon any Sabbath. All of these classes hav a right to protection in a civil government, and none should be allowed to set up his conscience as a standard, and compel the rest to come to it. But this bill, if passed, would allow the narrowest-minded zealot in the land to harass with impunity his less enthusiastic neighbor. For, mark you, "any person aggrieved" may file a petition for injunction without giving bond for the same. It will surprise us to learn how easily some persons are "aggrieved" on this subject. When prominent clergymen within the last year of this enlightened nineteenth century will say, "Nothing outside of the home and the sanctuary is proper recreation for the Sabbath day," and, "O for a breath of the Puritan!" anyone can see that they are only waiting for such laws as the foregoing to furnish them the unobstructed opportunity of making their ideas and desires felt. The above is only a sample of the kind of legislation that is being asked in so many places in favor of Sunday. Again, fellow-citizens, let me ask, Are you ready to accept such laws and be subject to the intolerance of religious bigots who are even in our enlightened day clamoring for law that they may compel, under pains and penalties, the observance of religious dogmas? The bill closes thus:

Sec. 5. Subject to the provisions of this act, and of other laws of this state, all persons may spend Sunday in any orderly and peaceable manner, as they deem proper, and no person shall be prosecuted, harassed, or annoyed under color of this act for anything done on Sunday, which is not prohibited by some law or ordinance, or which is not in its nature offensiv and contrary to the peace and good order of society.

This section would seem to giv some privileges after all in advance of the "Puritan Sabbath." But take the bill as a whole, and how much is not prohibited by some law or ordinance? Section 3 makes everything unlawful on Sunday except circulating books, tracts, and papers, the sale of medicin, the delivery of milk, and the running of railroad and street-cars and "works of necessity or charity;" and we are assured that this law is only an initiatory step toward the stricter legislation that is to follow later on. And while this last section might seem at first to soften the whole bill, yet in reality it is only a blind to lead us into the narrow confines of the ideal of the Puritans.

With all the history of religious intolerance coming to our minds, are we ready to be drawn into the same thing again? The great clamor at the present time for civil law to enforce religious beliefs and observances should arouse every American citizen from his feeling of security, and cause him to consider whether he is ready to submit to all the intolerance resultant upon a union of church and state.

Mr. Seaver in a Horse-car.

Told by Himself in the Investigator.

The little wayside incidents of life are sometimes amusing as well as instructiv. Here is one of recent date. The other morning an Infidel in a horse-car who was looking rather serious and solemn on account of ill health, was asked by a lady of eighty odd years if he was not "the Rev. Mr. ——?"

"No, madam," was the reply; "I am very thankful that I am not a reverend, for I think it is the most foolish and arrogant title that can be applied to a human being. I understand that it is used but once in the Bible, and then it is applied only to God—'holy and reverend is his name.'"

"Excuse me," said she, "for speaking to you; but I thought I saw you at our church last evening."

"No, madam," he replied. "There you are out again. I don't go to such places."

"You don't!" said she, with a look of amazement; "pray, how do you pass your Sundays?"

"Very well, as it seems to me," was his reply. "A part of the day I go to Paine Hall to hear that excellent lecturer, Mr. L. K. Washburn, and the rest of the day I work at my business."

"What!" she gasped, "work on the Lord's day!"

"Even so," he mildly replied. "I hav a great opinion of work. Your minister works in his pulpit on Sunday, and I work in my office. Besides, I read in the Bible that Jesus says, 'My father worketh hitherto and I work;' and if the father, son, and your minister work, I don't see any harm in my working."

"Do you believe the Bible?" she inquired earnestly.

"Some of it," he replied. "When Jesus says, 'Do unto others as you would hav others do unto you,' and 'Why even of yourselvs judge ye not what is right?" he taught very good precepts; but as for the Old Testament, I think it one of the worst books ever printed."

"I am very sorry to hear you talk so," she replied; "but I hope you are not a wicked Infidel."

"Madam," he said, bowing low and with a graceful wave of his right hand, "I hav that honor"—and here the car stopped.

The passengers who overheard this conversation, which is not a fancy sketch, seemed to enjoy it as much as did the plainspoken Infidel.

What Does it Mean?

From the Alexandria, Minn., Post.

What means the introduction of a Sunday bill and a resolution for a change of the Constitution by Senator Blair, so as to secure certain religious observances, and the first and second reading of that bill in the Senat without a dissenting vote?

What means the petition favoring the passage of the bill circulated in our streets, and the presentation of the names of five millions of petitioners by the National Reform Association, the Evangelical Alliance, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union, for the enactment of those laws?

What means the invitation to the Catholic church, by the National Reform League, to coöperate in these measures?

What means the command of Pope Leo XIII., that all Catholics should do all in their power to cause the constitutions of states and legislation to be modeled on the principle of the true church?

What means Cardinal Gibbons, a prominent Catholic, being taken as an exponent of seven million two hundred thousand Catholics in favor of the proposed measures?

Does it not mean a gigantic conspiracy to revolutionize our government, and in its stead to establish a theocracy or ecclesiastical government?

New York's Progress.

The Independent has been trying to find out if New York city is growing better or worse, and to that end asked the question of two ministers, one police justice, and the secretaries of the Children's Aid Society, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Society for the Suppression of Vice. With the exception of the secretary of the latter society, they all agree that New York is improving in collectiv morals, and is a much better city than it was ten or fifteen years ago.

Comstock's contribution to the symposium is a screech in his usual key against impure literature—among which he classes "Infidel publications"—and the influences which lead people away from the church. Comstock keeps up his reputation for piety and mouths religious phrases with rather more frequency than he did ten years ago, but whether this is a substantial growth in grace or only progress in hypocrisy is left for those who support him to determin. Eleven years ago he announced that the publications of Freethinkers were in a fair way to be stamped out, and by the bitterness of his allusions to the Infidels and opponents of Sunday legislation it is evident that his will is still good in that direction, though he is unable through lack of power to do much stamping at present. He draws what he calls a dark picture of New York, and the colors with which he paints it, aside from the muck-heaps wherein he habitually dwells, and from which he gets a living, are "Infidel publications," "absence of any pronounced religious efforts," "ridiculing of sacred things, scoffing at religion, blaspheming the name of God and ignoring the claims of God's word," "ranting blasphemies of the so-called Liberal press," and "efforts to break down the Christian Sabbath and remove Bible restraints." We are, he says, "in the midst of a harvest of irreligion, skepticism, and immorality, resulting from the seed-sowing of the past." The animus of all these vituperativ writings is to show that Saint Anthony is the one man to save the city, and contributions are earnestly solicited. The howl, however, will hav little effect, except among churchmen ignorant of the society's history and burning with zeal to run the whole world in their own little narrow groove. These fellows are never happy unless they are forcing some one to conform to their ideas, and to them Comstock seems the most likely instrument through which to work.

The most valuable paper in the collection is by Judge Kilbreth of the Court of Special Sessions. There is no religion in it, but many facts, and it is therefore entitled to credence. He states:

"In 1888 the number of arrests in this city was 83,617, and the number of arrests in 1874 was 84,821, a decrease of nearly one and one-half per cent in fourteen years. I hav selected the year 1874 for comparison because it is the earliest year for which we hav any complete official and reliable statistics relating to crime in this city. That the selection may not be deemed unduly advantageous to my contention, I add that the number of arrests in 1875 was 84,399, and in 1876 it was 87,397. Since the last-named year the number steadily and regularly decreased until 1882, when it amounted to 66,867. From 1882 there has been an increase from year to year until in 1888 the number, as I hav stated, reached 83,618. A considerable part of this increase since 1882 is due to the movement for a more rigid enforcement of the excise laws, which was initiated at that time and continued to the present time. The effect of the increased activity of the police in this direction during this time upon the aggregate number of arrests is indicated by the fact that in 1888 the number of arrests for violations of the excise laws was 5,610, whereas in 1874 it was only 130. Nobody believes this wide discrepancy in the number of arrests for offenses of this kind represents any substantial or even appreciable difference in the number of such offenses actually committed in the two years, because it is contrary to the experience and observation of all. It is matter of common notoriety and of fact that such offenses were as freely committed in the earlier as in the later year, and were more flagrant because unconcealed and apparently unrestrained. I think, therefore, that the comparison with the year 1874 is even more favorable to last year than the number of arrests indicates.

"In 1888 the number of arrests upon the various graver charges classified as felonies, was 4,369, as against 4,621 in 1874, showing a decrease of nearly five and one-half per cent.

"In 1888 the number of arrests for misdemeanor was 15,838, as against 12,798 in 1874, showing an increase of nearly twenty-four per cent. This increase is more than made up of excise cases, which constitute more than thirty-five per cent of the total arrests for misdemeanor in 1888, and but one per cent in 1874.

"In 1888 the number of arrests for intoxication and for disorderly conduct amounted to 52,762, as against 61,470 in 1874, showing a decrease of more than fourteen per cent.

"In 1888 the number of arrests for juvenil delinquency was 575, as against 874 in 1874, showing a decrease of nearly thirty-five per cent. I regard this as especially suggestiv.

"In 1888 the number of arrests for vagrancy was 5,108, as against 3,139 in 1874, showing an increase of more than sixty per cent. A very large proportion of those reported as arrested for vagrancy are not criminals, but voluntarily surrender themselvs to the court for commitment. Their misfortunes are often due to no fault of their own. A large number, also, are transient among us, and are attracted to our city on account of the assistance so generously extended to those who are idle or in want."

Of real crimes, the decrease is noticeable by a large actual percentage, while the population has increased during the period covered by these statistics from about one million to something over a million and a half. Keeping a store—even a saloon—open on Sunday is only a statute offense, and vagrancy is as often due to misfortune, as Judge Kilbreth says, as to a deliberate and perverse determination to not labor for a living. Judge Kilbreth's facts, it is seen, do not at all harmonize with Comstock's view that New York is retrograding because of the progress of influences hostil to Christianity. It is rather the other way. What Comstock regards as the seeds of crime—nay, as a crime in itself—seems to work exactly opposit. An actual decrease of crime occurs during the growth of public sentiment away from religion. This shows that worldly wisdom and not religion is the true civilizer. Comstock should retire to a monastery and ponder on this.

The Episcopal Church.

A subscriber in Omaha, Neb., propounds the following:

"In order to decide a dispute, will you be kind enough to state in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER when, where, and by whom the Church of England, known as the Episcopal church, was first established? One party maintains that it was established in the first century of the Christian era, and that Peter and Paul were Episcopal bishops, while the other party contends that it had no existence until the sixteenth century, when it was founded by Henry VIII. of England."

In this, as in all church matters, authorities conflict. The facts seem to be about as follows: Christianity was introduced into England when that country was part of the Roman empire. It did not, however, obtain a very strong foothold, and until the sixth century was confined to the northern parts of the island. In 596 St. Augustine went on a mission to England to convert the heathen Saxons. His mission seems to hav been a success. Of course he established Catholicism as it was at that date, and which the English church now claims to hav been substantially Episcopalianism. The Christians existing there previously were of the same sort as those in the Roman empire contemporary with them. What is now the Greek Catholic church is the direct successor of those times. In the sixth century there was but this Christian church, aud the doctrins of the church in England were of course the doctrins common to all Christendom. The pope was not the absolute spiritual monarch he is now, and did not become such till the division of the church into Eastern and Western churches. At the time Augustine converted England, the creed of Catholicism did not contain the teaching of purgatory and pardons. These were not adopted till along into the twelfth century, and the idea of papal supremacy was not admitted till the eleventh century. As these constitute some of the more radical differences between Catholicism and Episcopalianism, the Church of England claims that it was practically established in England when the first inhabitants were converted, and legally in 597, when St. Augustine converted Kent. They claim, also, that the church established by Henry VIII. was only this primitiv (or old Catholic) church, and their pretensions hav some basis in history. The fight was over the question of papal supremacy; whether the pope or king should appoint bishops; and when the church in England united with Parliament to put an end to appeals to Rome, and to the claims of the popes to a right to confirm bishops (which under certain circumstances had been stretched into a claim to the right to nominate), they held that they were merely going back to the Catholic doctrin (which they thought true) of episcopal and national supremacy in local affairs. To conquer the pope and overthrow his power Henry VIII. dissolved the monasteries and confiscated the property.

The war between the two was contemporaneous with the greater Protestant Reformation, and the men in power in the Church of England were influenced by the Reformers. Had not the death of Henry occurred, it is probable that England would hav been wholly converted to Protestantism. The Catholic church called the English churchmen heretics, and on the accession of Queen Mary the church was forcibly suppressed. The authority of the pope was restored and strengthened. The sects fought and butchered each other in the regular religious manner. Cranmer and Ridley, the Episcopal leaders, were burnt. Then Queen Elizabeth got possession of the throne, and she leaned toward the so-called heretics. One of the prayer-books used previous to Mary's reign was again adopted—concessions being made both to the Roman Catholics and the Puritans, who began to be troublesome about then—the pope excommunicated Elizabeth, and the English had their religion cut and dried for them. The Catholics worshiped with them, and only withdrew in 1570 on the order of the pope. Some of the extreme Protestants followed suit ten years later, and what were left were the state religious party and the Church of England. The Prayer-book was amended twice, the tendency being to go backward, and during the civil war the church was suppressed. It was restored in 1650, since which time we had it the Church of England as it stands to-day.

The church historians claim that their doctrins and their existence date back to the apostles, and that the church has had a continuous existence both in law and fact since 597. Neither claim can be maintained, for their doctrins are not now the same as Saint Augustine's teachings, and the Rev. Edward Venables, chaplain to the bishop of London and precentor and canon of Lincoln, writing for the Encyclopedia Britannica, says that with the ancient church the later Episcopal church has no connection. The church was also suppressed in the reign of Mary, and during the civil war, though it maintained its existence in fact.

Whether Peter and Paul were bishops or not, is one of those hair-splitting theological questions which are best settled by rejecting the New Testament a an authoritativ religious work. Paul lived and preached, but that he was or thought he was a bishop in the Christian church as we know bishops and churches to-day is preposterous. Venables frankly avows that "any conclusion drawn from the use of the word 'bishop' in the New Testament, as to the existence of the episcopal office [in apostolic times] would be fallacious." And everything in regard to St. Paul's exercising the office is hung upon the text that he had to bear in his own person "the care of all the churches." This burden being greater than he could bear, it is supposed he delegated others to help him, and texts in 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus are quoted to support the theory. We should say, however, that he was more of a general sexton, with some helpers to sweep out and build the fires, than a bishop who managed the spiritual department and kept up the supply of preachers. The authority for calling Peter a bishop is, if possible, more shaky than that for Paul. In fact, we hav no authentic history relating to them, and know almost absolutely nothing about them.

The dispute is settled therefore in this wise: The English church was not established in the first century, nor can it rightfully claim existence till the time of Henry the Eighth. If Peter and Paul were bishops, more evidence must be adduced than we at present possess.

A Good Amendment.

The bill giving the American Museum of Natural History $400,000 passed the senate with no reference to Sunday opening, but when it got into the assembly, an amendment to that effect was put on, and the bill passed. It is very probable that the senate will agree to the amendment, though it was that body which two years ago defeated a bill allowing the museums $20,000 each annually provided they were opened on Sunday.

Public opinion is now very strong in favor of this improvement, and growing stronger every month. The legislators feel it, and the museum management will also feel it pretty soon. They are holding doors to that must be opened, and the sooner they step away the less danger there will be of their flying heels over head when the locks giv way.

New York is too big a city, and too cosmopolitan, to be governed by puritans. The ideas prevalent two hundred years ago are not held generally at present. King Canute could not stop the rising tide, nor can the preachers of New York control public sentiment. Out of the way, gentlemen, and let the procession pass! Otherwise, you probably will get stepped on.

A Little Family Jar.

A remark made by the Investigator a few weeks ago to the effect that ex-preachers are a damage to Liberalism because of a tendency on their part to "construct" it as they constructed Christianity, has roused Mr. Shaw, of the Independent Pulpit, to come to the defense of his ex-reverend and present brethren. This he is the more ready to do as the Investigator's "indiscretion has been seized upon by a vulgarian whose coarseness and brutality place him beyond the pale of respectable notice, and used as a text for depreciating the labors of ex-preachers in the Liberal field." This severe characterization is intended for Dr. Monroe, of the Ironclad Age.

Mr. Shaw makes out a good case for ex-preachers, as indeed there is no reason why he should not. He does not claim superiority for them, but puts them to the test of service and manhood, and judges them by their record. "Ex-preachers," he says, "hav usually been serviceable to Liberalism, and Liberalism has, with great wisdom and justice, appreciated their services as they deserve, and this is the first attempt we hav yet seen by a respectable Liberal journal to stir up any spirit of antagonism on that ground. Ex-preachers generally bring to Liberalism minds well posted and trained to think and speak, and the vindictiv persecution that usually follows them very naturally makes them all the more zealous in propagating their new ideas." The tendency to "construct," of which Mr. Seaver complains, Mr. Shaw cannot find. "In the first place," he goes on, "these men hav not been trained to 'construct' things 'to suit themselvs,' as it so erroneously assumes. Of all men, preachers hav the least liberty in constructing their creeds. Their creeds are given to them ready-made, and the quickest way for one to get out of his church is to dare to 'construct' things 'to suit himself.' Subordination is the first lesson a preacher learns, and if he succeeds in keeping the good will of his church for any great length of time, he must work in subordination to his superiors in office. The Investigator's fling is, therefore, pure bosh."

Mr. Shaw then comes down to facts. He has heard that Thomas Paine was once a preacher, but without dwelling upon that rumor, he reminds our Boston friends that Abner Kneeland, who founded their able journal, was once a reverend, and that Robert Taylor, whose books they publish—and exceedingly valuable works they are, too—used to preach from "God's" pulpit before he did from the "Devil's." Looking over the field to day and noticing those prominent and effectiv as Liberal workers, he finds the ex-preachers keeping up their end of the row in a most commendable manner. There are Miss Gibson (once a chaplain in the army), Parker Pillsbury, Photius Fisk (chaplain in the navy), L. K. Washburn (but Mr. Washburn never was ordained), J. H. Burnham, S. P. Putnam, C. B. Reynolds, W. S. Bell, R. B. Westbrook, and several others, not to mention Mr. Shaw himself. If these are to be thrust into the background, asks Mr. Shaw, "who will take their places? They are no better than the few noble workers who were never so unfortunate as to be preachers, but are they not just as good? Does the Investigator think that Liberalism can be benefited by stirring up a feeling of class enmity within its ranks? We do not, and we deprecate such expression more especially from a source we hav learned to love and respect, as we hav the Investigator and its veteran managers. Such bigotry can be indulged in without any hurt to our cause by a brazen braggart, but in the columns of the grand old investigator it can only be mischievous and hurtful.'

Although making it a rule never to interfere in other people's arguments, we find, on consideration, that Mr. Shaw is right. The editor of the Investigator undoubtedly only meant to rebuke those ex-reverends who push themselvs forward to the detriment of our cause, and we think did not hav any of these mentioned in mind when he wrote the paragraph to which Mr. Shaw objects. Ex-preachers are just like ex-blacksmiths or ex-doctors. They hav been brought up to a trade or profession, and when they leave it, its methods undoubtedly influence them for a time. Take John Peck, for instance; he is an ex-blacksmith and he likes to pound the church and make the sparks fly as he used to do when bending over his anvil. His blows are heavy and honest ones, and do a world of good. More power to his elbow and a wider circle of readers. Doctors usually attack the church scalpel in hand, and lawyers generally make their points in legal phraseology. It's all in a man's training. A minister is a talker and ready for the rostrum as soon as hatched. Vide Pentecost. They are good recruits; and when trained by experience make good leaders.

In the same issue of the Pulpit Mr. Shaw reasons with an editor of his own old faith. He says:

"The creed-bound editor of the Texas Christian Advocate, failing in argument, has sought to get even with us by intimating that we are il-Liberal. It is funny to observe this truckling bigot, who is not Liberal enough to be courteous and act with journalistic dignity, applying the epithet 'il-Liberal' to us. When he rises to the hight of being Liberal enough to give half the courtesy to Liberalism that we hav given to orthodoxy, then we will try to settle the question of who is Liberal and who is il-Liberal."

The fun of the thing is the frank language Mr. Shaw uses. He is the mildest and gentlest of men, and has always been exceedingly careful not to hurt the feelings of the Christians he has left by using harsh words. Only a few months ago he protested to us that Heston's cartoons were too acrid and would injure the sensibilities of people. He wanted to win with sugar, and Heston's conceptions were not only vinegar, but gall and wormwood. Now he is himself scattering hard words around with a skill and effectivness that must make his adversaries wince. We hasten to assure him of our regard and affection before he turns his pen this way.

St. Patrick and Our Statesmen.

There isn't a historian dead or alive who has told or could or can tell us anything authentic about St. Patrick. Dr. McGlynn thinks he was born of a French mother and a Romanized German father. Writers giv his birthplace all the way from Austria to Scotland, and his date from 397 to 465. No one knows, and if we except the Irish and the politicians who want their votes, no one cares. If he lived, he was probably a decent enough man as men went in his time. The Catholic church has manufactured a good deal of history about him, which is just as good and truthful as most of the chronicles invented by that church. His chief claim to notoriety is that he is alleged to hav converted pagan Ireland to Christianity, a feat concerning the utility and wisdom of which there may be two honest opinions.

St. Patrick is supposed to hav died on March 17th. Why his biographers chose that date for his demise no one knows. But it is so set down, and that is the day Ireland celebrates. If they would confine the celebration to that country we should never object to the most unbounded exhibition of joy over the death of the saint. But the admirers of Patrick are not content to hold their wake by themselvs; they must force everyone else to keep it, too. This year they owned New York for three days. The 17th was Sunday, so they couldn't hav their public parade, and they celebrated on Saturday and Monday. Our Roman Catholic board of aldermen and our Roman Catholic mayor ran up the Irish flag on the public buildings. The Friendly Sons of the saint had a dinner on Saturday, at which all the prominent politicians appeared, blarneying the Irish and Ireland, and squinting over their shoulders to see if the Irish voting public heard them. Sunday a large contingent of the worshipers of Patrick—not the speakers at the dinner, but the unwashed who looked up at the windows while they were orating—turned up in the police courts, and were let off because it was Ireland's great day. Monday there was a parade and great festivities, and more dinners by the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the Sons of Temperance and Irish societies galore, and more blarneying of Ireland with an eye strained to catch sight of future votes. Democratic and Republican "statesmen" vied with each other in spreading trails of sugar to the ballot-boxes. If we could believe their speeches, America owes all she has or will be to the emigrants from Ireland, and the United States without Ireland would be poor indeed. The newspapers followed the clatter, and lied as vigorously as the orators. It was a three days' hooraw for the Irish and a carnival of buncombe and blarney. The brogans of our Milesian citizens are probably cleaner than they ever would hav been through any effort of their owners. But if our "statesmen" and editors like the taste of dirt, it's their privilege to eat it.

All this is dollars and cents and power to Rome. The priests own the brogans, though voters wear them. The city treasury and offices might as well be turned over to Archbishop Mike Corrigan at once, that aspiring candidates for municipal, state, and national positions could go direct to him to make their bargains. It would save them much hypocrisy, and would be precisely the same thing in the end.

Editorial Notes.

THE Omaha World denies the report that Anthony Comstock has ordered the hoops of barrels worn inside, out of sight.

FRANK EVERLY, Marion, O., writes that he has about one hundred copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER which he will send free to anyone who can and will distribute them where they will do the most good. This is an excellent opportunity for zealous workers.

MR. WATSON HESTON has been sick for several days, and consequently unable to draw more than one picture for this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We judge from the cartoon forwarded that his illness has been aggravated by the ding-dong of the church bells of Carthage. The other members of the Freethought family will be as glad as we were to learn that his convalescence has advanced to a very healthy stage.

MR. THOMAS L. NIXON, Freethinker and prominent citizen of Tacoma, Washington, is advocating in the Morning Globe of his city a scheme to make elections fall on Sundays, so the suburban workingmen can deposit their votes without losing a half or whole day's wages. The editor indorses it as "a good idea." This is Europeanizing Sunday with a vengeance. France holds her elections on Sundays, and a full vote is usually polled. The custom might be adopted here with advantage.

THE Christian Advocate, Methodist organ, makes the charge that over one-third of the naval chaplains are off duty, and "some of them engaged in other work, while regularly drawing their not illiberal salaries." One of them, after having been on sick leave for four years, is now to be retired, and the Advocate shouts that unless a Methodist is selected in his place, that church will not hav its share of Holy Joes in the service. That's right, neighbor; divide up the earth and the fulness thereof among the saints; no one but Christians hav any rights in the country, and it isn't wrong at all for them to steal from the taxpayers. What are we here for if not to support the preachers?

IN the first half of last month the Associated Press correspondent at Danville, Ill., had an item of news. It read like this:

"Fannie Mann, Annie Lee, Douglas Cole, Jacob Grimes and wife, and Charlie Grimes and wife, of Blunt township, Vermilion county, were baptized by immersion, yesterday, a few miles west of this city. The Rev. Mr. Hodge, of Catlin, and John Lee, of this city, performed the ceremony. A large hole had been cut in the ice, and the minister took the thinly clad and shivering converts, one of whom is a chronic invalid, and another a young mother, one at a time, into the water, which is five feet deep. A blizzard and snow-storm were raging, and it was so cold that ice formed on top of the pool and stiffened their garments as soon as they came out of the water. On completion of the ceremony they walked in their stocking feet a quarter of a mile through the fields to the nearest residence to change garments."

The next day he had another morsel of telegraph news to send out, and this is his dispatch:

"MRS. McMANN, ONE OF THE WOMEN IMMERSED THROUGH A HOLE IN THE ICE AT BLUNT, SUNDAY, IS DYING FROM THE SHOCK TO HER NERVOUS SYSTEM."

Is there another system of religion in the world which makes such insane fanatics as the Christian system?

Letters from Friends.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot well afford to do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I find more substantial food for thought in it than in any paper I ever read. J. R. BARRY.

PACIFIC, MO., Feb. 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I love THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cause, for it is mine also; and therefore I inclose for another year's subscription, with twenty-five cents added for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, with my best wishes to all concerned in the cause. The paper is rich and highly interesting. Truth will at last prevail, if persevered in, and if bickerings are thrown overboard by over-zealous bigots on both sides.

Yours truly, AUG. H. KRUGER.

SANTA ANA, CAL., Feb. 9, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to giv a word of praise for the cartoon on the last page of February 2d issue, "Trying to Get God in a Good Humor." I hav not fully sympathized with all the past pictures, because I thought them too "strong meat." Of course, the great aim of these pictures is to convict the Christian of the absurdity of the Bible being a book inspired by a good and wise intelligence. There is not the least exaggeration in this picture of drying heads, and it must produce a profound impression on all Christians who see it. Let the good work go on. D. EDSON SMITH.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Feb. 11, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2.50 for four copies of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889, and L. K. Washburn's "Cosmian Hymn Book," as you advertise.

This winter, January 9th and February 7th, we are having a series of lectures from those grand champions of Secularism, B. F. Underwood and Chas. Watts, with marked success. They certainly are doing noble service for the cause of Freethought in Utah in the several towns where they lecture. They leave a favorable impression on the Mormons that hear them; thus we are led to hope for the "redemption of Utah" by conversion of the saints to Secular principles. We are gaining some ground. HESTOR W. HAIGHT.

RIDGEWAY, MO., Feb. 6, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.50, for which send me five TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS and one Paine's "Age of Reason." I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for nine years. I think it one of the grandest papers in the world, and I would not do without it for twice what it costs. There is quite a good lot of Liberals in this neighborhood. But some of them are a little afraid of Mrs. Grundy. There are some getting more Liberalized every day. I think I can get a subscriber or two in the spring. When I renew my paper I will try them again. Several hav been reading my paper here lately, and said they would like to hav the ANNUAL. I think that if we could get a good lecturer in this place, he could do a good work. With best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER and all connected,

Yours for the truth, E. M. GILES.

PINE RIVER, Feb. 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: After some hard work for considerable time, and with the aid of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hav been able to organize an auxiliary Union to the American Secular Union. We obtained ten subscribers and $5, the wherewith to send for the charter, and we expect to enrol several new names when we get our papers. There was quite an interest manifested by the people present, some of them expressing themselvs as desirous of further information on the subject of Freethought. The Nine Demands were read, together with the constitution, by the chairman. After the papers were signed, we took up a collection for the purpose of starting a Freethought library, and $10 was the result, which I send inclosed to you for Freethought literature. I think all Liberals should work for organization, as by agitation we set people to thinking, and thought leads to investigation, which is sure to advance our cause.

I advise you to keep Heston at work, and let us hear from Slokum, as people like to laugh when they won't do anything else. CLARENCE HENSLEY.

HARWICH, Feb. 4, R.M. 289.

MR. EDITOR: Within find $4 $3 25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, and seventy-five cents for THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months to Nathan S. Smalley.

In Harwich about one-half of the inhabitants are Freethinkers, and upon the shoulders of the other half Christianity hangs loosely, and yet I almost as well might try to get subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER among the Christians as among the Freethinkers. I called on a rich Freethinker yesterday, who was exceedingly eloquent in his denunciation of the Bible and Christianity, and yet he takes no Freethought literature and manifests an utter indifference as to whether it is disseminated or not. If I were to go out to solicit subscriptions, I would start in among a people who had never heard of Freethought papers, for the novelty of the thing would help me out better than the philanthropy of the "Liberals" of this town. They recognize the fact that the world moves, and claim that it cannot retrogress, and when they are told that it moves because of the persistent efforts of reformers, the answer is, "Oh, there will be somebody to work, and they can't help themselvs! There will always be some who will take hold and push the work along." Thus, because the world is sure to move in the right direction, they hav no need to trouble themselvs. A curious position to take.

One of your six months' subscribers stopped taking THE TRUTH SEEKER because he thought you advocated Anarchism, but I hav sent him to you again. Would it be too much to ask you to set him aright, after you hav explained your position so many times? For my part, I can say THE TRUTH SEEKER is a model paper. I don't see how it can be made much better. The illustrations are whole lectures in themselvs. Through them the Bible loses its sacred polish, and its unequaled absurdities cannot but be recognized by all lookers-on except religious fanatics or idiots. I am glad that THE TRUTH SEEKER is sustained so well by such matchless writers; I am proud of them. And the Corner, too, grows better and better. Miss Wixon seems to improve with age, and, being yet in her prime, will teach the young ideas how to shoot clear of the blasting influences of superstition. B. F. ROBBINS.

DUNNVILLE, KY., Feb. 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a welcome visitor, and is doing a good work here. Several of my neighbors after having read it and other Freethought papers and books of mine, had the courage to throw off the shackles of superstition, and accept the grand truths of Infidelity and Liberalism.

The cartoons are a splendid feature of your paper, and speak more than words. I wish you would hav them published in pamphlet form; I think they would find ready sale.

The egg problem is still agitating the minds of your readers, and many different answers hav been given. I hav a problem I wish to submit to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. A certain man made an experiment in cattle-raising, commencing with one cow. She brought a calf every year, and each of her calves, when two years old, brought a calf every year, and so on to all the calves that were born during a period of ten years. Supposing every calf to hav been a heifer, how many cattle did this man hav on hand at the expiration of ten years from the beginning of the experiment?

With best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER,

I remain, J. A. WINFREY.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 50 for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is the best Liberal paper in the world. There are thousands of men who are radical Infidels who will not admit the necessity of a Liberal press, or Liberal agitation. These men, if the church should ascend to power and dethrone Uncle Sam, and begin to turn on the screws, would be the first to complain. They will then bitterly denounce the Liberal press for not being able to swim and carry them. They expect a diamond to shine after being covered with generations of dust which they refused to remove.

Mr. Editor, it is not my luck to be advanced in history, though what I hav I am willing to use as far as I can, but coming in contact with all sorts of people, of all sorts of opinion, I found, upon investigation, that many times I was mistaken. I read Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe," and his "History of the Conflict Between Religion and Science;" Buckle's "History of Civilization," works on evolution and the science of geology, and became perfectly satisfied that the Mosaic account of the creation of the world is not true, and that the Bible was not revealed or inspired by a deity, but is the work of man, more particularly the work of the priesthood and clergy, since I hav been an open advocate of Liberalism and Freethought. I hope you will pardon me for making so free with your Liberal paper. I am an old subscriber; hav taken your paper for many years. I hav learned more from it than I ever did at Sunday-school. I hav learned to think for myself; learned to love my family—not to teach them the eternal hell.

J. G. O'HARA.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., March 2, A.S 289.

MR. EDITOR: I dislike personality, and hence will let this apply to any who are so rigidly orthodox in their Liberalism that they would deny the right to Spiritualists to defend their philosophy through the columns of the truly Liberal old TRUTH SEEKER.

Modern Spiritualism is not religion; it is a positiv, provable fact, or it is nothing. Nobody, not even Christians themselvs, pretend that Christianity is based upon fact, or even upon common sense, but upon faith alone, which means a sort of fraudulent, visionary nothingness, and hence past finding out.

There can be no such thing as Christian Spiritualism, Christian science, or Christian civilization; all these Christian inconsistencies savor rankly of the Irishman's white blackbird. We who read THE TRUTH SEEKER during the editorship of its great founder know that he left nothing uncovered as far as he went; Spiritualism pure and simple had a hearing before this great reformer as well as Agnosticism or downright Atheism. He who deludes himself with the childish notion that we can afford to throw overboard the honest, upright part of our Spiritualistic fraternity should remember that our Nine Demands are yet to come up for trial, and will need all our united strength, and possibly more, to enforce them. The time has not yet come to decide what may or what may not be true in regard to all the wonderful phenomena that hav so agitated the civilized world even in our own time. What are we to do with Professor Hare's work? and are we to smile contemptuously at the laborious researches of Robert Dale Owen? And what should one think of Sir Walter Scott's feeble attempt to explain, according to his Christian standard, his facts anent "Witchcraft and Demonology?" And is it an unaccountable mystery that America's greatest benefactor, the never-to-be-forgotten Thomas Paine, should hav found nothing more wonderful in the theory of a future life than there is in the present life?

And yet some few (thanks to the good sense of Liberals that there are but few) are urging the Editor from time to time to "cut loose from this humbug," or words having the same effect. Somebody said, "United we stand; at variance we fall." Then let us remember, when the time comes to try our strength at the polls, we shall sorely need the aid of all our Spiritualist friends, who at the present time outnumber us at least two to one. NELSON HUNT.

CEDAR FALLS, IA., Jan. 29, 289

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav taken the paper ever since it has been printed in New York, and do not want to be without it.

Thanks to Heston, the pictures are just splendid. My children think ever so much of the "Children's Corner."

It seems to me that some of the editorials in THE TRUTH SEEKER sound like Bundy, Underwood, and Abbot. Please put your head over a barrel some time and say it over and see if it doesn't sound so to you.

There are a couple of gospel-pounders holding meetings at our school-house. They claim, I believe, to hav converted a prostitute, but she never was anything but a Christian and was brought up in the Sabbath-school. We hav been compelled to pay taxes to furnish wood and to build schoolhouses. For the last twenty years the meeting-folks hav used the house and burnt the wood with impunity every Sunday, and sometimes every night in the week for from four to eight weeks at a stretch. This although I hav remonstrated against it many times, and the constitution of the state says no one shall be taxed to support religion; but this is the way that Christians impose upon Infidels. They hav stoned me, egged me, blown their noses in my face, set their children hooting after me in the streets, sworn falsely against me, charged me with forgery, adultery, and slander when I was not guilty of any of these things, and, worst of all, tried to get my wife to leave me and break up my family—all this and much more I hav received from the followers of that meek, lowly Jesus that said, Think you that I came to send peace on earth? I tell you nay, but a sword.

Yours truly, M. W. ST. JOHN.

UNITED STATES MILITARY HOME, WIS., Feb. 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I learn by the public press that Mr. Comstock is still engaged in prying around to find some work of art portraying man and woman as they came from the hand of their creator, that he may drag the owner before a court of "justice" and fleece him of his surplus dimes, or send him to prison.

If it be immoral, indecent, and obscene for man to produce "like forms, which sculptors make and then love to agony," was it not immoral, indecent, and obscene for God to set the example? It appears to me Comstock and his supporters are giving the God of Moses a slap in the face.

And what are the Prohibitionists, among whom are a large number of Christian theologians, doing? They are following in the footsteps of a Parsee priest who a few years ago, in a discourse to his church, said: "A man who encourages his followers to indulge in wine-drinking is not a fit teacher for the people." This was, it may be presumed, an intended smiting on the cheek of the Christian's God, Jesus. Yet we hear these Prohibitionists crying with a loud voice, "Amen!"

If the drinking of spirituous liquors is so damaging to the human family, how is it that those nations that use such beverages are to-day the most advanced in all the arts of civilization, whilst those that practice "total abstinence" are, and hav been for centuries, at a standstill?

It may be that the Comstockers, the Prohibition party, and the God-in-the-Constitution party will go so far that the slumbering masses will leap to their feet, and wage such an opposition to these cranks that they and their Gods will be swept out of existence, as many other gods hav been. I. C. B.

SAMOTH, ILL., Feb. 14, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Please accept herewith the necessary amount for papers to be forwarded as by note inclosed.

I wish to say that since my letter of January 1st I hav met with some trouble from the parents and neighbors of my young subscriber of late to THE TRUTH SEEKER. The father of this youth is a strictly honest man, a veteran of the late war, and as so has had some religious, or irreligious, experiences in his travels, and has gained some common sense and reason. But his good wife—the best of wives—is a great slave of her creed; hence the rule! Said she: "That paper shall not come in my house, and the first one introduced shall go into the fire" (she did not say brimstone). As I hav often business to transact with this family, and fearing that the lady would be liable to mistakes, mistaking me for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and casting me in her fire, I postponed my visits for many days. But the ice was to be broken! What was my astonishment when I received a hearty welcome, and what was my joy to find our TRUTH SEEKER in the hands of the whole family and read by them, too—more than I can state here! Suffice it to add, Hurrah for our cause! I shall try again.

Selah! We hav gained our point. The Christian church out here has discovered that which we as Liberals could not unearth! We hav in this burg a literary debating society, and on the 8th of this month their leader (sic), of the Campbellites, invented the theory that the Christians as a whole should not hold public offices, and should not vote at all nor put their noses in our public affairs! That is it. The judges in this twaddle, selected, of course, by this pretentious leader, hav decided in his favor. So this question is settled for the whole Union, because that which is not decided by Samoth has not weight in other localities! Could we not, as scientists, hav found out this to be the best way of turning these Christian impostors out of our politics? Why did we lose this chance, and be beaten by these superstitious cranks? Well, let us be glad that the ball is started. Let us giv it a "push."

We are again up in full blast. A Campbellite pulpit-pounder has been found—nobody knows where—but he being a very fat fellow, he should be in full strength to demolish the old, rotten planks of our joss-house. Oh! to see our ladies fly about is worth all promis of heaven. And although our people are over their ears in debt and mortgaged by the last failure of crops, and corn-bread, beans, and bacon be now a luxury to them, they must in honor to this sky-pilot kill all their chickens, bake pies, etc., in order to sustain him through his ten days of shouting to the clouds, and then hav this devil to pay largely, and suffer to the end of this year for their unpardonable stupidity. O for a black suit of clothing and some black fable-book! Now that I am out of office, would I not start out preaching, too? There is not only money in it, but glory also. And, as I am aware that there is no need of brains in this job, I am satisfied that I am very well qualified to preach their gospel, and that I could also well pass my hat and receive tithes, too.

Although I did not write the letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 1st with the intention of gaining notoriety, I hav nevertheless received many complimentary letters from strange Liberal friends, and on this occasion I hav to offer my heartfelt thanks to my French friends, H. W. Hammon, of Orange, Mass , O. B. Lambott, Ingersoll Camp, Pipestone Spring, Mont., and to all other friends who hav honored me by such favors. Fraternally yours in Universal Mental Liberty,

D. L. D'ELYSÉE.

CINCINNATI, O., Feb. 10, E.M. 289.

MR. EDITOR: I had the honor of a theological controversy with a very orthodox Christian gentleman a few days ago, and from opinions dropped by him at the time I was almost persuaded to judge that the Liberals of this country are treading the verge of a precipice, and only awaiting the action of the church to be hurled into the depths below. Now, my private opinion is that the aforesaid Liberals hav still a tolerably firm footing upon the rock—although it can not, under any circumstances, be compared with the Christian foothold, established as it is upon the rock of ignorance and superstition. I therefore venture to giv my own opinion, and in return should like to receive yours. I am well aware that it is a hard struggle to combat against the well-filled pocketbooks of those who hav the greatest interest in sustaining this delusion, and deeply deplore the fact that there are so many so-called Liberals who are possessed of ample means to no longer be compelled to fear the consequences of airing their honest opinions, and to exercise the liberty which a free country and ample access to science and investigation hav allotted them, but who are still nominally clinging to this three-headed monster for the sake of the few "In God We Trusts" they are enabled to obtain by this procedure.

In reading a story not long ago, I saw the description of a "little streamlet running away in a silver current to turn the ponderous wheels of a mill." Is it not, therefore, reasonable to conclude from all evidence that it is the "silver current" in this country which keeps the ponderous wheels of the gospel mill a-moving? At any rate, we notice that it is turning in excellent proportion to the amount of currency supplied, and if the supply should cease for a while the mill would not hav time to grind out so much falsehood and intolerance, and its millers would be compelled to find honest employment either as school-teachers or something less. It was also in conversation with the Christian gentleman that the question concerning the so-called sacred relics arose. He maintained that the garments exhibited from time to time as being sacred by their relation to Christ, were genuin, as well as the relics of the true cross. Now, does it not seem probable, or may it not at least be rational to suppose, from all evidences we now hav extant, that he either was not so poor as depicted in the Bible, having such a vast quantity of garments, or if he did hav, does it not appear as if the temperature of the country in which he is supposed to hav lived had experienced a wonderful change? We presume it has, for, at the present time, a single coat is sufficient for most men in that latitude, and even this need not be so heavy as some of the garments shown. As to the relics of the cross, may it not be just as reasonable to suppose, considering the powerful incentiv for so doing, that the wood, which has been produced in sufficiency to erect a building as large as the Capitol at Washington, instead of being taken from the "true cross," may hav been taken from the "cross"-beams of some deserted slaughter-house? If this be not the case, we hav not only to conclude that there is a wonderful variety of timber in the market which once composed this cross, but we must further conclude that Christ was possessed of an incredible quantity of the vital fluid. I read in one of our papers here about the sale of "sacred blood" at the very moderate price of three drops for $10. In regard to this magnificent money-making fraud I can only say, considering the fact that Christian intolerance forbids scientific investigation, it may be as well to suppose—from the fact that canines are becoming rather scarce, and the gamins cannot find any place for their tin-can appendages—that the blood has been been procured from the ruthless slaughter of the lineal descendants of the animal buried at Valladolid, Spain, and mentioned in Taylor's "Diegesis," for we know that the people who are generally engaged in this trade are not inclined to approach so near martyrdom as to sacrifice their own precious blood. But the Christian version concerning the article will go down just as easily as anything else, and where ignorance is bliss, 'twere folly to be wise.

IPOMEA NOCTIPHYTON.

OTTAWA, ONT., Feb. 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I read your article entitled, "The Cardinal and the Premier," in your issue of February 2d, with a feeling of indescribable sorrow. It is astounding to me that a man in your position—a molder of opinion, a reformer—should so forget his mission as to allow his prejudice to blind his faculty of justice. Yet you, the Editor of the leading Freethought paper of America, hav given evidence of a lack of impartiality—of a tendency to jump at conclusions—that one would expect to find in a Methodist elder only. In the article in question you represent the French "Kanucks," as you call them, as wife-beaters, given over to religion and rum. You assert that they treat their wives like beasts and their children like dogs. I maintain the assertion is false. There is not a country on earth where the husband uses his wife and children more humanely than do the French Canadians. The respect the children bear their parents is ample proof of what I here assert. A few years ago the Harpers sent one of their staff to write up the province of Quebec, and although the articles that subsequently appeared in their Monthly were anything but partial to the French Canadians, although the correspondent made all the capital he could out of the people's superstition, yet he admitted that a more industrious, honest, and cleanly people did not exist. Your national glory, Parkman the historian, has repeatedly said the same. And these two men, with many others that bear the same testimony, had mingled with this people, had traveled through the country, while you, who so mercilessly revile and slander them, hav evidently never set foot in the province of Quebec. Wife-beaters forsooth! It was given to a freeborn citizen of the United States to giv the inhuman spectacle of a husband tearing and plucking out of their sockets the eyes of his helpless wife! They are given over to rum-drinking, say you. The statistics prepared by the Dominion government of Canada for 1888 do not bear you out in this; they show that more spirits are consumed, per capita, in the States than in Ontario, and less in Quebec than in Ontario. The most cruel charge you make, though, is when you say, "The men are thoroughly bad, the women worse." I remember that some years ago Robert Ingersoll would not condescend to answer a Chicago minister who had attacked him in the press, because this minister had given utterance to words not flattering to American ladies. The colonel deemed that a man unscrupulous enough to insult the ladies of his country was not worthy the notice of a gentleman. Yet you, a disciple and admirer of this great man, hav not hesitated to bespatter with the mud of calumny the mothers of a nationality!

There is not a city in the United States with a population of five hundred thousand that does not record more murders in one year than the whole of the province of Quebec does, with its two million inhabitants. The French Canadian mothers hav numerous children, but an illegitimate birth is almost unknown among the women and girls of that nationality, while they do not know the meaning of the word abortion. So much for morals. Hav you many states of which you could make the same boast, with as little fear of contradiction? That they, the French Canadians, are given over to religion I admit—that is, the generation now dying out—but the reason is obvious to any observing mind. When England took possession of Canada, all the French colonists of wealth returned to France, not wishing to remain and liv under English rule. There remained but sixty thousand of the poorest class, impoverished by a long and ruinous war. The immigration soon poured from England, and these poor colonists were soon surrounded by an unsympathetic element. Without schools, or means to establish them, they had to fall back upon their priests, who were but too willing to take charge of the education of the children. Unfortunately, they taught more Catholicism than science, and the following generations became undoubting believers. The result of this religious education is felt to this day. But travel through the province of Quebec now, as I hav; mingle among the growing generation, and you will be astonished at the spirit of inquiry and doubt prevailing among them. I honestly believe that within twenty years the province of Quebec will hav made more progress toward the truth and the principles of Freethought than any of your Eastern states. You say you hav observed the French Canadian in the New England states, and hence your opinion. You must hav been unfortunate and hav come in contact with the scum of the nation, and pray what nation has not its share of that undesirable class? Frankly, what is a reader of the article in question to think of your consistency when you, a believer in evolution, hint it as a mark of inferiority in the French Canadians of the United States that they "drive the New Englander out of his woods, the shoemaker from his shop, the Massachusetts girl from her loom, and the honest Yankee laborer from his farm?" How do you make the hint implied agree with the theory of "the survival of the fittest?" Really, I looked for more justice in the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and would never hav believed that he could hav made such sweeping and damaging assertions with as little ground. It proves that the Presbyterian is not quite evoluted yet from some of our Freethought leaders. Respectfully, L. F. MATHÉ.

NEW YORK CITY, Feb. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am an enthusiastic reader of your most valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. And as I see you hav space reserved therein for "Letters from Friends," and as I am a friend both to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the cause it represents, I thought perhaps a small contribution from me would be acceptable. Of all the papers and periodicals I read THE TRUTH SEEKER is by far the most highly prized by me. The sentiments and principles advocated and championed by THE TRUTH SEEKER are my sentiments and principles. I am an "Infidel," and glory in the appellation. I no more believe the Bible to be a God-inspired book than did the great apostle of truth and Freethought, Thomas Paine. Neither do I any more believe that the human race began by the creation of Adam, or in fact that anything at all was created by an almighty God, than did the great, scientific Darwin. I believe with him that everything that exists came by perfectly natural laws and evolution. An acorn planted grows, and finally develops into the great oak. It goes through all its natural stages of growth without the aid of God or man. Each succeeding spring we behold new grass, green, fresh, and beautiful. I can no more believe that any superhuman power that must be exerted by a God is necessary or does control the growth of that grass or of any vegetable or plant that grows than I can believe that Moses wrote a book wherein he describes his own death and burial. I hav perhaps had a better opportunity of understanding the Christian religion and the beliefs thereto attached than most Infidels. And as this may come into the hands of some one who may be blindly believing in those things merely because he was brought up so to believe, as was the case with me in my early boyhood; and hoping it may be the means of helping such a one out of the darkness of superstition into the broad light of truth, and from the thralldom of a vengeful God to mental liberty and a more perfect manhood, I will, briefly as I can, giv my experience with the Christian religion and the church. Both my parents were strong Christians and members of the Methodist Episcopal church. My father, dead now about nineteen years, was superintendent in the Sunday-school and a class-leader. I hav a brother now in college preparing for the ministry, and I myself was named after an old Methodist minister. Queer stock out of which to make an Infidel, is it not? From my cradle the doctrins and beliefs of the Christian religion were inculcated into my very being. I was taken to church as regularly as the Sunday came, and was so fairly nurtured upon religion that it was impossible that I, a mere boy, could do anything else but believe it. When only twelve years of age I was taken to revival meetings by my mother and prevailed upon to go up to the altar and seek my soul's salvation. I went. The good brothers gathered around me and talked to me, telling me all that was necessary for my salvation was for me to believe that I was saved. Well, young as I was, and with little thought or mind of my own, I believed all they told me, and they finally convinced me that I was indeed saved—had escaped hell and made my title sure for heaven. Mr. Editor, just imagin a young boy of twelve years taught from his cradle up to believe in a heaven and a hell, and that I must eventually fetch up at either the one place or the other, with the glowing descriptions they giv of heaven and the horrible ideas of hell—could it possibly be otherwise than that I should feel happy and highly elated over my escape from such a horrible place as hell and being convinced I was on a straight road to heaven? Well, the next thing I must join the church; although they told me I was already converted and sure of going to heaven, still I must join the church, so that by constant intercourse with the Christian brethren and sisters I should grow in grace and in knowledge, and not be drawn back into the world again. Well, I think I remained a believer about four or five years at most. Then I began to think and reason for myself. I began to notice inconsistencies and hypocrisy in church-members, and having read the Bible a great deal, I began to notice so many perfectly horrible tales and impossible stories, that I speedily became very doubtful of even the existence of such places as heaven and hell, and that there really was a God, and that the Bible was his inspired word. One of the very first inconsistencies that I remember as striking my mind was that God should create man on purpose to send him to hell. For according to the Bible itself, the heart of man is above all things deceitful and desperately wicked. Now, if God is an all-wise being, he must hav known when he created man with a naturally desperately wicked heart that man would naturally and unavoidably sin. Yet after creating him so that he would sin, he sentences him to everlasting torture for so doing. That was more than I could blindly swallow, even if I did go to hell for daring to doubt "God's word." I could not see any loving God about that, or one that thinks more of us even than earthly parents do of their children. Then, as I began to think on these things, I began to read different scientific works, and among other things Paine's "Age of Reason," and I hav gradually but surely come to my senses. No superstition for me. No worship of an impossible deity. I believe not in God, but in man. My one great wish is that I could so plainly show the falsity and deceitfulness of the Christian religion and the worship and fear of a phantom creature of men's minds, that some one, if only one, should be brought into the broad light of truth and mental liberty. I would rather be the means of helping some poor, downcast fellow-man to a better and happier position in life, and do such deeds of kindness and charity toward my fellow-men as come in my way, and I hav the power or means to do, than to giv five minutes of my time to the aid and support of such a monster as the God of the Bible, if such a being existed. I am a Liberal, and am heart and soul, if I hav such a piece of machinery about me, with the cause of Liberalism. I hav already circulated several TRUTH SEEKERS among friends whom I thought might thereby become subscribers thereto. I am willing to do what little I can for the furtherance of Liberalism and Freethought and the glory and mental liberty of mankind. My home is in Rahway, N. J. I do not know of many Freethinkers there, yet I do know of two or three, so that I am not alone, even in a small city like Rahway. I see by my TRUTH SEEKER of last Saturday, the 2d inst., that the paper for February 16 h is to contain an important debate, and will, therefore, be a good one to distribute with the aim of getting new subscribers. Inclosed please find twenty-five cents in stamps, for which please mail me five copies of that date. THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a great work for Liberalism and for mankind, and may it long liv so to do. May its noble Editor liv to see the last trace of superstition and dogmas forever banished from our fair land and Liberalism universally triumphant. Then, and only then, will man hav reached the high estate of real manhood, and will himself be the nearest possible approach to deity. CHARLES L. DUNHAM.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Marline-Spike.

"John Kelly!" Loud rang the court-clerk's call,
The spectators craned their necks
For a glimpse of the incoming criminal,
While the justice rubbed his "specks,"
As a small, thin boy to the bar was led,
And on tiptoe grasped the rail.
"Are you John Kelly?" the justice said,
With a frown at the features pale.

"Yes, sir!"—the answering accents strike
The air with a sort of moan—
"But it's mostly as Little Marline-spike
That on shipboard I am known."
"The charge?" "Your honor, 'tis drunk he was,"
The policeman makes reply.
"Come, now, John Kelly, show fitting cause
For a small boy getting high."

"Please, sir," falters out Little Marline-spike,
"It wasn't my fault, you see.
I've a cabin-boy been, and it's much I'd like
A cabin-boy still to be.
But my size is ag'in me. All yesterday
I was seekin' a chance to ship,
Till almost froze by the wind at play
Over wharf and pier and slip;

"When a man sung out from a bulkhead shed,
'Come and hav your New-Year's ashore!'
And he gave me to drink what turned my head,
And I never knowed nothing more.
Till they said I was tryin' myself to drown;
But I wasn't allowed my like."
"So, so," said the magistrate. "Step down,
My poor Little Marline-spike.

"Go, look for a ship once more, my dear,
And, if still in vain, be brave,
For I'll warm your body with better cheer
Than the man on the bulkhead gave."
Then, again, the judicial spectacles
Were rubbed, as if somewhat blurred;
While the prisoner tiptoed higher still,
And the chink of a coin was heard.

And as Little Marline-spike steered his way
Through the peopled room, to begin
His lonely voyage of life anew
Through the ocean of guile and sin,
A sound of applause, like the breaker's roar
That welcomes a ship to port,
Came murmuring up from the dusty floor,
And he bowed his thanks to the court.

European Superstition.

Superstition is defined as faith in omens, and excessiv credulity. It existed to a great extent in Europe, and seems to hav reached its hight at the end of the fifteenth century. A belief in witchcraft was almost universal, as will be shown in the remainder of this article. If anyone had a peculiar pain in any part of his body, or suffered misfortune in family or affairs, or if a storm arose and did any damage by sea or land, or if any cattle died suddenly, these calamities were supposed to be caused by witchcraft.

If the persons accused of witchcraft did not at once confess, they were shaved and a close examination was performed for the discovery of "devil's marks," for it was then a strong belief that the devil, when making any witch, impressed certain marks on her, and if any of these were found, the person's guilt no longer remained in doubt. When this performance failed, torture was applied, and this generally made the unhappy wretches confess and be forthwith led to execution.

So as to illustrate this matter, I will giv facts which were collected from different books. "Cumanus, an inquisitor, burnt forty-one poor women for witches, in the county of Burlia, from 1485 to 1486 A.D. He continued the prosecutions the year following, and many fled out of the country." "One inquisitor burnt one hundred in Piedmont, and proceeded daily to burn more till the people rose against the inquisitor, and chased him out of the country." "A.D. 1488. A violent tempest of thunder and lightning in Constance destroyed the corn for four leagues round. The people accused one Anne Mindelin, and one Agnes, of being the cause of it. They confessed and were burnt." "About the year of 1515 five hundred witches were burnt in Geneva in three months, and in France many thousands."

Between the years of 1590 and 1620, a strong belief in witchcraft prevailed in Scotland and England, and terrible prosecutions took place every day. It was the "Scotland of Knox and Melville" that existed at the time of these witch-tortures, and at this time the kirk (church) was the ruling power. A woman was burnt at St. Andrews, Scotland, while Knox was living there, and a word from him would hav saved her. Some time before the sixteenth century, trouble arose in the family of the earl of Orkney. His brother planned to murder him, and was said to receive help from a "notorious witch," Alison Balfour. When her life was examined nothing could be found concerning this strange affair or witchcraft, but it was sufficient in those days to be accused. She swore she was innocent, but her guilt was made worse by perjury. Her lower limbs were put in an iron frame called caschilaws, which was heated until it burnt into the flesh. This failed, though done repeatedly, and they thought they could make her confess by torturing those she loved. Her husband, son, and daughter were tortured in this manner. The husband was put in the long irons. She endured this; her son's legs were then placed in the iron boot, the wedges of which were driven home by fifty-seven mallet strokes which crushed the bone and marrow. These horrible things failed to draw any confession, so the little daughter of seven years had a thumbscrew, called piniwinkies, applied, which brought blood from under the finger-nails with a terrible pain, and as the mother could not stand this she said that she would grant any wish. She confessed her witchcraft, was then burnt, and her dying words were those of her innocence. "We should not attempt to apologize for these things, still less to forget them." MARGARET S. COLVIN.

Omaha, Neb.

Mr. Fisk and the Sparrows.

Mr. Photius Fisk, the well-known and honored philanthropist of Boston, has a keen sense of humor, and likes a bit of fun as well as the next one. He is in the habit of dividing his bread in the morning with the sparrows and doves, who seem to know their benefactor as well as those who walk and talk and liv in houses. Mr. Fisk breaks off the crust, which he soaks for his own breakfast, and sets the soft, inside part of his bread aside for the birds, and when Mr. Hodge, his faithful friend and attendant, remonstrates at this, the kind-hearted gentleman says, "Why, Hodge, their little beaks are not strong enough to tear the crust in pieces, but I am able to soften it for myself." When Mr. Hodge goes out for his own breakfast, he carefully crumbles and scatters the morning repast for the birds who gather in the lane back of the church on Clarendon street.

One morning on Mr. Hodge's return, Mr. Fisk inquired, "Did you feed the sparrows this morning, Hodge?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"Were there many present?"

"Yes; there was a large congregation. They were holding a prayer meeting in the lane when I got there!"

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Mr. Fisk. "They are Presbyterians, probably."

"Yes, very likely. They held a communion service after I broke bread," said Mr. Hodge.

"Ha, ha, ha," again laughed Mr. Fisk. "Had they any wine at their communion?"

"No; I forgot to take a bottle of that cherry brandy of yours."

"Then you did not administer the whole of the sacrament?"

"No; the 'holy spirit' came down from the roof of the church near by in the form of a dove to administer the last part of the sacrament; that is, one might suppose so, as I saw a beautiful white dove descending from the roof of the aforementioned church as I passed."

There is probably as much sense in the communion of the sparrows in the rear of the church on Clarendon street, as there is in communion of the saints inside the building.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

A Washington seven-year-old received, among numerous Christmas presents, a little pocket diary. The entry, "Jan. 24, 1889, he didn't," created some surprise, until she gave the following (in a tone of injury): "Johnny Smith" (a little neighbor) "said he was coming over to see me, and—he didn't."

Little Alfred, whose birthday occurred the other day, got up on the first snowy morning last week, and looked out of the window at the world covered with white. "O mamma!" he exclaimed in almost breathless excitement, "it's all just one great birthday cake!"

I had been reading to him—he is a sunny-haired little four-year-old—the story in Arthur's "Child's History of England" of Prince William's drowning: "And when the news reached the king that his only son was lost at sea, it is said he covered his face and wept; and no one ever saw him smile again."

"But are you sure he never smiled again?" "Quite sure; at least the history says so." After a moment's deep thought: "You are really sure, Cousin Florrie?" "Yes." "Well, then, what did he do when they tickled him?"

A friend of mine was speaking to his small pupils of the remoteness of Christ's birth, and then proceeded to ask each of the children how old they were. Each gave her age until he came to Rosie Moore, who said: "I was six years old the other day, but I could hav been borned long ago if I wanted to."

Mother (severely): "Robert, you did very wrong to do what I told you not to do. As a punishment for your disobedience, I forbid you to play with Willie again this afternoon." Bobby and Willie twist nervously about their respectiv chairs for half an hour, when Willie observes: "Ma, do you think it's fair to punish both of us for what Bobby done?"

A lady living in Ohio is the mother of six boys. One day a friend calling on her said: "What a pity that one of your boys had not been a girl!" One of the boys about eight years of age overheard this remark, and promptly interposed: "I'd like to know who'd 'a bin 'er? I wouldn't 'a bin 'er; Ed wouldn't 'a bin 'er; Joe wouldn't 'a bin 'er; and I'd like to know who'd 'a bin 'er?"

Cosy Chats with Correspondents.

Eleanor B. W., Linwood, O.—The sentiment of the poem is good, but the construction is incomplete. Apply the rules relating to poetry, and you will agree with us that the article would read better written in prose.

Joseph, Lancaster, Pa.—We do not know of any really free agents. People are fettered, bound, and hampered by various circumstances from the cradle to the grave. It remains for us to do the best we can under all circumstances.

Jack Hanson, Cincinnati, O.—Mind is a faculty, or attribute of the brain. We do not know anything of that which you term "the soul." It is a mystical, fashionable something of which people talk, but concerning which nobody knows anything.

Mary Lathon.—The medicin referred to is Spa Aqua Herbalina, a remedy fully indorsed by the editor of the Corner. For liver, kidney, and bilious troubles it is a specific. For further information inquire of J. Waters, West Sutton, Mass.

Augustus Bradford, Philadelphia, Pa.—We are glad you are pleased with our story-books. We cannot say when we shall write another book. Yes, it will help us to extend the circulation of those already written.

Correspondence.

WESTBORO, Feb. 25, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. And, as I take much pleasure in reading the letters of your little contributors, I hope this will find a place in the Corner. I am nine years old and attend school. I am in the fourth grade. My studies are reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, geography, and music. My teacher takes much pains to instruct me. My aim is to gain knowledge, which is better than wealth, and prepare myself to go out into the world to do my part in behalf of mental liberty.

I hav a little brother seven years of age. His name is Willie. He goes to school, and we hav nice times coasting on Saturdays.

I will close. With love from one of your little friends, STEPHIE T. MARSHALL.

GRANTFORK, ILL., Feb. 19, 1889.

DEAR MISS S. WIXON: What I wish to say is in regard to the Casey dime fund by Miss Satie Thorpe. Some of them responded at every time there was a fund started. Now I hope that those that havn't sent anything yet will send in some. He writes me that he is sick in bed now himself with pneumonia and Mrs. Casey is no better, and they only hav a thirteen-year-old boy to depend upon. Now, if those persons that hav not sent in anything would read his letters they would respond immediately. So I hope that all will send in their mite to the fund, for they need it badly, and I know Mr. Casey will be grateful for it, if it is small. Yours for Freethought, NICHOLAS J. KRAFT.

P.S.—Please find 25 cents for the Casey dime fund.

OMAHA, NEB., Feb. 24, 1889.

MISS WIXON: I thought I would write this essay for the benefit of the readers of the Children's Corner. I hav read your books for the third time and hav sent for "For Her Daily Bread." The discussion and funeral address in THE TRUTH SEEKER were splendid. I went to hear the ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds when he lectured here. We go to the Unity church and Sunday-school, and inclosed you will find a report of one of the sermons. Oliver wants me to tell you that he goes to Sunday-school and learns verses, as—

Make life and death one vast forever,
One grand, sweet song, and his teacher explains them to him. She gave him a pansy ribbon, and told him that when he looked at it he was to think he was a pansy, and help his mamma all he could. I will now draw to a close. From your Liberal friend, MARGARET COLVIN.

[We are pleased to hear from Maggie once more. Ollie must be grown quite a boy by this time. Thanks for essay.—ED. C. C.]

Science Column.

The Thermometer.

Doubtless most of our young friends hav seen a thermometer. Very probably many of them hav one. But I doubt that a great number of the children of the Corner know much about it, beyond the fact that it is an instrument for measuring temperature.

We take a thermometer and look at it. We find that it consists of a glass tube, one end of which terminates in a bulb. The bulb is hollow and the tube has a fine, hair-like bore, and they contain either mercury or alcohol. We know that heat expands substances and cold contracts them, so we see that the mercury that is in the bulb will expand or contract according to the temperature to which it is exposed. As the mercury in the bulb expands it rises in the tube; as it contracts it falls. We know the exact temperature by the position of the top of the liquid column on the scale.

The invention of the thermometer, like many other great inventions, has been claimed for different philosophers. But there are only three whose titles to it are worthy of notice.

The Italian writers credit their countryman Santorio with the invention. This man flourished at the beginning of the seventeenth century and was for a long time a physician at Venice and afterward a professor at Padua. He obtained just celebrity by his discovery of the insensible perspiration of the animal frame. On the other hand, the Dutch philosophers ascribe the invention to Cornelius Drebbel, a physician of Alkmaar, who had a high reputation as a chemist, a mathematician, and an inventiv mechanical genius. The invention is also ascribed to Galileo.

It would be improper, at this late day, to attempt to decide who is entitled to the honor of this discovery, but it is to be remarked that Santorio was born in 1561 and died in 1636, and did not publish his claim to the invention until 1626; and although thermometers are alluded to by Robert Flud, an Englishman, within the first quarter of that century, yet, as he traveled both in Germany and in Italy for six years, no inference can be drawn from that circumstance. But it is certain that thermometers were constructed about the same time, both in Italy and in Holland, and on the same principle.

But whoever is entitled to this honor, the instrument, from its imperfect construction, was of very little use, and required the successiv labors of different philosophers to render it an accurate indicator of the variations of temperature. As first made, the instruments were unwieldy, and could not be applied to high temperatures. This imperfection was removed by scientific men, and by successiv improvements the thermometer at last reached its present perfection.

Poetry.

The Confessional.

SPAIN.

It is a lie—their priests, their pope,
Their saints, their . . . all they fear or hope
Are lies, and lies—there! through my door
And ceiling, there! and walls and floor,
There, lies, they lie—shall still be hurled
Till spite of them I reach the world!

You think priests just and holy men!
Before they put me in this den
I was a human creature, too,
With flesh and blood like one of you,
A girl that laughed in beauty's pride
Like lilies in your world outside.

I had a lover—shame avaunt!
This poor wrenched body, grim and gaunt,
Was kissed all over till it burned,
By lips the truest love e'er turned
His heart's own tint: one night they kissed
My soul out in a burning mist.

So, next day when the accustomed train
Of things grew around my sense again,
"That is a sin," I said; and slow,
With downcast eyes, to church I go,
And pass to the confession chair,
And tell the old, mild father there.

But when I falter Beltran s name,
"Ha!" quoth the father; "much I blame
The sin; yet wherefore idly grieve?
Despair not—strenuously retrieve!
Nay, I will turn this love of thine
To lawful love, almost divine.

"For he is young, and led astray,
This Beltran, and he schemes, men say,
To change the laws of church and state;
So, thine shall be an angel's fate,
Who, ere the thunder breaks, should roll
Its cloud away and save his soul.

"For, when he lies upon thy breast,
Thou mayst demand and be possessed
Of all his plans, and next day steal
To me, and all those plans reveal,
That I and every priest, to purge
His soul, may fast and use the scourge."

That father's beard was long and white,
With love and truth his brow seemed bright;
I went back, all on fire with joy,
And, that same evening, bade the boy
Tell me, as lovers should, heart-free,
Something to prove his love of me.

He told me what he would not tell
For hope of heaven or fear of hell;
And I lay listening in such pride!
And, soon as he had left my side,
Tripped to the church by morning-light
To save his soul in his despite.

I told the father all his schemes,
Who were his comrades, what their dreams;
"And now make haste," I said, "to pray
The one spot from his soul away;
To-night he comes, but not the same
Will look!" At night he never came.

Nor next night: on the after-morn,
I went forth with a strength new-born.
The church was empty; something drew
My steps into the street; I knew
It led me to the market-place:
Where, lo, on high, the father's face!

That horrible black scaffold dressed,
That stapled block . . . God sink the rest!
That head strapped back, that blinding vest,
Those knotted hands and naked breast,
Till near one busy hangman pressed,
And, on the neck these arms caressed. . . .

No part in aught they hope or fear!
No heaven with them, no hell!—and here,
No earth, not so much space as pens
My body in their worst of dens
But shall bear God and man my cry,
Lies—lies, again—and still, they lie!

—Robert Browning.

Down to the Capital.

I' be'n down to the capital at Washington, D. C.,
Where Congerss meets and passes on the pensions ort to be Allowed to old one-legged chaps, like me, 'at sence the war
Don't wear their pants in pairs at all—and yit how proud we are!
Old Flukens, from our deestrick, jes turned in and tuck and made Me stay with him while I was there; and longer 'at I staid
The more I kep' a-wantin' jes to kind o' get away,
And yit a feelin' sociabler with Flukens ever' day.
You see, I'd got the idy—and I guess most folks agrees—
'At men as rich as him, you know, kin do jes what they please:
A man worth stacks o' money, and a Congerssman and all,
And livin' in a buildin' bigger 'an Masonic Hall.
Now mind, I'm not a-faultin' Fluke—he made his his money square.
We both was Forty-niners, and both busted gittin' there;
I weakened and onwindlessed, and he stuck and staid and made
His millions; don't know what I'm worth untel my pension's paid.
But I was goin' to tell you—er a ruther goin' to try
To tell you how he's livin' now; gas burnin' mighty nigh
In ever' room about the house; and all the night, about,
Some blame reception goin' on, and money goin' out.
They's people there from all the world—jes ever' kind 'at livs,
Injuns and all! and senaters and ripresentativs;
And girls, you know, jes dressed in gauze and roses, I declare,
And even old men shamblin' round and walzin' with 'em there!
And bands a-tootin' circus-tunes, 'way in some other room
Jes chokin' full o' hot-house plants and pinies and perfume;
And fountains, squirtin' stiddy all the time; and statutes, made
Out o' puore marble, 'peared like, sneakin' round there in the shade.
And Fluke he coaxed and begged and plead with me to take a hand
And sashay in amongst 'em—crutch and all, you understand:
But when I said how tired I was, and made fer open air,
He follered, and tel five o'clock we set a-talkin' there,
"My God!" says he, Fluke says to me, "I'm tireder 'n you;
Don't put up yer tobacker tel you giv a man a chew.
Set back a leetle furder in the shadder; that'll do:
I'm tireder 'n you, old man; I'm tireder 'n you!
You see that air old dome," says he, "bumped up ag'inst the sky;
It's grand, first time you see it, but it changes by and by,
And then it stays jes thataway—jes anchored high and dry
Betwixt the sky up yender and the achin' of yer eye.
Night's purty; not so purty, though, as what it ust to be
When my first wife was livin'. You remember her?" says he.
I nodded like, and Fluke went on: "I wonder now ef she Knows where I am—and what I am—and what I ust to be?
That band in there!—I ust to think 'at music couldn't wear
A feller out the way it does; but that ain't music there—
That's jes a' imitation, and like ever'thing, I swear,
I hear, er see, er tetch, er taste, er tackle anywhere!
It's all jes artificial, this ere high-priced life of ourn.
The theory, it's sweet enough tel it saps down and sours.
They's no home left, ner ties o' home about it. By the powers,
The whole thing's artificialer 'n artificial flowers!
And all I want, and could lay down and sob fer, is to know
The homely things of homely life; fer instance, jes to go
And set down by the kitchen stove—Lord! that 'n'd rest me so—
Jes set there, like I ust to do, and laugh and joke, you know.
Jes set there, like I ust to do," says Fluke, a-startin' in,
'Peared like, to say the whole thing over to hisse'f ag'in;
Then stopped and turned, and kind o' coughed, and stooped and fumbled fer
Somepin er nother in the grass—I guess his handkercher.
Well, sence I'm back from Washington, where I left Fluke a-still
A-leggin' fer me, heart and soul, on that-air pension bill,
I've half-way struck the notion, when I think o' wealth and sich,
They's nothin' much patheticker 'an jes a-bein' rich!

—James Whitcomb Riley, in the Century.

The Shipman's Tale.

Listen, my masters! I speak naught but truth.
From dawn to dawn they drifted on and on,
Not knowing whither nor to what dark end.
Now the North froze them, now the hot South scorched.
Some called to God, and found great comfort so;
Some gnashed their teeth with curses, and some laughed
An empty laughter, seeing they yet lived,
So sweet was breath between their foolish lips.
Day after day the same relentless sun,
Night after night the same unpitying stars.
At intervals fierce lightnings tore the clouds,
Showing vast hollow spaces, and the sleet
Hissed, and the torrents of the sky were loosed.
From time to time a hand relaxed its grip,
And some pale wretch slid down into the dark
With stifled moan, and transient horror seized
The rest who waited, knowing what must be.
At every turn strange shapes reached up and clutched
The whirling wreck, held on awhile, and then
Slipped back into that blackness whence they came.
Ah, hapless folk, to be so tossed and torn,
So racked by hunger, fever, fire, and wave,
And swept at last into the nameless void—
Frail girls, strong men, and mothers with their babes!

And were none saved?
My masters, not a soul!
O shipman! woful, woful, is thy tale!
Our hearts are heavy and our eyes are d'mmed.
What ship is this that suffered such ill fate?
What ship, my masters? Know ye not?—the World!

—Thomas Bailey Aldrich, in Harper's.

Truth Seeker Annual.—Review.

I hav read the ANNUAL with great interest. Such a Symposium cannot be less than interesting. Such a consensus of thought cannot fail to be instructiv. It is, however, a matter of surprise to me that such writers as Ingersoll, Putnam, and Washburn should fail to see that Catholicism is a part, and though bad, not the worst part, of the Christian religion. They, and other writers, hav their antipathies wrought into a craze, which appears to blind them to the avowed purposes of, and imminent dangers to our inherent liberties from, the Protestant horde of Christians.

I venture to assert, and am sustained by Buckle, that since the rise of Protestantism in 1520, it has been more intolerant than Catholicism. Let us pit Calvin, Luther, and Knox against the early Christian fathers; let us offset the Spanish Inquisition with the Scotch Kirk sessions; finally, let us add together all the crimes of both Catholicism and Protestantism, and the sum total will be the sum total of the crimes of the Christian religion.

In answer to the question, Which is more dangerous to American institutions, the God-in-the-Constitution party or the Roman Catholic church? the writers named, and others, decidedly fear the Catholic church more. In this, I think, they err. Some others answer more correctly, as I think. Thus, Helen Gardener says, "Six of one and half a dozen of the other."

John Peck, who rarely ever errs, says, "Neither can be trusted," but afterward switches off on Catholicism.

Dr. Juliet Severance says, very truthfully, "Either one in ascendency would destroy all our liberties."

J. H. Burnham says, "The National Reform Association has all the essential qualifications to ruin our national life. That it fully has this determination does not admit of a doubt."

Dawes says, "The Roman Catholic church and God-in-the-Constitution party are, in principle, equally dangerous to American institutions," but turns off into greater fear of Catholicism.

J. D. Shaw, like the first trio, says, "The Roman Catholic church." And so thinks Aunt Elmina.

Kelso counts them one—alike dangerous.

Ella Gibson says, "Either would destroy, both would blot out every vestige of, American liberty."

E. C. Walker, the man who edits the little paper in Kansas, I think wrote more rationally and correctly on this subject than the whole outfit. He said: "The National Reform Association, by all odds, if by American institutions you mean the rights of men and women. Allied as it is with the Prohibition movement, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the Sunday closing crusade, it now largely controls the country and community, and commits more outrages upon individual rights in a week than the Catholic church does in a year." He mentions the school question, and says Protestants hav no more right to tax Catholics for the support of schools in which they do not believe than we hav to be taxed indirectly to keep up the church."

With the Blair bill and amendment, and fourteen millions of petitioners to Congress for their passage, now pending, and threatening by one fell stroke to subordinate the state to the church—to the Protestant church—it is strange that old hates will so blind to present facts that men and women cannot see that Protestantism is our nation's present, most bold, and deadly foe. These are but forms of one religion. They both worship the same, the Jewish, God. I believe in a God of goodness, justice, and mercy; they believe in a barbaric myth. They hav a remarkable sameness. They believe in the same mythic God, mythic virgin mother, and mythic vice-God. They both believe in the holiness of this mother, in the godship of her baby, and in the justness of the murder of this young God. They believe in the same miracles, and hav the same stories about the fall, the resurrection, the atonement, and the trinity, and about the ark, Eden, and the rib Had the Protestants renounced the faith and doctrins of the Catholics they had done well, but they adhere to these, and to the intolerance of the mother church.

These devout Christians hav devoted themselvs for about three hundred and sixty years to beating and killing each other, and to slandering and burning a class of very respectable and intelligent men and women known as Freethinkers.

When there is much discrepancy in numbers, the strong party practices intolerance and the weak pleads for toleration. Lord Baltimore was the first to proclaim toleration in America, because other Christians were persecuting his Catholic brothers in Maryland.

I speak now for toleration toward all the misguided revealed religionists, when our growing civilization shall bring superstition into disrepute. I would uphold the Christian religion if it were wronged, but I commiserate its absurdities and abhor its dogmas and its crimes. When the church was weak it was mild and harmless, till its cause was espoused by the infamous Constantine. After the council of Nice, in 325, it soon became powerful, dogmatic, and intolerant. Since that time it has caused more human suffering, physical and mental—yes, more death and carnage—than any religion or delusion known to history. I speak in the interest of truth and humanity, and in behalf of reason and liberty. We should open our eyes to the fact that Protestantism has already entered Congress as with tomahawk and scalping knife in hand, for the purpose of controling the public schools, to subjugate the conscience and liberties of the people, and to subordinate the civil powers of this government to ecclesiastical domination. Death of Dennis Dowling.

From the Muskegon, Mich., Morning News.

Dennis Dowling died at Lake City on Saturday, March 2d, of inflammatory rheumatism.

The deceased was an old resident of the city and one of the best known practical lumbermen. He was fifty-seven years of age at the time of his death and has lived in this city since 1857. He has been engaged in almost all the practical branches of lumbering and has held responsible positions with various firms. At the time of his death he was in the employ of the Thayer Lumber Company as its representativ in the woods. Mr. Dowling leaves a wife and two children, the daughter residing in Manistee, where she is employed in teaching school.

The funeral rites were conducted by Mr. A. F. Temple, at the special request of Mr. Dowling just before his death. Mr. Dowling was a Liberal.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Gems of Thought.

A JUST man hateth the evil, but not the evil-doer.—Sir Philip Sidney.

THINK'ST thou it honorable in a noble man
To still remember wrongs?—Shakspere.

THE way to get rid of the priesthood is to educate the people to require evidences of what they believe, and to form habits of mind which shall make them as inquisitiv as the followers of priests are credulous.—Gerrit Smith.

To skepticism we owe that spirit of inquiry which, during the last two centuries, has gradually encroached on every possible subject; has reformed every department of practical and speculativ knowledge, has weakened the authority of the privileged classes, and thus placed liberty on a surer foundation; has restrained the arrogance of the nobles, has chastised the despotism of princes, and has even diminished the prejudices of the clergy.—Buckle.

To the poet, to the philosopher, to the saint, all things are friendly and sacred, all events profitable, all days holy, all men divine.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

NEVER was a sincere word utterly lost. Never a magnanimity fell to the ground, but there is some heart to greet and accept it unexpectedly.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

A FEEBLE man can see the farms that are fenced and tilled, the houses that are built. The strong man sees the possible houses and farms.—Emerson.

YOU may build your Capitol of granit, and pile it high as the Rocky mountains; if it is found'd on or mixed with iniquity, the pulse of a girl can in time beat it down.—Wendell Phillips.

TAKE from man all that science has done, and leave him all that orthodox Christianity can do apart from science, and what would he be? No house to shelter him; no garment to clothe him; no machinery to assist him. The great Universe a sealed book; himself little more than a blank on one of its pages. In a cave he would sleep; and when the sunbeams shone therein he would waken to recite his prayers to the Mumbo Jumbo of his creed, who grumbles in the thunders, and shows his anger in the oak-splitting lightning.—William Denton.

THERE is no virtue in the world greater than that of doing good to others.—From the Hindoo.

IT is reason, not revelation, that has taught morality. Locke, in his "Essay on the Human Understanding," givs unanswerable reasons to prove that experience is the true source of morals. Bentham shows that utility is the true test of right, "the greatest good of the greatest number," and Spencer maintains that what are called innate ideas, conscience, and "the voice of God in the soul," are inherited ideas secured by the experience of ancestors. Fourier says pain is the sign of error, pleasure the sign of truth. These are sufficient instructors.—Robt. C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

WHAT is right and what is wrong? Everything is right that tends to the happiness of mankind, and everything is wrong that increases the sum of human misery. What can increase the happiness of this world more than to do away with every form of slavery, and with all war? What can increase the misery of mankind more than to increase wars and put chains upon more human limbs? What is conscience? If man were incapable of suffering, if man could not feel pain, the word "conscience" never would hav passed his lips. The man who puts himself in the place of another, whose imagination has been cultivated to the point of feeling the agonies suffered by another, is the man of conscience. But a man who justifies slavery, who justifies a God when he commands the soldier to rip open the mother and pierce with the sword of war the child unborn, is controled and dominated, not by conscience, but by a cruel and remorseless superstition.—Ingersoll.

IF there be one virtue more important and fundamental than any other, it is truthfulness. The greatest love and reverence for truth, and the most sensitiv shrinking from the least contact with falsehood, are characteristics of the most moral. On the other hand, a disregard for truth, and a tendency to quibble, deceive, and lie, are marks of a low moral nature. This great, if not greatest of all virtues, truthfulness, theology has a distinct tendency to weaken. This tendency is the growth of modern times. When theology as "a theory of things" had the ground all to itself, when faith in its dogmas was undoubting and universal, theology and truthfulness were not inconsistent. One cannot read the letters of such a man as St. Paul, a theologian in a theological age, without seeing at once that he was truthful. Whatever we may think of some of the theories, we cannot doubt the truthfulness of the man. But, in the present day, go into a mixed society, and you find the theologically-minded certainly not conspicuous for truthfulness. Their look and their manner do not impress you with the idea that openness, honesty, and veracity are in them pronounced characteristics. The reason of this is easy to understand. Theology, ever since science became her rival and threatened to supersede her, has felt the necessity of defending herself. How was she to do so? The attacks of science consisted simply in the discovery of truths which were verifiable by evidence. These truths, in many instances, contradicted the theories and assertions of theology. Either, then, the revelations that theology had "accepted" and the creeds that she had "clung to" must, if truth is to be preserved, be cast away, or science must be proved false. The latter was impossible, and the former too painful; the only other course open was the sacrifice of truthfulness. This sacrifice of truthfulness, though very real, is for the most part unconscious on the part of those imbued with the theological spirit. It is truly marvelous what a power a wish exercises over thought.—John Wilson, M.A., in Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

Odds and Ends.

DRY goods merchant: "You hav called in response to our advertisment for a floor walker? Well, sir, what are your qualifications for the position?" Applicant: "I am the father of three pairs of twins."

MAN at the theater box-office: "Hav you any front seats in the upper gallery?" "Yes, sir." "How high is that above the parquet?" "About seventy feet." "Do you think I could see over the millinery down-stairs?" "I think so." "Gimme two."

OLD Mr. Candid (sexton): "The minister told me to close the windie, an' I said tu him as how the young leddy wished it open, but says he, 'I run this congregation! and no lamb shall be lost from the fold with such a overhanging debt on the church.'"

WALT WHITMAN is not without a keen sense of the humorous. An ambitious young poet called on him the other day to show him a MS. tragedy entitled, "Columbus." "Mr. Whitman," said he, "I should like to read you my drama and get your opinion of its merits." "No, I thank you," said Walt. "I've been paralyzed once."

Ticket seller: "Why, you hav your shawl fastened with the diamond pin that the boys gave you for getting them on the pipes last fall. Better leave it with me, or you'll be caught, sure."

OMAHA dame: "How many chaplains are there in the United States army?" Army man: "Thirty-four." "The army is very small, I suppose?" "There are about twenty-five thousand soldiers." "What! Only thirty-four chaplains for twenty-five thousand soldiers? That's terrible!" "Madam, a soldier's first duty is to accept things as he finds them. Visibly annoyed, the stockbroker turned round and spoke in his most dignified manner: "First, you will please in future to address me as Mr. Counselor Hirschberg; secondly, I am not your dear friend; thirdly, by when do you want them?"

MANDY SPILLERS, a colored lady, swore out a warrant against Zeb Snow. "What did this man do?" the justice of the peace asked. "He 'sulted me, sah: dat's whut he done." "How—what did he say?" Reminiscences of a Preacher.
A RADICAL ROMANCE.
By WILLIAM McDONNELL,
Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.
The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future
Republic of North America,
BY A CAPITALIST.
A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.
For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 16. No. 13. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, March 30, 1889. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

A FORCED REST.

Notes and Clippings.

ASH WEDNESDAY no longer interferes with theatrical performances in London. Whereas all the theaters used to close on that day, only two this year paid any attention to it, and these merely announced that they would keep open.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK has a half-holiday bill before Parliament that proposes that whenever two-thirds of the shopkeepers in any given district vote for a half holiday on some one day each week, all the shops in the district shall be closed at 2 o'clock on that day.

PRESIDENT HARRISON plays billiards with his private secretary. Both are church-members and very pious, and it is thought that their example will tend to demoralize the rule of the church against the wicked game. The president also smokes daily and drinks whisky occasionally, and appears to hav considerable human nature about him. His fellow-pietists should hold a prayer-meeting over him.

THE papers which practice a steady toadying to Ireland and the pope's Irish, for votes and patronage, are complaining that ex-President Cleveland's speech at the St. Patrick's day dinner did not allude to the saint at all, nor to Ireland. In the eyes of sensible people this was its strong point. Not looking for votes just now, Mr. Cleveland probably thought he could afford to be a little honest and not praise a "saint" who perhaps never existed, nor blarney the chief supporters of a hierarchy which is doing its best to destroy the land whereon they fatten.

THE Rev. Isaac F. Rowe, president of the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society at Bombay, is convinced with one year's stay in Assam that coolies there are far better off than the poor in England, and that the former hav no grounds of complaint. Christian missionaries, comments the Calcutta National Guardian, are out of date in India, and the sooner they pack off with their institutions and their ideas, and sometimes, their very "honest opinions," the better for the country, and paradoxical though the remark be, for their religion too.

IN a dime museum in Chicago there is a snakeskin pasted upon a framed parchment attached to which are large red scales, accompanied by hieroglyphics which only the scholars are able to decipher, and above all this the startling inscription: "Skin of the serpent that tempted Eve in the garden of paradise. It was killed by Adam the following day after the treason. Adam hit it with a club, of which traces are still left. This skin was part of the inheritance of Adam, and was preserved in his family in Asia. The genuinness is attested by the doctors of divinity, whose seals are attached."

PASTOR MCKINNEY, who has charge of a Baptist church in Ansonia, Conn., recently preached against card-playing. He was decided in his opinion that a Christian ought not to play cards, even whist, in which he could see no science, and laid down these five points: 1. Christians should not play cards for amusement because it is a waste of time. 2. They should not play cards because it dissipates the mind. 3. They should not play cards because the example to others is one that is injurious. 4. They should not play cards because it leads to gambling. 5. They should not play cards because whist, the Christian game, as generally played to-day, is gambling.

THE Evening Sun of Friday the 22d pays its respects to the religious editor of the Mail and Express in these words: "It is difficult for Brother Colonel Shepard to outdo himself, but yesterday he did it, in the shape of simply the most asinin telegram that was ever sent out of an editor's room. This precious dispatch, which should be cherished in the Lenox Library or the British Museum, informed the secretary of the interior that the change in the Senate's hour of meeting from 12 to 1 o'clock was 'a great blow to the evening papers, causing delay in receipt of telegraphic reports of nominations, confirmations, and other Senatorial proceedings, and a corresponding disappointment to the hundreds of thousands of people who leave the cities every day for the suburbs.' The colonel therefore asks the secretary to do what he can 'to hav the hour of 12 reinstated.' For appalling, Brobdingnagian, Himalayan gall, mixed in equal portions with stupidity, this effusion elopes with the whole delicatessen."

COLONEL INGERSOLL was advertised to lecture at the Academy of Music last Sunday night, for the benefit of the Confederate Soldiers' Home, at Austin, Tex., but his engagements prevented. He is one of a committee to raise money for the Home, and has given it a large check. The other day a Christian bigot named G. D. Mackay sent this letter to the committee: "I would feel my sympathies drawn to an object so worthy as this, but the promoters must be blind to the plainest sign of the times when from the Christian people of New York they expect contributions to this cause—and they will get little help from any other—while heading their enterprise with the greatest enemy of Jesus Christ this country has ever seen, namely, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. Nothing will be blessed by his touch, and it is regretted that the work is to be even colored by his assistance, far more, begun and directed. Very respectfully." Mr. Mackay can be satisfied with the assurance that he is one of the meanest Christians in the country—and that is saying a good deal.

THE Churchman holds that although in one sense a church is the house of God, in another it is on the same footing as a club house. Persons invest money in the fabric, the furnishing, and the salaries of those who serve, and those who do not so invest hav really no right to partake of privileges they don't or won't pay for. "Tramps and hearers with itching ears who beat about from one church to another must not be astonished if sometimes they meet with less attention in a church aisle than habitual worshipers and steady, consistent supporters." Speaking on the club idea, the Independent makes this point: "It is to be considered whether a church which is not a church, but a club, has a right to ask the state to relieve it of taxation. If there be any excuse for not taxing a church it is because it is a public benefit. But if it is a private benefit, why should it not pay taxes like any other private club? If the rich are bound to hav their private and extravagant religion all by themselvs, then why not let them pay all its expenses, and not ask the public, the poor public that are shut out of their religious club houses, to help them pay for the protection they receive from the state?"

An Address in Memory of Thomas Paine.

DELIVERED FEBRUARY 3, 1889, IN PHILADELPHIA.

The name we are assembled to commemorate is the synonym of freedom of thought, freedom in religion, freedom in social relations, freedom in political life.

Born in England in 1736, Paine's life embraced the period in European history of the dissolution of the old feudal order, the protest against royalty, aristocracy, nobility, caste, against inequality and oppression of every kind. It was the time of decaying institutions—of tyranny and corruption among the class who embodied those institutions, and of stern protest and heroic endeavor among all who looked to the future, who revolted from the tyrannous oppression of their surroundings, and found hope in the promis of freedom, brotherhood, equality. The American Revolution came and the American republic arose. The French Revolution followed and feudalism fell, Paine doing a noble share toward bringing about both changes. Then, in twenty years, he died, leaving at a time in which in the new western world freedom was no mere chimera.

For in a nation in which there were no sharp distinctions of wealth or poverty, where the possession of land was open to all, and the artisan was master of his own tools, there were the conditions of comparativ equality, and, with equality, freedom.

When Paine died the first railroad had yet to be built in America, the first steamship line organized. The population was diffused, centralization had scarcely begun to make headway. The children of the nation grew up at home, going to school or not according to circumstances, but to work only for the sake of learning a trade or of helping on the paternal acres. Except the slavery of the negro, there was no marked subjection of man to man, but all were equally free and independent citizens of the republic.

The functionaries of the young government were chiefly farmers of moderate fortune like their constituents, or men from the professions or small business circles of those days. Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Hamilton, Jay, Livingston, Franklin, none of them rich men as we count riches, represented fairly that social state in which there were neither millionaires nor paupers nor the economic conditions that breed such extremes. Founded upon such a basis, a government elected by popular vote might well aspire to assure to each of its citizens the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

How changed are the foundations of the republic after one brief century!

The continent is peopled from sea to sea. The oceans are bound together by steam and electricity, miracles which no prophet foretold in the days of Paine and the fathers of the country, and mill and mine and workshop, lumber camp, cattle ranch and oil well, with the help of railroads on land and steamships at sea, hav yielded wealth the like of which mother earth has never seen. Every day when the sun sets $2,500,000 are added in value to the capital of the richest nation of the world. The narrow horizon of the colonial life rises meager and cramped before the mind's eye of a generation whose domain extends from Maine to California, and from the St. Lawrence to the gulf of Mexico. The old Puritan farming states of New England are hives of industry, owned by the stockholders of vast corporations, peopled by the French, Irish, and German immigration of the century. The Great American Desert of Paine's day is the wheat-field of the nation, struggling with India and Russia for the mastery of the market of the world.

The South, the earth's great cotton-field, begins to rival Pennsylvania as a source of mineral wealth, and mining and manufacturing extend their domain with every passing year.

Hand in hand, and step for step, in the progress of conquest and subjugation of the forces of nature, goes the work of centralization and accumulation. Vast cities hav sprung up as if by magic, at the side of every port, in the heart of every great region of mineral wealth; cities peopled not by the sturdy freemen of long ago, but by a horde of men and women and children who toil early and late for the creation of wealth in which they hav no share, a civilization built upon their own enslavement.

In place of the old simple national life of the colonial farmers and the young republic, there stirs throughout the land to-day the unrest of a mighty, unorganized army of impoverished toilers, conscious that their labor is wrung from them, not for the public good, not for the nation's need, but for the enrichment of the few who toil not neither do they spin.

The citizen who voted in the days of Paine and Jefferson in the town meeting upon the schools and roads and taxes kept a keen watch, too, upon all questions of national policy, and judged with the keen insight and decided views of the self-dependent freeman, jealous of all interference with personal liberty. The voter of those days was a landowning farmer or a householding citizen—for all the people held some property—and having a stake in the nation, watched sharply every inroad made upon his property or his freedom.

The proletarian of our great cities, the farm laborer of our bonanza farms, has no property, and none of the civic qualities that accompanied its general distribution. His wages are driven by competition down to the living-point, and the taxgatherer's taking is as nothing to the share of the fruit of the laborer's toil that is taken by the employing, exploiting class.

The men of Paine's time revolted against paying tribute. Taxation without representation is tribute extorted by tyranny, and the men of Paine's day would none of it.

The men and women and children of to-day pay tribute in taxes, in kind, in life itself, to our rulers, the railroad kings, the coal barons, the cattle syndicates, the street-car magnates, the whole exploiting class, the regnant plutocracy.

Monarchy, aristocracy, nobility we hav none, but something quite as bad. For the plutocracy which holds in its vise-like grip the means of production, rules by its own greed, taking tribute in the form of profit not on tea alone, but on all our food, our warmth, our homes, and our walks abroad. Our very messages of love and sorrow, as they speed over the wires, pay their quota of profit into the bottomless coffers of the plutocracy that rules the civilized world.

The money tribute that we pay our masters is the least baleful sacrifice we make. Far worse is the obedience of legislatures, the subservience of the people's servants, the surrender of men's independence, women's purity, and the very childhood of the nation's children, where the whole laboring class depends for life itself upon the chance of working to produce profits for the reigning plutocrats.

I went the other day into the home of a feather-worker, a woman grown, a nativ of our free republic, who earns her bread by toiling ten hours daily for fifty cents a day the whole year through. I asked her to come to a meeting of the women of her trade. Her answer was: "The boss might hear of it. And it is not everywhere you can get the chance of earning fifty cents a day if I lose this work."

The right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness was the proud heritage bequeathed by Paine and his fellow-patriots to us their heirs. And how hav we guarded our inheritance? So ill, that this poor feather-worker is but one of millions of men and women in our free republic who, for the poor privilege of earning their scant portion of daily bread, are fain to cast to the four winds of heaven, without a sigh, the elementary rights for which our fathers fought and died. For freedom of meeting and of speech are the simplest rights of all free peoples.

Under the guise of republican freedom we hav degenerated into a nation of mock citizens, slaves of the exploiting class. And how ruthlessly our rulers play with the destinies of the republic!

The barons of Pennsylvania, the lords of coal and iron, in common with the railroad kings, are pleased to require serfs more abject and degraded than America has hitherto produced, and, presto! their allies of the steamship companies ransack Europe for coolies from Italy, Hungary, and Russia, and finding profit of their own thereby, continue the business, and flood the country with paupers, idiots, criminals, the lowest of the low and the vilest of the vile. Whosoever brings to the company the toll it takes may send to the republic whom and what he will. But the nativ miners, and the English, Welsh, and Germans, rebelling against such importations, the barons are forced to quell their unruly subjects by force of arms, and lo! in place of the standing army whose absence we boast, there spring up in true medieval fashion bands of mercenary soldiers responsible to no one but the barons who pay them. For such are the Pinkerton police.

The Molly Maguires were convicted of murder and paid the death penalty of that offense. The barons of Pennsylvania murder men and boys by the hundred, underground, by refusing to take precautions notoriously necessary. They are guilty of manslaughter by wholesale—burning, crushing, blowing their victims to pieces. And the coroner's jury renders a verdict of accidental death, wherever, for the sake of saving a larger dividend, a band of baronial serfs are put to death by violence.

Thus does the ownership of the means of production confer upon the property-holding class dominion over the life and death of the free wage-earner in the free republic which Paine and Jefferson labored so nobly to found.

Most absolute of all is that dominion when it pleases the lords of coal and iron to shut out their serfs for a time from the means of production. The market is overstocked, profit is less than their lordships desire, and the serfs must maintain themselvs as best they may, since their labor is never performed for the good of the consumer, nor the maintenance of the toiler, but solely to furnish profits for the plutocracy. If hunger and cold and disease bring death to wives and children and drive the harried serfs to deeds of despair, who shall hold responsible for this consummation rulers the essence of whose rule is its irresponsibility?

The dregs and the scum of European population are drained to people the republic. Why? That the steamship companies may be enriched. Thirty thousand child-slaves are toiling underground in the mines of the republic. Why? That stockholding plutocrats may be enriched. A million children are earning their bread who ought to be in school, and would be there if they belonged to the property-holding class. Why are they toiling while a million adults suffer the torture of the unemployed? Because the reign of plutocracy rests upon the monopoly of the means of production, a monopoly which forces the workers to struggle against each other for the chance of selling their one commodity, their labor power. And that which is cheapest, that out of which the highest rate of profit can be ground, is the labor power of children.

And we sit silent while the plutocracy coins gold from the life-blood of the republic's children. Freedom of thought we preach while eighty thousand children in this one state are languishing in the deadening atmosphere of mills and mines, incapable of thought, stunted in body and mind, robbed of the intelligence we falsely call their birthright. And where is our protest? There were no toiling child-slaves in mill or mine in Paine's day, or the nation would hav rung with his onslaughts upon men who enslave not alone their fellow-men, but women and little children; against lawgivers who abet such crimes by passing dead-letter laws; and most of all, against the cowards who, hugging to their bosoms in craven silence the worthless boon of their own freedom of thought, utter no cry of withering scorn of blighting condemnation, for a social system which makes thought impossible, by deadening children's brains.

Thomas Paine has no successor in the republic of to-day, or the nation would be ringing with his protest against the latest insult to our "free" institutions; and the framer of the Ford immigration bill would be held up to immortal scorn as the first who has dared to propose an embargo upon any man's convictions. That ignorant servant of plutocracy, the framer of the Ford bill, should he find support in Congress, will enable the steamship companies and monopolist employers to import, as they hav done, unhindered, serfs for their own exploitation; and to shut out at pleasure those immigrants who carry with them wherever they go the conviction that under plutocracy there is no freedom—Russians fleeing the oppressor, Socialists seeking in the republic a refuge from the tyranny of Bismarck's Germany. Should that bill become a law the political Inquisition will be upon us, and the American consul will be ex-officio inquisitor. Freedom of thought, now perishing, as we hav seen, within the nation, will be placed under a prohibitiv duty and declared contraband by act of Congress—bitter irony of fate that such a measure should receive grave discussion in the Congress of the American republic during the centennial year of the French Revolution!

I like the thought that the titles of Paine's two works, "Common Sense" and the "Age of Reason," indicate the temper and activity of the man. When war was inevitable, he threw himself with all the energy of his nature into the toils of war, laboring on two continents for the success of the party of freedom. But his own appeal was to the thought, the reason, the common sense, of men. He had faith in the character of his contemporaries and appealed not to the passions or prejudices, but to the highest quality of men, their reason.

Were Thomas Paine alive to-day, how his pen would flay the slavish, degenerate progeny of the founders of the republic! For he carried his critical thought and his rugged self-dependence in action into every department of life. In politics, he was no mere critic, but the hero rich in persistent sacrifice of time, effort, fortune, and that liberty which he held so dear.

And he was a democrat by conviction, in the original, unsullied meaning of the term. He trusted the people and distrusted their rulers. For him, as for every truly democratic soul who once gains a clear insight into the meaning of plutocracy, there could be but one solution of the problem of to-day, the transfer of power from the few to the whole. If possession of the means of production givs power over life and deatb, then that power must be transferred from the irresponsible few to the responsible servants of the commonwealth. If by owning the railroads and the coal and iron fields, the coal and iron barons hav come to own the commonwealth, let the state of Pennsylvania exercise its right of eminent domain, and take its coal and iron fields for the good of the whole people, not the profit of the plutocratic. Then, profit-mongering being swept away, the life of the miners can be made safe by precautionary measures now too expensiv for the dividend-absorbing investors. Then, profit being no longer the sole object of the work as now, labor can be distributed over the whole year, and lockouts and short-time working seasons abolished, overstocked markets and the alternation of overwork with periods of enforced idleness and accompanying starvation falling away of themselvs. Then, the plutocrats no longer needing reinforcement of serfs, forced immigration will die of itself. The commonwealth having no object in exploiting the labor of its children, it will send them to school, leaving adults to do the work of the commonwealth.

And so with the railroads, the telegraphs and telephones, the transmission of electric power for motor use, the city street-cars, and all our industries as they grow centralized. One after another they must be assumed by the community, and conducted not for the enrichment of plutocracy, the extraction of profit, but for the common weal.

It will be objected that Paine was never Utopian, but that this is a Utopian scheme. Is our post-office Utopian? Hav we any private corporation that serves the people a tithe as well? Is the English postal telegraph and parcels post Utopian! Are our public schools Utopian? They are not what they might be, what they must become, when the social spirit takes the place of the individualist, self-seeking spirit. We shall find them improving from month to month under the demand of the workers that more school-houses be built to accommodate the children now in the mills; that more teachers be employed for those schools which are now overcrowded; that the high schools be multiplied by hundreds and supplied with manual training to fit for their life-work the thousands of children now driven by poverty to begin their life of toil at the age of twelve. No! Our public schools are not yet what they must become, for under the reign of plutocracy they are class institutions, furnishing scant kindergartens and underpaid primary school teachers to the children of the toilers, keeping the better grammar schools largely sacred to the use of the children of the prosperous class who enter them after the less fortunate children hav been drafted away to the service of the telegraph monopolists and the great retail stores. The public schools are not yet what they will be when the mothers of the country take their share of responsibility in the greatest of our institutions, and when the wage-earners hav awakened to their right to the noblest possession that any nation affords, the best possible education of all its children.

Our schools are not yet all that they must and will become, but a thousand times better they are already than any profit-grinding system of education could possibly be.

Believe me, he who insists that the people cannot be trusted to take care of their own interests, in the management of the means of production by the servants of the whole community, is the servant of the plutocracy, not, like Paine, the friend of the people.

I trust that no one will object that such a plan is revolutionary. For he whose memory we are here to cherish was a revolutionist of two continents. And we cherish his memory because of his services to the new order which was dawning in his day.

In one short century that order has become disorder. The changes in the material basis of the republic hav rendered the old, merely political functions of the government insufficient. Democracy has become a mere name, as we hav seen. The ballot to-day is a means of tricking, duping, hoodwinking the workers into the belief that they are governing themselvs, while really they are serving the interests of their masters. Capitalist society succumbs to the force of its own inherent antagonisms of plutocracy and pauperism, of political freedom and actual slavery.

Surely to-day every man or woman whose thought is really free must consecrate that thought and, with it, his whole energy to the deliverance of the wage-slaves, as Paine consecrated himself to the cause of liberty in his own day. The task is a mighty one, for the workers in all their unrest are not yet clear by what measures they are to work out their own salvation, and here in our own commonwealth we are especially slow and backward. Such elementary care of the workers' children as England has taken for a quarter of a century we hav not yet begun. We must hav factory inspection and truant officers and such search into the condition of the working children by the bureau of labor statistics as Massachusetts began fifteen years ago. We must hav child labor abolished, and childhood kept sacred to school life. Night work and overwork we must reduce to a minimum for everyone. The places of toil of men and women must be made wholesome; and the hours of labor shortened. And step by step, as the workers come to see the power that rests with them, they will fill Congress, the legislatures, and municipal councils with men and women who represent their interests, and to whom can be safely entrusted the management of industry in the interests of all.

No easy task awaits him who makes free use of his cri ical sense in our day. Struggle against deep-rooted prejudice is not more agreeable to-day than it was when Paine sacrificed for the sake of his convictions position, fortune, home-life, popularity, and liberty itself. And the prejudice hardest to uproot is the prejudice implanted in our own minds. Yet honest study of the question of the day, the question par excellence that underlies all others, the labor question, leads straight to the conviction that the work for the abolition of slavery was but begun with the emancipation of the negro, and must continue until plutocracy is superseded by the Social Democracy, wage slavery by the labor of all the people for all the people. Then first shall we hav a republic which can assure to all its citizens the right to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, the republic which Paine and his contemporaries believed to be founded a century ago.

FLORENCE KELLEY WISCHNEWETZKY.

Arthur B. Moss.

From George Standring's London Radical.

Mr. Arthur B. Moss is the third son of George William Moss. He was born on the 8th of May, 1855, in the parish of Horselydown, near London Bridge. His father was manager of a large wharf on the river Thames. He was a well-educated man and had all his children well instructed. The subject of our sketch was educated in the classical department of St. Olave's Grammar School, Tooley street, one of the largest and finest schools in England. At the age of twelve, when he left school, Moss was accounted a good scholar. Owing to his father's losing his employment on account of ill-health, he had to turn out into the world rather early in life. At first he got employment at the establishment of a large stationer and newsvendor in the city. From that he became a clerk at a wholesale drug house in Coleman street; but, not liking the confinement of an office, he left to become a reporter, and afterward dramatic critic, for a south London journal. For some years he worked at this; but, mainly on account of a change of belief, he lost this berth and took to journalism generally. Finding this a rather precarious mode of earning a living, he applied for an appointment as school board officer for the Southwark division, and succeeded in obtaining it, still devoting his leisure time in the evenings to writing for one or other of the Liberal journals in south London.

Until his sixteenth year he was a devout Christian, attending Sunday-school and church regularly. About this time some of his friends thought that he possessed qualities specially suitable for the work of the church, and he was induced to undertake a careful study of the Bible. One evening he met his eldest brother, Alfred Moss, and entered into a discussion with him on biblical matters. He had not long before been studying astronomy, and his brother, having already become skeptical, asked him if he thought it was probable that Jesus had died on all other planets as well as this one. The train of thought into which this idea threw him troubled him for some time, and he soon found himself calling in question a large number of the accepted notions of orthodox Christians. At that time (his seventeenth year) he had just joined the Bermondsey Institute, of which he was for several years writing-master and teacher of elocution; and an old member induced him first to read Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," and subsequently to attend, at the Hall of Science, a debate between Dr. Sexton and Mr. Foote on Spiritualism. He then read Bishop Colenso's "Examination of the Pentateuch," John Stuart Mill's "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," and a long list of minor heretical works, which had the effect of converting him into a thoroughgoing Freethinker. The first thing to do was to break away from his Christian friends, which he did by questioning the truth of the Bible at the Sunday-school, and declaring that he could no longer believe it. This step was painful enough, but the most painful part of the whole business was, that when the Rev. Thomas Marsden, the rector of St. John's church, Horselydown, found out that Moss had become a Freethinker, he called upon his mother, who was a Sunday-school teacher in the girl's department at St. John's, and told her that he would not hav the mother of an "Infidel" teaching in his school. This grieved Moss greatly. His father having died, he was left his mother's chief support, his eldest brother having married and the two others having gone into the army. All his brothers are now Freethinkers; his sisters remain Christians.

In 1876 he attended a course of lectures by Prof. Leoni Levi on "Political Economy," at King's College, and succeeded in winning one of the prizes —a handsomely bound volume of Shakspere's plays, and a volume on Rhetoric by Professor Bain. For the next few years he was very diligent in study, reading almost all John Stuart Mill's works with avidity, as well as a fair share of scientific books. He was just over twenty years of age when he delivered his first lecture on the Freethought platform, Mr. T. E. Green having invited him to speak at the Lyceum, Kingston-on-Thames. He chose the much misunderstood subject of the "Freedom of the Will," and, though afraid that he did not do justice to the theme, he succeeded in holding the attention of and pleasing the audience. After three or four years of practice he got a large number of engagements and lectured all over the country. During all this time, however, he worked hard in his double capacity of reporter and critic. Being a Radical in politics, he frequently devoted himself to lecturing on political subjects, speaking on public questions in various parts of London. He has had stormy meetings at times, being on one occasion, at Hyde park, knocked off the platform by a turbulent crowd, but he fought his way back and regained possession. In two elections he spoke for Professor Rogers and Arthur Cohen, Q.C., and from the former received a special letter of thanks for the work he had done in promoting that gentleman's return. On Sundays when he was not engaged he attended the Hall of Science and listened to Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. Holyoake, Mr. Watts, Mr. Foote, and other leaders of the Freethought movement. In order to make his lectures successful Mr. Moss wrote out the substance of some of them, and has since issued them in pamphlet form. In debate he has frequently encountered some of the representativs of the Christian Evidence Society.

In 1881 Mr. Moss became acquainted with George R. Sims, the dramatic author, and accompanied him and Mr. Barnard, the artist, through the slum land of London, and prepared a large portion of the material for "How the Poor Liv." He was also the means of converting Mr. Sims to a belief in the Malthusian law of population. In the series of articles in the daily News on "Horrible London," Mr. Sims received the encomiums of Professor Fawcett for the courage with which he had expounded that remedy for poverty.

From the first, Mr. Moss has been a frequent contributor to the Freethinker. He has also written at times for the National Reformer, Secular Chronicle, and Secular Review, as well as being a frequent writer for THE TRUTH SEEKER. When Mr. Foote went to jail Mr. Moss came to the aid of Dr. Aveling, and contributed regularly to the prosecuted journal. In addition to this he has done a good deal of theatrical work. Mr. Moss has written a large number of dramatic sketches, which hav been favorably received by the public. He is also part author of three dramas—two in collaboration with Mr. Henry Witton, and one with W. J. Patmore, secretary of G. R. Sims. Mr. Moss has had two or three written debates, the most important of which was with a Scotch novelist, Agnes Rollo Wilkie, on "Was Jesus God or Man?"

Last March Mr. Moss came in conflict with his employers. He wrote a letter to Mr. J. R. Kelly, member of Parliament for North Camberwell, asking him to vote for the Oaths bill. Somewhat indiscreetly, he wrote the letter on paper on the back of which was a list of his lectures. Mr. Kelly employed a man to find out where he (Moss) worked, and then sent a letter to the chairman of the school board demanding his dismissal. His character being good the school board could not dismiss him, but they passed resolutions prohibiting him from lecturing or advertising his publications.

Now it must be remembered that there was no hint that Mr. Moss's work as a visitor was badly done—on the contrary, it was well done; no hint, either, that he in the slightest way used his position as a visitor to circulate his tracts or propagate his opinions—on the contrary, he never even lectured in the district in which he was a visitor. This persecution is grounded simply upon the character of his lectures and his pamphlets. The question is a plain and broad one. Mr. Moss is fighting for the same liberty of utterance which has been fought for and won by the dissenters, Roman Catholics, and Jews.

"We teach the Bible and religion in our schools," say Mr. Gover and Mr. Coxhead, who are the chief leaders in this piece of stupid, ignorant intolerance; "we cannot hav one of our own officers denying the truth of what we teach." "As well," said one sapient member, "might an agent of Thorley's Food for Cattle go about saying the food was poison." This is just on a par with those who said, We hav an Established church; no officer of the state, no loyal citizen, should be allowed to contradict or refute it. The school board has established an unsectarian rate-supported religion, and now wants to punish any of its officers who dissent from it. Of course, the real answer to all this is that we giv perfect freedom to all our other visitors, to believe, or to teach, or preach what they think right, out of their hours devoted to their work for us; that we hav Roman Catholics, Jews, English Catholics, Unitarians, and every kind of Protestant to deal with, and that it is absurd to assume that there is some special kind of school board religion which the officers of the board are bound to defend or not to attack. Indeed, so far as the Education Act and the board's rules go, there is nothing to hinder an Atheist from giving the Bible lesson and drawing what deductions as to religion or morality he thinks fit from the Bible. For the board allows no catechism or "man-made creeds," and there are plenty of Freethinkers among the board school teachers. "Oh," but says Mr. Gover, "it is shocking that such questions as 'Is Jesus an Impostor?' should be discussed by one of our officers." On the contrary, we maintain that it is most useful that such a question should be discussed; that nothing but good in the long run can come from the free discussion of it; that it would be well for Messrs. Gover and Coxhead to be forced to discuss it; for they act as if indeed Jesus Christ, instead of being the eternal Word of God, as he claimed to be, was the puniest personage imaginable, so puny that he, his church, and his religion would be overthrown if Mr. Moss were allowed to express his opinion about him.

Mr. Moss has appeared twice before the by-laws committee; on the first occasion, before the old board, he delivered a speech in favor of intellectual freedom which amazed the clerical members of that body. On the second occasion he was cross-examined by the Rev. Joseph Diggle and others, but his answers were so frank and straightforward that some of the members who were disposed at first to vote against him voted in favor of him—notably Mr. Councilor Raphael, the Jewish member. Mrs. Besant, Rev. Stewart Headlam, Rev. Arthur Jephson, Rev. Mr. Courtice, Rev. Copeland Bowie, as well as Mr. Conybeare, M.P., and Mr. Edric Bayley, all spoke splendidly on behalf of freedom, and there can be no reasonable doubt that in a few weeks Mr. Moss will be able to return to the work to which he has devoted his life, viz., the glorious work of intellectual emancipation from all kinds of superstition.

Giordano Bruno.

As a general rule, I seldom favor the tendency of hero-worship as expressed in the desire to erect monuments to those who trod the thorny path of persecution for our welfare, feeling that to carry forward the thought and work of their lives and labors, we would by emulation accord them the highest possible recognition. But as all rules hav exceptions, the most notable exception in history is that of the grand proto-martyr of Freethought, Giordano Bruno. My reasons why Liberal Americans should honor Bruno's memory by contributing to this international fund are:

1. No true recognition has ever been given the bravest hero who ever died to benefit man.

2. The popular mind—especially in America—concedes to Galileo the honors which properly belong to Bruno, as the first public advocate of the plurality of worlds.

3. This monument project embodies the conflict between the papal and Secular power which has been waging in the Eternal City since the pope was stripped of his temporal power, and the erection of this monument will be a mortal offense to the now toothless lion who wags his imbecil jaws in the seat where his predecessors made fuel of Bruno's body to stop Freethought in Italy.

4. It will be a warning to those who desire to transplant the waning Romish power into the more fertil soil of our American republic that we know something of its history and diabolical acts wherever it has held sway.

It is a shame that the name of Galileo—after his inglorious recantation—is yet the most familiar, and attracts greater attention and esteem as the first public advocate of the Copernican system of astronomy than that of the intrepid martyr who preceded him to a terrible but honorable death at the stake—Giordano Bruno.

The sixteenth century was an epoch of marvelous intellectual activity—a rebound from the long-continued mental thralldom which preceded it. Never before had so many fertil brains thrown broadcast their thoughts, but the meteoric figure which now looms up higher than all his contemporaries is that of the fearless young orator, Bruno. He not only was the first during the Christian era to publicly advocate the plurality of worlds and show that the stars were suns shining by their own light, each having its revolving planets, but purposely placed that system in the most obnoxious light before the all-powerful ecclesiastics, by adding the assumption of their habitability and his own philosophical deductions thereon. This knight-errant of the now modern philosophy antedated Galileo over thirty years, and it was charged that the professor of Padua was reviving the heresy for which Bruno was burnt. Bruno anticipated many of the most "advanced" solutions of modern science, and he is still the source from whence several celebrated thinkers draw their inspiration at the present day.

The name of this Freethought champion rises from the sixteenth to illumin the nineteenth century by its unparalleled example of intrepidity. No country or race has afforded a more ennobling illustration of devotion to truth for truth's sake alone.

It was befitting that Bruno was born in the village of Nolau, under the flames and amid the throes and thunder of Vesuvius, for the mere question of erecting a monument to the memory of this astounding linguist, this enchanting, youthful orator, this profound philosopher, satirist, dramatist, and poet, has so agitated the Eternal City that it is now mooted that the holy father may move to Madrid. At last the municipal council of Rome has granted permission for the erection of this long-deferred tribute to the Freethought martyr on the Campo de Fiori, the sacred spot where the noble Bruno was burnt.

As the whole world was benefited by his dauntless life and honored by his heroic death, the monument partakes of an international character, and American Freethinkers are asked to contribute their quota. Let it be done quickly and generously, for the money is needed at once if the work is to be finished in May. Many will remember that the project was started some four or five years ago, but was delayed and additional expense incurred because of the refusal of the municipality to allow the monument to be erected. Among the European contributors were Victor Hugo, Herbert Spencer, Ernst Haeckel, Ernst Renan, Emile Castelar, Professor Büchner, and other eminent individuals in science and letters. The American committee are Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll, Thaddeus B. Wakeman, Daniel G. Thompson, Thos. Davidson. Colonel Ingersoll heads the new subscription with the following sentiment:

LAW OFFICE
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,
40 WALL STREET,
NEW YORK, Feb. 8, 1889.

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ., Treasurer of the Bruno Monument Committee,

My Dear Sir: It gives me great pleasure to inclose my check for one hundred dollars ($100).

I shall never be quite satisfied until there is a monument to Bruno higher than the dome of St. Peter's.

Yours very truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

I am informed that the students of Rome had a grand procession on the day the decision was announced that the monument might be erected.

Bruno was a prophet as well as a paladin. At fifteen years he entered a convent of the Dominican order, but soon rebelled against the rules; later on, his imaginativ and speculativ mind began to work, and the walls of his narrow cloister became too circumscribed. He had been a close, indefatigable student; was master of many languages. Finally he began to disbelieve the dogmas of the church, and he found means of escape. He had studied books, now he studied men and nature more. He unlocked hidden treasures of truth, and gave his life rather than relinquish his self-imposed guardianship. Lecturing before universities in Geneva, Toulouse, Lyons, Paris, Berlin, or London, wherever he spoke he was at first greeted with outbursts of applause, but this was generally followed by shouts of fury and maledictions, for he was sure to be followed by the wily officers of the church. Nevertheless, he boldly proclaimed his "impious heresy" on the spot where Servetus was burnt and Vanini met his martyrdom. London was his only place of safety, and there he did the larger portion of his writing, and becoming the fast friend of Sir Philip Sidney, dedicated to him his "Spaccio dell Bestia Triumphante." The intellectual atmosphere of London chilled the fervid Freethinker. It was like planting the most delicate perfumed flower amid a lot of scrubby pines. He wandered back to the continent, was offered the hospitality of a Venetian nobleman (?), and this despicable host, through the manipulations of his priestly confessor, betrayed his guest to the officers of the Inquisition. Bruno was as bold, audacious, and unflinching before his accusers, as he was brilliant in propounding his philosophy. Add to his learning his extraordinary beauty of person, his gallant bearing, his black, kindling eyes as eloquent as his speech, a face of classic delicacy of outline, and what wonder his Romish persecutors dreaded his influence? He must be made to recant—that would be a triumph for the church better than his death. For seven, long, weary years this young, impulsiv, impassioned orator was kept in a dungeon, with no books, no companionship but the regular visits of his tormentors to see if he were ready to say the one word between him and the blue sky—recant. But this damp and death-dealing dungeon could not break or bend the heroic soul of Bruno. When finally brought for the last time before his accusers, while standing chained before them, arguing still on his theories with an impassioned eloquence almost irresistible, he was condemned to that most diabolical of deaths; he only turned with supreme indifference on his executioners, and said: "This sentence givs you more alarm than it givs me." This brilliant young philosopher felt himself at this supreme hour stronger than all the power of Rome. Contemplate such a character if you can without the throb of enthusiasm!

Most men may by circumstances be taught to be valiant, but it is generally when the blood is up and the eye flashes in response to the cannon's roar, the rattle of musketry, and the clash of battle, but to meet a most horrible death with a smile as Bruno did is the concentrated essence of heroism. The Christian martyrs were buoyed up by fond hopes of heavenly rewards. Not so Bruno. He expected nothing, hoped for nothing, and still he met his fate—the most adverse and terrible. This was the year of the Romish jubilee, when the holy city was thronged with pilgrims from all over the world, and the burning of Bruno was one of the attractions for this crowd of worse than cannibal Christians. See this valiant Freethinker, to whom life might mean so much, led to the stake! No consolation of companionship, supported by no followers, gladdened by no approving smile, inspired by no kiss, refreshed by no tear, here is a picture of sublime heroism never equaled in history. Bruno died that truth might liv. Will American Liberals do themselvs and their cause a perpetual honor by aiding this monument? Respond to T. B. Wakeman, 93 Nassau street, New York, or to E. A. Stevens, 16 Union Park place, Chicago.

UNANIMOUSLY REPUDIATED.

At a meeting of District Assembly 24, representing the various branches of the Knights of Labor, a resolution was adopted, unanimously warning the public against the alleged labor organ which attacked the Secular Union some weeks ago, and which, perhaps, had too much prominence given it. One by one the enemies of the Union fall into the soup, as it were. The resolution reads:

WHEREAS, It has become notorious that a certain publication is palming itself upon the public as the official organ of the Knights of Labor and organized labor generally; therefore be it

Resolved, That District Assembly 24 does hereby notify and caution all whom it may concern that the publication known as the Knights of Labor published in this city is repudiated, and is not the official organ of the order in this district.

We are becoming great on prophecy, and will venture the prediction that, after the spring election, the paper will die the death of the righteous, and its editor will be looking for a friendly lunch counter.

REFUSED TO OBEY THE COURT.

Mary Angelique, or Mary Clarey, mother superior of the House of the Good Shepherd, showed the animus of Romish influence by defying an order of Judge Tuley on a writ of habeas corpus. Notwithstanding that the bailiff explained the consequences likely to follow her refusal to comply with an order of the court, this bride of Christ concluded she would not act in the matter unless so advised by the attorney of the institution. The rest of the story is told by the Chicago Times:

Mary Schell, a sixteen-year-old lass from Elgin, Ill., was the party for whom the writ was issued, and William Corwin, the lover, also from the country, was the person who made application to Judge Tuley for the writ. These young people hav become smitten with each other's charms and on divers occasions hav tried their hands at elopements, but were successfully thwarted by the timely action of the girl's parents, who advised the police in Chicago of their movements. The last attempt was made about a week ago, when Mr. Corwin and Miss Schell came to the city. The police were on hand, however, and arrested the young lady, who was taken before Justice R. H. White. By request of Mrs. Schell the would-be bride was sent to the House of the Good Shepherd on a $50 fine. It was said by Mrs. Schell that her daughter had been ruined by young Corwin and she wanted her put out of his way.

The anxious young man remained in the city and worked hard to hav the fine remitted, but in this he was unsuccessful, even though he secured the aid of Ald. John Powers, who signed an appeal from Justice White's decision. Attempts were made to get Miss Schell's signature to the document, but the mother superior refused point-blank to let her charge be seen. Judge Tuley then issued the writ and instructed Attorney Allison to look after the case. Attorney Wolcy, for the institution, succeeded in having the case continued until to-morrow so that Mrs. Schell would hav an opportunity of hearing the proceedings. Judge Prendergast will be applied to by the young woman's parents for an order committing her to some institution.

It is safe to say that Judge Prendergast will do his very best to accommodate the interests of the church. That is what he was put there for.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Equal Taxation.

The organic act of Washington territory provides that "all taxes shall be equal and uniform, and no distinction shall be made in the assessments between different kinds of property, but the assessments shall be according to the value of the property." "No tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States; nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents."

Under such an organic law, the exemption of public property from taxation is provided for, but the intent is that all private property shall pay taxes on the value of such property. In 1883 the taxation of church property was agitated, and the legislature submitted to a vote of the people the question. The vote was in favor of the taxation. The legislature of 1886 provided for a limited exemption of such property. The law of 1881 did not exempt it at all. The law of 1886 provided in clause 6, sec. 1: "And 'whereas religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary for good government and the happiness of mankind,' there is further exempted all buildings or institutions of learning, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions, and hospitals for the sick and infirm, including the lands upon which such buildings are situated, not to exceed two acres if within a city or town, and not exceeding eighty acres if not within a city or town, and all buildings used exclusivly for public worship and Sabbath-schools, with parsonages, and the lands upon which they are situated, not exceeding one-half of an acre if in a city or town, and not exceeding five acres if not within a city or town. Provided, however, that all such church property, including parsonage property, when valued at more than $5,000, shall pay a tax upon all above that value, and if any part of any building, being a house of public worship, shall be kept or used for any other purpose except for public worship, the part so used shall be assessed and taxed upon the cash valuation thereof. Provided further, that this exemption shall not apply to hospitals used exclusivly for profit."

These exemptions are not authorized by the organic act. The homestead of the mechanic is not used for profit, and if that principle is made the basis for taxation, it should be exempt if the parsonage of the preacher is to be exempt. The law taxes all homes for the people, because the government is put to expense to protect them. For the same reason all private property should be taxed.

But this law discriminates not only between the home of the poor man and the costly palace of the church, but even between the latter and benevolent institutions and hospitals. If a hospital has one free bed, so as not to be used exclusivly for profit, it is exempt from taxation. A Young Men's Christian Association may own a valuable lot, erect a magnificent building, and rent all but a few rooms at a high rental, and pay no tax. A mutual benevolent insurance company can hav no similar exemption.

Such was the answer of the legislators to the vote of the people.

The revenue article of the new constitution should provide for the equal and uniform taxation of all property according to its value, exempting only public property of the United States and of this state and its municipal subdivisions.

Church property was not always exempt. In the early centuries of English history, the clerical barons were assessed for military purposes, and either furnished their quota of armed men or commuted the service by the payment of money. The bishops and archbishops often led their retainers into battle. Hospitals paid taxes. Chief-Justice Holt decided: "Hospital lands are chargeable to the poor as well as others; for no man, by appropriating his lands to a hospital, can discharge or exempt them from taxes to which they were subject before, and throw a greater burden upon their neighbors" (Salkeld's Reports, p. 517).

An effort will be made by the corporations to tax them upon their gross earnings on the traffic within the state. The railroad attorneys will insist that they are building up the state, and as public benefactors should be favored. When they fix passenger and freight traffic, they do not grant the pioneer or the farmer any favors, though they too are building up the state and its industries. They insist that the fixed charges for dividends on their watered stock must be paid by the excessiv charges on local traffic. They demand all the favors, and claim the absolute right to make their own rates, to insist on such contracts as will free them from their common law liability as carriers, and to pay taxes according to their own returns of property and their own estimate of its value.

The question of equal taxation is one of the most important questions that will come before the constitutional convention, and it should be settled upon principles of justice. W. S. BUSH.

Three Months' Lecturing.

I visited Lowell, Neb., where I gave two lectures before small audiences. In fact, there is not interest enough in religion, either pro or con, in Lowell to save a saint or singe a sinner; but wife and I did enjoy that English plum-pudding with our English friends, Mr. and Mrs. Gray and their daughters Amy and Kate. That is the way we celebrated Christmas. On the tree, the evening before, all the children, big and little, were remembered.

Olive Branch school-house, near the home of Jason Bloodgood, was filled with an attentiv audience. This was the first Liberal lecture ever delivered there. Bloodgoods are good-blooded Liberals. I gave my third lecture in Newbold's school-house. The building was packed at this place every time I gave a lecture. I really like to lecture in the country once in awhile, and particularly before such a wholesome, wide-awake audience as always greet me here. Some of the best thinkers liv in the country and try to be independent, and would be more so if the mortgage were lifted.

Newark, Neb.—small attendance, but best greenbacking grace up to that point. Mrs. Jones is postmistress of Newark. She and her husband are activ Freethinkers and splendid people. All along our journeying we met with many such. Mr. and Mrs. Hecox are hearty friends of Liberalism in Newark town. Dr. Hawkins is here, winning friends in her medical practice.

A journey of one hundred miles landed us in Wilber, Neb., where, I believe, I hav had the pleasure of addressing good audiences ten times. Mr. John N. Gouff and wife are very earnest Liberals. His health is not as good as when I saw him two years ago, but he is in earnest. Then there is H. Kilgore, one of nature's noblest men, whom it is always a pleasure to think of, and a joy to converse with. His excellent family, wife, two daughters, and son, reside about three miles in the country.

On to Shenandoah, Ia., where a warm welcome awaited us in the home of S. H. Holcomb and wife. The churches were under a high-pressure revival. I little dreamed that this apostle of heresy would shake those churches over hell, as events proved; and succeed in buying five columns of space in one of the most popular journals of southwest Iowa. O that I were rich! Giv me a thousandth part of the wealth of the churches and I really think I could capture Christianity.

Elder D. R. Dungan, president of Bible College of Drake University, Des Moines, Ia., was sent for to punish me for my Infidel impudence. It agrees with me. Dr. James Vincent was my moderator. During the debate the Opera House was several times full to overflowing.

Dr. Humphrey was called away during the progress of the debate to speak fitting words over the remains of Mrs. Ely, a Liberal lady whom the Christian people were anxious to claim for their side, for she was a noble, intelligent woman. She spoke of "angels" before she breathed her last. This was enough for the church, which was intently waiting to proclaim her renunciation of lifelong Liberal principles. News came with the swiftness of the wind—and like it—that she died a Christian. Mrs. Ely feared the church would claim her, and so she took extra pains to call the attention of her friends to the fact that she died as she lived—a Freethinking Spiritualist, having no use for Christianity, and so Liberal that by her special request Dr. Humphrey, an Agnostic Materialist, gave the funeral address. Beloved by all who knew her, a large concourse assembled. Plainly but kindly the doctor squelched the Christian lie which had already commenced to travel, and many that day listened to the fitly chosen words of the Agnostic. W. F. JAMIESON.

Coryell, Col.

Mrs. Slenker to McArthur.

The rabble gather round the man of news,
And listen with their mouths wide open; some
Tell, some hear, some judge of news, some make it,
And he that lies most loud is most believed.—Dryden.

I am not at all disappointed that McArthur has "thrown up the sponge," though I rather deprecate the unkindly way in which he did it.

It is easy to accuse another of a want of "understanding" and to make a general fling at a woman, simply because she doesn't happen to be of the dominating sex. But the real question is, has McArthur furnished or "found" any actual argument toward proving that when a man dies he livs again, and is able to communicate with those still in the flesh?

He describes incidents of slate-writing and other phenomena, but how can we be sure it is not all sleight-of-hand? True, there is much one cannot explain philosophically, but time may bring the solution, as it has done in many other cases, and I, for one, prefer to continue the study and wait for developments, rather than jump to conclusions as far-fetched as those which would forever and forever keep in continued existence all the countless billions of millions of human beings who hav had birth since our planet was in a condition to generate or develop them.

Our friend did not quite "catch on" to my idea regarding the five wives.

I did not suggest that the husband would be obliged to "liv with them consecutivly or en masse," but that there would hav to be five of the husbands, and each of the five would hav to be identical in make-up and mind, so as to fill the bill for each of the five wives, and then each would hav her own. And there would need to be for each pair a separate heaven or home, so they would not get mixed up and create "confusion worse confounded."

You see it would not be heaven to Mary, if Susie and Sallie and Jennie and Lucy each claimed John as her special life-companion "over there."

And, indeed, it does rather look as if there was a multiplication of identities in the summer land, as it is not at all uncommon for some great personage to be at several séances at one time, i. e., if we judge from reports of them here and there. I hope, even if I am only a woman who "ever goes by the worse" in an "argument with men," that I shall be credited with honesty of purpose and a willingness to be taught.

Against the head which innocence secures,
Insidious malice aims her darts in vain.

My address will hereafter be as of old—Snowville, Pulaski county, Va, and I shall be there before this is in print, and hope to hear from friends far and near. I want my heaven now, and friendship is life's greatest boon. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Rhinebeck, N. Y., March 23, 1889.

Annexation of Canada.

Mr. Cockburn, a member of the Canadian Parliament, ironically advises his fellow-Canucks, who want closer trade relations with the United States, to accept the offer made by the American colonies in 1777 and become one of the states of the Union.

The offer referred to was made by Benjamin Franklin, who was sent on a mission to Canada in the spring of 1776 to endeavor to unite that country to the common cause of liberty. Two papers were printed and circulated extensivly through Canada, but if was found that not more than one person in five hundred could read. So the mission proved a failure, and Dr. Franklin suggested that if another were intended it should be composed of schoolmasters.

Canada is not now as benighted as she was a hundred years ago, and may yet become a part of the United States—perhaps within the lifetime of Mr. Cockburn. BURR.

Lectures and Meetings.

As soon as arrangements can be made W. F. Jamieson will start on a lecturing tour East, although business affairs may detain him for several weeks in Colorado. Address, Coryell, Col.

MRS. MATTIE A. FREEMAN will lecture during the second week in April at West Union, Maynard, Olwein, and Aurora, Fayette county, Ia. Societies or individuals desiring the services of this talented speaker near these places, or on the way to or from Chicago, will please address her at 324 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

DATES of W. S. Bell's lectures in Oregon: June 20th, Ashland; 21st, Talent; 22d, Jacksonville; 23d, Myrtle Creek; 24th, Roseberry; 26th to July 4th, Coos county; 6th, Coburg; 7th, Lebanon; 8th, Corvallis; 9th, Stayton; 10th, Scott's Mills; 11th, Silverton; 14th, Dayton; 15th, McMinnville; 17th, North Yamhill; 18th, McCoy; 19th, Balston; 20th, Forest Grove; 23d, Hillsboro; 25th, Portland; August 1st, Oregon City; 4th, New Era; 6th, Canby; 7th, Molalla; 9th, Union Mills. Mr. Bell's address is 248 State street, Chicago, Ill.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM'S lecture dates are: March 17th, Sacramento; 19th, 20th, 21st, Lemoore; 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, San Jacinto and vicinity; 31st, San Diego; April 2d, 3d, 4th, San Pasqual; 7th, San Diego; 8th, 9th, 10th, National City; 14th, San Diego; 16th, 17th, 18th, Pomona; 21st, Los Augeles; 23d, 24th, Norwalk; 25th, 26th, Anaheim; 28th, Santa Ana; May 1st, 2d, 3d, Oleander and vicinity; 5th, San Francisco; 7th, 8th, 9th, Boulder Creek; 12th, 19th, 26th, San Francisco and vicinity. Mr. Putnam will be at Fresno Flats, Grub Gulch, and vicinity the first week in June. About the middle of June he will begin his Oregon trip, taking in Silverton, Canby, Molalla, Hillsboro, Shed's, etc. About the third week in July he will be in Coos county, Ore. Those desiring lectures will please write at their earliest convenience, addressing him at 504 Kearney street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Jesuit Oath.

The following is the alleged oath for publishing which the Jesuits of Canada hav sued the Toronto Mail for $50,000. The Mail copied it from Le Semeur Franco-Americain:

"I, N——, now, in the presence of almighty God, the blessed Virgin Mary, the blessed Michael the archangel, the blessed John the Baptist, the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and the saints and sacred hosts of heaven, and to you, my ghostly father, do declare from my heart, without mental reservation, that the pope is Christ's vicar-general, and is the true and only head of the universal church throughout the earth; and that by virtue of the keys of binding and loosing given to his holiness by Jesus Christ, he has the power to depose heretical kings, princes, states, commonwealths, and governments, all being illegal without his sacred confirmation, and that they may be safely destroyed. Therefore, to the utmost of my power, I will defend this doctrin and his holiness's rights and customs against all usurpers of heretical or Protestant authority whatsoever, especially against the now pretended authority and Church in England, and all adherents, in regard that they be usurped and heretical, opposing the sacred mother church of Rome.

"I do renounce and disown my allegiance as due to any heretical king, prince of state, named Protestant, or to any of their inferior magistrates or affairs. I do further declare the doctrins of the Church of England, of the Calvinists, Huguenots, and other Protestants, to be damnable, and those to be damned who will not forsake the same. I do further declare that I will help, assist, and advise all or any of his holiness's agents in any place wherever I be, and do my utmost to extirpate the heretical Protestant doctrin, and to destroy all their pretended power, legal or otherwise. I do further promis and declare, notwithstanding that I am dispensed with, to assume my religion heretical for the propagation of the mother church interest, to keep secret and private all her agents' counsel, as they intrust me, and not to divulge, directly or indirectly, but execute all which shall be proposed, given in charge, or discovered unto me by you my ghostly father, or by any of this convent.

"In testimony whereof I take this most holy and blessed sacrament of the eucharist, and witness the same further with my hand and seal, in the face of this holy convent."

Mr. Seaver Meant the Free Religious Preachers.

From the Investigator.

The Independent Pulpit has a long and bigoted attack upon the Investigator, which would hardly be worth noticing were it not that its editor misunderstands our remarks to which he takes exceptions. We say misunderstands, for we know of no motiv he can hav to quarrel with us, as we hav never spoken disrespectfully of him. His complaint is founded upon the following remarks of ours which we applied to a certain class of ministers:

It apears to be generally the case, however, that when ministers giv up preaching and take to Liberalism, they wish to "construct" the latter as they did the former. This peculiarity of ministers they never seem to outgrow as a class. They must be at the head of every organization, and "construct" to suit their wishes.

Our critic, who has himself been a minister, jumps to the conclusion that we meant him and the other friends now in the Liberal ranks who were formerly preachers, and whom he mentions by name. Now, if he had read our remarks more carefully—as he should hav done—he would hav seen that we were speaking of Free Religious ministers, and no others. They are the ones who wish to "construct" Liberalism to suit their views, but we expressed the opinion that every Liberal should "construct" for himself without any religious dictation.

Ecclesiastical Plotting.

O my God,
How sick we must be ere we make men just!
—Elizabeth B. Browning.

After some years of quiet scheming to get a firmer grip upon the "dear people," the question of recognizing the Christian God and Jesus Christ in the Constitution of the United States is again revived with renewed vigor. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union and other enemies of freedom and a secular government are asking for a national law, compelling all men and women to bow to their sectarian God and Jesus Christ; they also want to stop all Sunday newspapers and railway trains.

To this end the praying people, whose ancestors' hands are stained with crime and bloodshed for a thousand years, hav now a bill before Congress, backed by six hundred thousand names, known as the Blair Sunday bill, or Sunday Rest bill. "Sunday Rest" is an attractiv name to hundreds of thousands of the overworked and unsuspecting classes, who never dream that their liberty is in danger, and that ultimately they will become slaves of or be utterly devoured by these religious wolves in sheep's clothing.

July 4, 1879, Gilbert Haven, D.D. (Nasby once said to me, "That means Devilish Dunce"), a prominent Methodist bishop, made a speech at Woodstock, Conn., in which he said that Christ and God were left out of the Constitution through an oversight by the framers of that document, "not as an intended insult to God and his Christ."

Just stop a moment and think. A Methodist bishop, late in the nineteenth century, giving us to understand that we, struggling, fallible mortals, can insult his omnipotent God and Jesus! Can ignorance get much lower? Cowper truly says:

An honest, sensible, and well-bred man
Would not insult me, and no other can.

This bishop said we should imitate the "feudatories, seignories, or higher powers" that were ushered in at the breaking up of the Roman empire, "by recognizing Christ as the supreme lord. The church officials must anoint their ruler or the people will not allow him to rule. He must receive the sacrament before he can be crowned. The preacher, not the judge, makes him ruler. They are servants of the church, and thus only can they reign. How different our inauguration, where only the head of the court administers the oath, and never a clergyman is called to consecrate the chief."

Again: "This country is not to spread over this continent except by the will of God. It is only through Christ that it can grow and prevail. It is as a Christian republic alone that it can cover this continent. What our fathers meant to do we must do. We must place Christ in the Constitution, and the cross on our banner. How gloriously would that flag wave if amid its heavenly stars would shine forth the more heavenly cross!"

Remember this is the nineteenth century, not the sixteenth, as one might think from such language. He wants a clergyman to administer the oaths and "consecrate" our chief magistrates. Everybody and everything must bow in disgusting obsequiousness, and be "servants of the church."

The oaths, as now administered to our state and national officers, are silly and empty formalities, and partake very largely of priestly rites, but what may they not degenerate to when the church rules entirely as these men desire? He also puts great stress on the importance of placing the cross on our banner, "amid its heavenly stars;" yet it is quite doubtful if he knew its origin and signification in pagan and Christian worship. If Christians knew just what the cross and all their cruciforms mean, and even what the steeples to their churches originally represented, they would be slow to parade them before the people.

The truth is, with all their money and monopoly of colleges, no assemblage of people can be found anywhere more ignorant than those who meet together to worship God or some other imaginary being; and in no place in the world is more falsehood promulgated than in the Catholic and Protestant churches. Clergymen and politicians are doing all that is possible, by cringing to Christianity and laws made in its interest, to bring on another war against the rights of human nature.

This noted Methodist minister—and he is not alone—seems to be a theological fossil thrown off from the minds of Calvin and Torquemada, in a similar manner that comets are said to be thrown off from older planets. He was out on a holiday excursion in New England, where such pious bigots as he used to hang witches and punish Atheists "by imprisonment, by whipping, or boring through the tongue with a red-hot iron." That is what Spiritualists, Atheists, Agnostics, and Jews will get if these praying gentry succeed in their desires, should we not obey their inhuman behests.

Lately a Union convention was held in Washington, of vast influence, demanding the enforcement of the observance of the Christian Sabbath upon all its officers and clerks, and also to extend its power over the several states. About a year ago the Baptists had a similar convention in the same place; passed resolutions, avowing with brazen effrontery their intention to use the strong arm of the government to enforce their ideas of morals, etc. And everyone, of thought, knows that Christian morals, like Christian religion, tend downward and backward, and are consequently immoral and debasing.

In the report of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of California I find this nauseating morsel:

Resolved, That the Woman's Christian Temperance Union ask all Christian and educational organizations to coöperate in introducing the Bible into public schools.

They claim that morality is shut out of many public schools because the Bible is not allowed in them. If these women, who claim among their leaders some of the most cultured women of America, can read passages that I can name in the Bible in a public audience of men and women, without a blush of shame tinging their cheeks, they are not only pious bigots, but hav attained a state of indifference to public regard that very few frequenters of salcons and other dens of vice hav. I hav, for over thirty years, been an earnest advocate of equal suffrage for men and women, but if the above resolution and others by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union on Sunday laws, etc., are specimens of the wisdom of representativ women, I pity all who are unfortunate enough to fall under their religious tyranny—misnamed wisdom.

The convention held in Washington lately had a large and influential following, and was indorsed by prominent Catholic ministers. Catholics and Protestants are ready to bow down and kiss each other if, by uniting, they can check or put out the lights of liberty. Some of our friends think there is no danger and cry out, "Peace! peace!" or sit with folded hands and watch the loading of our enemies' guns with stupid, if not parsimonious, indifference. There is no peace until liberty stands enthroned in every and all things pertaining to individual rights. There is more danger from these misguided men and women working in the name of religion, an imaginary God and Jesus Christ, than there was in 1860 from the pro-slavery enemies of a free government. The past history of Christianity is no better than that of selling men and women as slaves. Generally, they hav united their interests and blackened the pages of history with cruelty, crime, and bloodshed. Protestant Scotland was no better than Catholic France and Spain. Wherever Christians hav ruled, the dungeon, whipping-post, rack, gallows, and gibbet were the means used to enforce their religion.

The same spirit is among us to-day that actuated our ancestors. What the Christians did in the past, their devout followers will do now if they get the power. All prominent religionists are uniting except a handful of Adventists, who are opposing the infamous Sunday bill with a noble zeal. These religious sects are numerous, activ, and wealthy, and will stop at nothing within their power to accomplish the unity of church and state and to rear upon the ruins of the temple of freedom their Christian oligarchy.

If patriotic and clear-visioned men and women everywhere, who hav caught a glimmer of the uses of the broadest liberty, cannot combine and rout these enemies of natural rights, then we shall be turned back hundreds of years. If they will not giv time, influence, and money freely to checkmate these nefarious movements to perpetuate the despotism of the Dark Ages; if we do not realize that eternal vigilance is always and forever the price of all freedom worthy the name; and are willing to go hungry and wear poor clothes, then we are not worthy the little freedom our persecuted foremothers and fathers suffered so much to attain.

I hope Spiritualists, Atheists, all classes of reformers, will unite and work with a zeal that the enemies of freedom are showing, and be prepared to meet them with a candor and firmness for any emergency, worthy those who fought at Concord and Bunker Hill.

I offer, in as few words as I can, a few pertinent facts as a catechism, to aid the young and old to learn more readily the true spirit of Christians who are so anxious to hav their God and Jesus run all the railways, edit all the newspapers, and educate all the children.

CATECHISM.

Question. Who burnt thirty men and women in Lyons, France, in 1179? Answer. Christians.

Q. Where? A. Notably in Rochester and Troy, N. Y.

Q. Who publicly justified kidnapping men and women in 1850–51? A. Prominent and leading Christian clergymen in the North.

Q. Who called a meeting Nov. 26, 1850, in Faneuil Hall, Boston, to indorse the Fugitiv Slave bill—a meeting to promote the stealing of men, women, and children? A. Leading Christians.

Q. What society spent in Boston, in 1853, $79,983 and distributed over three million pages of literature, and not one word against negro slavery? A. The American Tract Society (Christian).

Q. Who dismissed Miss Barrett, a sixteen-year-old girl, from the Methodist Female College, at Pittsburgh, Pa., and when? A. Rev. Dr. Pershing, the principal of the school and a prominent Christian clergyman, in 1866.

Q. What for? A. Because she had a tinge of negro blood, though she was so white that neither teachers or pupils had discovered it the first quarter of her attendance.

Q. Was this the only charge against her? A. Yes.

Q. Who persecuted and imprisoned E. H. Heywood in Dedham jail for seven months, causing him and his family great suffering and pecuniary loss for many years? A. Christians.

Q. What for? A. Writing and publishing physiological literature, notably "Cupid's Yokes," a pamphlet treating of the moral and physiological phases of the natural right and necessity of sexual self-government.

Q. When and where? A. From 1877 to 1887, at Princeton, Mass.

Q. Who imprisoned D. M. Bennett in the penitentiary at Albany, N. Y., thirteen months, causing him and his family great sorrow and pecuniary loss? A. Christians.

Q. What for and when? A. Writing and publishing criticisms upon the Christians' Bible, their God, and selling a copy of "Cupid's Yokes," in 1879.

Q. Who persecuted and imprisoned E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman in the jail, at Oskaloosa, Kan., and when? A. Christians, in 1886.

Q. What for? A. Not employing the church or state to marry them.

Q. Who arrested and indicted Moses and George Harman and E. C. Walker on two hundred and seventy counts, causing them and their friends great sorrow and pecuniary loss? A. Christians.

Q. What for, and when? A. For publishing an account of the inhuman and barbarous sexual treatment of a wife by her husband in the name of Christian marriage, in 1887. JAY CHAAPEL.

To Massachusetts Readers.

Let all earnest opponents of church aggression take notice of the movement now in vogue to establish Prohibition in this state.

The object to make a people temperate, and therefore more industrious and trustworthy, is certainly a worthy one, but the means that may be employed to effect this end are multifarious.

Relying upon experience and knowledge of human nature, no single method, however rigorously enforced, can ever remove from the human mind that tendency to over indulgence which has ever manifested itself in all ages and under all restrictiv conditions. We believe over-indulgence to be the natural consequence of forced abstinence; that balked desire to satisfy moderate appetite destroys restrictiv mental control by its accumulativ power. If men could obtain at all times, purely and cheaply, that which they desire, abstinence, which intensifies passion, would not break down intellectual control and beget this tendency to satisfy at one time the accumulated demands of an unusual period of inactivity. Among peoples who produce cheaply and consume largely their nativ beverages, intemperance is comparativly unknown; while among nations destitute of vinyards, where pure liquors are relativly scarce, intemperance correspondingly obtains.

As the pent-up water in the brook will some time dash away uncontroled, so do passions by accumulativ force overcome mental restraint. Without the substitution of a more adequate means of enjoyment, a lower process cannot be stamped out. Pent-up force will expend itself somewhere; and if desires are like physical forces, that is, correlativ, the only means with which to supplant a low desire must be one which will evolve it to a better sphere of action. Yet temperance advocates of a certain class offer only, as a relief to the appetite which they seek to intensify and render abnormal by their restrictiv measures, the holy enjoyments of the Christian religion!

If Prohibitionists would promis to establish public lyceums like those of old; to afford better instructiv methods in the public schools; to subsidize public places of amusement—in a word, to giv us better intellectual means of enjoyment—on condition of obtaining power, their success might be assured. But the deception is not difficult to penetrate. Their object is not to substitute a better for a poorer method of enjoyment in worldly things, but to supplant the material with the spiritual. With them it is rum or religion. But how about those who care for neither? To preach temperance is the plea for all this unusual hustling; to teach religion is the hidden aim. Giv up your beer that ruins your health, degrades your family, pauperizes your people, and come—well, er—take Jesus in its place!

As a fighting issue with which to advance church interests this temperance cry cannot well be overrated. Under the guise of Prohibition the theological wolf hides his head, and, if not careful, even Liberal sheep will be caught unawares.

The churches in this part of the state are rapidly coming to the front, and assuming an arrogant air, due to the severe disciplin which a sympathetic or, rather, a hypocritic, issue generates. Those who imagin that the successful enforcement of the Prohibition law (if such be the case) will be followed by a voluntary cessation of theological aggression, show little knowledge of church tactics and ultimate aims. Prohibition is the first step toward church domination in national affairs—the forerunner of "God in the Constitution" and the establishment of religion in the public schools. Any man with thinking power above that of a brute can see this.

That the church has never voluntarily lessened her control in state affairs; that she has, on the contrary, invariably strengthened herself at the expense of others' rights, needs no proof here. That she has obtained her power in the world to-day by strangling the infant hopes and liberties of free peoples; by advancing her cause along the waysides of hypocrisy and crime, and through the by-paths of treachery, broken promises, and contempt for human rights, needs no substantiation for Liberals to understand.

The church program is this: Firstly, Prohibition; secondly, God in the Constitution; thirdly, religion in the public schools; fourthly, the enforcement of Sabbatarian laws and the practical disenfranchisment of Infidels and the abridgment of their liberties.

The Giordano Bruno Statue at Rome.

Colonel Ingersoll's contribution of $100 to the fund to erect the monument to Bruno at Rome completed the first $500 of the $1,000 which the committee hav promised for America. Of the second $500 we hav received $49 only, leaving $451 to be raised before May 1st next. How shall this fund be raised?

We hav said that the Liberals hav done their share in proportion to the numbers of those who ought to be interested in this great historical protest. We thought that three great classes of people would gladly recognize the three great elements in Bruno's career of which the progress of the world since his day has been largely a continuation.

1. The Freethinkers and lovers of liberty for its own sake. It was the boast of Bruno that he was the "stirrer-up of the sleepy minds of his time." He went through the cities and universities of Europe and challenged the highest intellects of his time to meet him in disputation. He was the knight-errant of Freethought in a world of ghosts, hobgoblins, and darkness. The Freethinkers are right in making his monument rise within sight of the Inquisition and the pope.

2. Bruno was the first of the modern scientists. It was he who published the Copernican astronomy which had been hid under a bushel. He first saw that the old "firmament" heavens and earth had passed away, and that we were floating in infinit space studded by infinit worlds, and that, accordingly, human life and religion must be adjusted to that fundamental fact. He was the forerunner of our pantheistic, monistic, natural, evolutionary scientists, and they ought to contribute to this monument.

3. He was the religious reformer who declared that the essence of all religion worth having was truth and love. Creeds, forms, and theologics vanished into mysticism with him. But at bottom, instead of being an Atheist in any proper sense of the word, he was a "god intoxicated" and a profoundly religious man. Love was to him thoroughly a fulfilment of the law, and rose supreme above it. Nothing is more touching than the faith of this man in freedom, science, and love. He would not and could not recant. To the last he believed that if he could only get at the pope and explain his views, all would be well, and he would be called to lecture and teach at Rome.

The time has come when his life-size form from this monument shall speak there for him. Certainly, the Liberal Christians, who tell us that love is the life of the law, should vie with scientists and Freethinkers in finally enabling Bruno to giv his message to the world.

But if others will not, as the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER said so grandly in his editorial of March 9th, then the Freethinkers of America will do it, and make the honor their own.

In writing in this way to my fellow-Liberals, the rest of the committee (Colonel Ingersoll, Daniel G. Thompson, and Prof. Thomas Davidson) must not be held responsible for my expressions. There are thousands who would be glad to hear from them.

Why Mr. Watts Met Mr. Braden.

Charles Watts in Secular Thought.

Experience has taught me that controversy, to be intellectually profitable, should be conducted by disputants who hav the ability to debate and who are honest in their profession of conviction. In the absence of these two necessary requirements, all such mental encounters are not only farcical, but they are derogatory to the Secular cause. The truth of this was forcibly impressed upon my mind recently in Salt Lake City, where I was induced, much against my own desire, to once more meet Clark Braden upon the public platform. From my experience of the man I felt justified for a time in persistently objecting to again discuss with him, for the reason, among others, that he lacked the two requisits as a debater referred to above. It was not until my many good friends in Salt Lake City entreated me to forego my opposition, upon the ground that, if I continued to persist in my objection, my motivs would be misunderstood by the Christians, and the prospects of the local Secular Society would be ruined, that I consented to the debate. Not wishing to injure friends, or to giv the enemy grounds for rejoicing, I yielded, upon the principle "that of two evils it is better to choose the lesser." I, however, made the condition, which should be guaranteed in writing, that Clark Braden should retract certain falsehoods which two years ago he had published in a printed circular in reference to myself; that I met him in this debate only as the representativ of the Christians of the city; that principles alone should be considered in the discussion, and that slanderous pamphlets falsely reflecting upon the characters of my co-workers or their families should not be circulated at our meetings. It is only fair to Mr. Braden to record that "on this occasion" he complied with and kept each and all of the conditions, and herein his failure as a controversialist was secured. My action in this matter was a sacrifice to the repeated solicitations of some of the best friends that it has ever been my good fortune to meet.

Training for Camp-meeting.

From the Tyler, Texas, Leader, Organ of the Colored Race.

The Rt. Rev. Mitchell Hoard has been tried and fined $10 for stealing a few slices of bacon. The reason why the fine was so light is because the reverend had previously been given a hundred lashes by the person from whom he stole the meat. The crime will be forgotten before camp-meeting time, and then Mr. Hoard will be one of the leading lights in winning souls for Jesus!

Spain as She Is To-Day.

The editor of the Christian Advocate has been visiting Spain, and contributes to his paper some startling facts concerning the priests of the country and the strong hold they hav upon the ignorant and superstitious people. These are abject slaves of faith, and are robbed right and left by their religious teachers, who use their veneration for "sacred things" as hooks to steal their purses. In Madrid Dr. Buckley purchased of a priest a "measurement of the 'Virgin's' sandal," which looks like an inner sole of a shoe, with pointed toe. On it is printed an account of the benefits conferred by its possession, as follows:

"Long liv the holiest Mary, mother of God. This is the true measure of the sandal of the holiest Virgin, which is preserved with great veneration in a convent of Spain. The Pope John XXII. granted three hundred years of indulgence to all who kiss three times this measure and pray three Ave Marias.

"This indulgence confirmed Clemens VIII. in the year 1603, and it can be gained as often as you wish for the blessed works of the Purgatory and for the greater glory of the Queen of the Angels.

"It is permitted to take from this measure others, and all shall hav the same indulgences.

"Mary, Mother of Grace, pray for us."

At Malaga he found a picture of St. Joseph suspended on a wall near a gate, and all over the wall adjacent to it were votiv offerings hung up by the persons whose animals or friends had been restored to health as the result of special devotions and the intercession of Joseph. In the smaller villages of the country, the people are unable to read or write, and are completely at the mercy of the priests, who do not hesitate to resort to fearful deeds to maintain their power. In the village where hangs the picture of St. Joseph, within a few years, a man who was ill declined the services of a priest. The priest, notwithstanding, made efforts to administer the last sacrament, which the dying man with all his strength resisted. The priest departed cursing the house, and in the night in some unknown way the eyes of the dead body were removed. The priest and his adherents circulated the statement that the devil had come there and "gouged out the eyes as a punishment for his heresy." A physician of the town examined the body and declared they had been removed by some sharp instrument. But the priest ingeniously stirred up other physicians, a suit was brought and tried in the high court in Granada, and these physicians were induced to testify that the eyes had been destroyed by rats, though they did not hesitate to say privately that it was done with some sharp instrument.

In another place, a Protestant was invited to preach. On arrival in the town he was attacked by roughs, male and female, and one of the ladies accompanying him was knocked down, and an old woman jumped upon her, clutched her hair, and screamed out, "Kill her! kill her!" The ringleaders were the sacristan and two others of the parish church. Not a soul in the town came forward to their defense, though several apologized afterward. Within twenty paces of the dwelling of the evangelists were the quarters of the civil guard, but no effort was made to quell the disturbance. The alcade said that if the government tolerated heresy, he would not. Another Protestant preacher has been heavily fined and sentenced to two years' imprisonment for opposing the Catholic doctrins regarding the "Virgin," and setting forth Protestant ideas in opposition. The fine has been paid, but the man is still out of jail, probably owing to the ease with which Roman Catholic officials can be bribed.

His journey through Spain has convinced Mr. Buckley that Roman Catholic Christianity exerts no influence for good upon the morality of the people. This is a pretty large admission to make, and if the roving editor will report equally honestly on Protestant communities, he will admit that Protestantism has no better supported claim to be a source or basis of ethics. Scotland, pious as her people are, was once as lewd as Spain, and that at the period, too, when she was most zealous in believing and defending the creed of Calvin. The priests of Spain, he says, are notoriously frivolous and profligate. The people consider the confessional, chiefly frequented by women, as an organized institution for the destruction of the family. In one city the wife of a foreign consul, herself a Catholic, declared that "there were but three or four priests in the entire church in that city to whom an honest woman could confess." Some years ago, Dr. Buckley relates, a Freethinker named Garcia Vao edited a paper in Madrid, largely devoted to the publication of authentic cases of immorality committed by priests. He was very particular to hav facts, and the record was extraordinary and awful. It revealed in many of the remoter villages of Spain, where no papers are published, a condition of immorality defying belief. As the record weekly increased, it became necessary to dispose of Vao, and he was assassinated, no one could tell how. But there are other Freethinking papers at work there, giving many statistics of the kind, though the immoralities of the clergy are condoned by their superiors, who often assert that the corrupt ones are mad, and hence not responsible. Mr. Buckley's conclusion on the church is that it does not promote morality, but does promote licentiousness. One of the ways in which it does this is by charging such exorbitant marriage fees that the poorer Catholics hav no recourse but to liv in concubinage. Fine stories, says Dr. Buckley, hav been told of bishops and priests visiting the dying in the cholera epidemic where the relations between the people were illegitimate, and by a few words of marital ceremonies legitimizing the children. When it is considered that the expense of getting married is one of the chief causes of persons living in this way, the halo which surrounded those visits darkens into a part of the general shadow which the moral and spiritual dungeon walls of popery throw over the whole region.

One of the superstitious acts which disgraced the nation in that dreadful time four years ago, when "the poor wretches, depending upon their priests, died like poisoned flies—died with prayers between their pallid lips—died in their filth and faith," as Ingersoll sorrowfully and indignantly said, was performed by the archbishop of Granada, whose good works Mr. Buckley sarcastically says are certain to be known while the archbishop livs to tell of them. When the cholera had spent its force and had obviously declined, the archbishop carried in procession in the streets of Granada an image of the Virgin, and then ostentatiously proclaimed that through her intercession the scourge was mercifully stayed. Some of the afflicted people expressed wonder, if such power existed in the mere passage of the Virgin through the streets and her intercession, that she had not been brought out before, but these were, of course, heretics, and their opinions and comments could hav no weight. Unfortunately, this superstitious mummery is not confined to Spain, for when the cholera raged in Montreal the church authorities pursued the same course, and deluded the stricken populace, which continued notwithstanding to die like poisoned flies in their filth and faith. And, if our memory serves us aright, the Protestants of this country hav endeavored to stay plagues with prayer, to exterminate grasshoppers with sermons, and to cure a bullet-stricken man by petitions to church roofs. The image of the "Virgin" was just as efficacious in cholera as were the supplications to the "Lord" in these other instances.

Spain, it seems, is the same old haughty, intolerant, ignorant, superstitious, priest-ridden nation that she was before the Inquisition was ostensibly abolished, though a part of her people, Dr. Buckley finds, are becoming imbued with modern Liberal ideas. But these are yet too few to affect the social and religious conditions to any considerable extent. Persecution for religious opinion is still practiced, and the dagger of assassination is still used as a theological argument. This will probably continue until heresy has made substantial progress among the governing classes, when the church will be gradually pushed back, as she has been in France and Italy. It is an immeasurable physical gain to hav torn down the Inquisition buildings, abolished the "Holy Tribunal," and put out the flames of the autos-da-fé. The rest will come in time, and one of the most encouraging signs is the existence of those Freethinking journals which are exposing the rottenness and damnable character of the priesthood.

Realizing on Stolen Goods.

In 1830 the "Female Academy of the Sacred Heart" bought for about $40,000 a large tract of land in the northwest part of New York city, whereon the corporation built a convent school and took girls to board and educate. The grounds extend now from 6th to 10th avenues, and from 130th to 137th streets. The academy is in no sense a charitable institution, as the pupils all pay roundly. Some one hundred and fifty nuns are required to manage it, showing that it has prospered.

From the time the Sisters acquired the property, it has ceased to be a source of revenue to the public, while it has demanded and received public protection. Last summer part of the buildings were burnt, and all would hav been, had not the fire department, supported by public taxation, been on hand to extinguish the flames.

The property was insured and the Sisters at once began rebuilding. The school was too profitable to be suspended. It was so profitable, in fact, that the old buildings were insufficient to accommodate the pupils, and in rebuilding it is being greatly enlarged. Needing more money, the Sisters a week ago put a few of their lots on the market and sold them at auction. Forty-seven lots realized about $160,000, or four times what the Sisters paid for the whole property in 1839, which they hav since held at no expense to themselvs. And not only hav they thus enriched themselvs at public expense, but they hav stood in the way of improvements in that section of the city, refusing to allow streets to be cut through their large property, and circumventing by political influence all attempts to do this. To all arguments they replied that it would be vandalism to disturb the convent.

It seems, however, it is not vandalism for the convent itself to cut some of the ground up into lots and sell them. It is holy work then. The Sisters probably thanked the Lord that they had the ground to sell. To the outsiders, though, the deal looks like the consummation of a robbery—the realizing on the plunder looted from the public. If they had paid taxes and assessments on these lots, the ground would hav been on the market long ago, and property in that part of the city would be worth double what it is now.

The Church Reaching Out.

They hav a Sunday law in the District of Columbia much like other statutes of its sort, and the District commissioners, like other local authorities, are somewhat lax in enforcing it. This laxity does not meet the views of the good Christians, principally the preachers, who imagin they hav a divine mission to regulate the conduct of their neighbors, and they are taking steps to enforce their views of Sunday observance. A new set of commissioners is soon to be appointed by President Harrison, and the clergy propose to hav none but bigots put in office. A delegation of them visited the president week before last and asked him to select all Christian men, an idea said to hav been cordially entertained by Mr. Harrison.

In addition, and to be sure the Lord is all right, too, they called a prayer meeting on the 19th, and engaged in an all-day wrestle with the power above, beseeching it to interfere with the president and mold his mind and action in their favor—"asking divine guidance for the president in the appointment of Commissioners of the District," they called it. The service began at nine o'clock in the morning and lasted until five in the evening, being continuous, and attended by a large congregation. About a dozen pastors of the evangelical churches of the city took their turns in leadership, and the ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union furnished the music. Each clergyman occupied the pulpit for half an hour at a time, and people who attended generally remained as long as that, and many of them participated in the service of prayer and remarks.

We think this is taking an unfair advantage. The churches hav got their president, a zealous and bigoted Presbyterian, and hav besides in one of the cabinet officers another zealous and bigoted and not very honest Presbyterian, and they ought to be content without enlisting the Lord in the matter. The worldly folk of the District might hold their own against the two men, but they can hardly be expected to overcome the other fellow. Holding the prayer-meeting shows that the churches will stop at nothing to gain their ends, and if propitiation of the devil were of any avail, we should doubtless see the preachers on their knees beseeching the throne of unrighteousness.

The activity of the ministers at the beginning of this administration is ominous. They feel that now as never before since Hayes they hav their innings, and they propose to play the game for all it is worth. It is a fortunate thing that the president and cabinet do not make our laws, or we might get back to colonial times at a quickstep. As it is, there are laws enough for the churches to get a deal of public money and to make it uncomfortable on United States territory for those who do not bend the knee to the Christian superstition. The appointment of "only Christian men" to office is practically making a theocracy of the District of Columbia, and if the same policy governs in other appointments the United States will soon be an appanage of the Evangelical Alliance.

The Imperiled Philosophers of Valley Falls.

The Harmans, father and son, and Mr. E. C. Walker, will be put on trial at Topeka, Kan., April 5th, for sending alleged obscene print through the United States mail. The indictment was found some months ago, and the trial has been postponed from time to time.

We hav seen all the matter complained of by the prosecutors, and hav no hesitation in declaring that none of it comes within the legitimate meaning of the word obscene. The prosecution seems to be rather a weapon with which to destroy the papers Lucifer and Fair Play, and resorted to chiefly to drive the Messrs. Harman and Walker out of town. The chief mover against them is a banker named Crosby, who conceives that their presence and papers are a damage to Valley Falls. He and his church friends are or pretend to be alarmed at the reputation the Falls is obtaining as a "free love town," and desire to purify the atmosphere by imprisoning the people who by advocating the doctrin hav given the place its notoriety.

There is and there can be no pretense that these people are unworthy or immoral citizens. On the contrary, the leading men of the place speak highly of them, attributing to them honesty, industry, and kindness of heart. In Lucifer of the 15th, as a measure of self-defense, Mr. Harman prints this conversation between two of the town's most prominent citizens:

"'What has Harman done, anyway, that the New Era folks should be pitching into him as they are doing?'

"'I don't know, I'm sure. I know nothing wrong that Harman has done. I see him limping down to town early in the morning, and I see him going home late at night. He works hard, pays his debts, minds his own business, meddles with nobody's affairs, slanders nobody. I want no better citizen for Valley Falls than the editor of Lucifer.'"

Another man, a merchant, volunteered this testimony in favor of the reformers:

"'When these fellows come here and talk to me about the Lucifer folks, I say this to them: "Whenever you get to minding your own business as well as the Lucifer folks mind theirs, you will do much better than you are doing now."' 'When,' he added, 'a traveling man comes along and asks me about the reputation of the Lucifer Company, I say to him, "You go up to their office and make what contract with them that suits you, and if they don't pay you I will."'"

This evidence is not from their doctrinal friends, but from those who do not attend the meetings of the radicals, and do not share their principles.

Of course, the clergy are arrayed on the side of the prosecution. Theurgists never love those who expose the character of their art. Both Lucifer and Fair Play are bold and harsh critics of the demoniacal fanaticism known as Christianity, and for this of course the soothsayers would crush them. Unfortunately the majority of people are yet influenced by the medicin men of this faith and are willing to torture those who make themselvs obnoxious to these performers of incantations and necromantic rites. They hold the support of the medicin men to be necessary for their own attainment of post mortem bliss. The publishers of Lucifer and Fair Play, therefore, find the numerical strength of the tribe of Valley Falls Christians against them, notwithstanding their good characters and honest desire to serve humanity.

These two influences—local monetary and church prejudice—are very powerful, and the upholders of social and economic liberty and religious heresy will undoubtedly be hard pressed. Mr. Harman givs no intimation of practical methods for his relief to be pursued by his friends, and we at this distance can not judge what should be done. There is, however, one thing always in order. If, like the sailors abandoned at sea in an open boat, we cannot read the scriptures or remember a prayer, we can follow the example of one of them and move to take up a collection. In old times escape from persecution and martyrdom was a question of running and hiding; now it has become an affair of lawyers' fees and court expenses. The prosecution use the state's money, but the defense must foot his bills from his own pocket. Moses Harman, Valley Falls, Kansas, can undoubtedly find a legitimate place in this trial for all the financial assistance he will receive.

Evidence to be Considered.

It is a favorit allegation of the defenders of Christianity that honesty and that form of religion bear some relation to each other. They even go further and claim that all morality is based on religion. This claim we hav contested, as two facts, patent to everybody, seem to militate against it: first, irreligious people are as honest as religious persons; and second, religious persons are very often not honest at all.

A well-conducted argument has three stages or steps. The first is the introduction of the subject; the second, the facts connected therewith; third, the conclusion. The preceding paragraph is the introduction to some facts concerning a Christian church at Edwardsdale, Pa. These are the facts, gleaned from the World: The Welsh Baptist church of the town just mentioned needed some money. The contribution-box having failed and a subscription paper proving useless, the Welsh Baptist church opened a lottery. Lotteries, when conducted for other than religious purposes, are usually considered immoral methods of financial recuperation, and hav sometimes been frowned upon by the church—when she was to receive no benefit therefrom. This was not one of those times, however. The Welsh Baptist church of Edwardsdale issued lottery tickets at fifty cents each. The prizes were, first, one hundred dollars; second, a lady's gold watch; third, a silver watch, and smaller prizes not specified. Lest we be suspected of undue partiality for the church, the rest of the tale we tell in the words of the World's correspondent.

"The prospectus issued by the church authorities announced that the drawing would be conducted fairly, and that the chances for securing a prize would be better than those in the Louisiana lottery. The prospectus further stated that the paramount consideration is that the money invested would go to the church fund, and that if none of the prizes were drawn the price of the ticket would be expended in the advancement of civilization and Christianity. Strangely, but few of the tickets drew prizes. The winner's names hav not yet been announced."

Conclusion: The conclusion that we draw is that the purchasers of the tickets might hav known that the minister would never be so foolish as to spend for watches and other gew-gaws the money he received for tickets; and second, that if nobody drew any prizes the winners' names could not very well be announced. The correspondent, we think, is unreasonable in his desire for publicity, though his expectations are probably due to unfamiliarity with ecclesiastical methods.

If these facts and conclusions do not throw any light upon the statements made in our introductory paragraph, the fault is not with us, but with the church, and we beg to be absolved from any charge of intentionally misleading the public.

ANY of our subscribers having copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 16th and February 16th that they do not wish to preserve will render us a service by mailing them to this office.

NEW HAMPSHIRE has again refused to put other sects on a legal equality with the Protestant Evangelicals. The proposed amendment to article six of the Bill of Rights, making it non-sectarian, did not receive the assent of the necessary two-thirds of the voters expressing their opinion at the polls, and is consequently defeated. New Hampshire Christianity is of the old Puritan variety, and as hard and cold as the granit of her hills.

"Is it not like the lion and the lamb lying down together when the Ingersoll paper and the Christian Advocate pull together? They join in severe censure of the Christian Scientists who had a patient die up in Dakota."—Galveston News.

We acknowledge that the agreement was remarkable, but it is accounted for by crediting our Christian contemporary with an occasional lapse from theology into common sense. The infrequency of the occurrence constitutes its remarkability, so to speak.

THE New York Sun notifies the trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art that unless they take steps previous to April 1st to open the museum on Sunday the offer of $30,000 to pay the additional expense of the opening will be withdrawn. We do not believe the trustees will move in the matter at present. They are a stiff-necked and perverse generation, and legal force will hav to be applied to get them to do anything contrary to their prejudices.

IN Secular Thought we find a quotation from a Toronto missionary's letter to the Presbyterian Review, writing from Corea, stating that in the city of Seoul, with four hundred thousand population, there is no heathen temple, and that the inhabitants are absolutely without religion. Secular Thought exclaims: "Happy Coreans! Not a single heathen temple to four hundred thousand souls! No pope, no archbishop, no cardinal, no bishop, no dean, rector, curate, deacon, or acolyte, no altar, no font, no incense, no bell, book, or candle, no miter, no cope, no—why, the devil must hav it all his own way! And so he would, but the Coreans don't appear to hav a devil either, and their only chance of getting one would seem to be through the aid of the missionaries. And if these behave as some of them are said to be behaving in Japan, they will soon giv them the devil and let them know the reason why, too."

A HEBREW correspondent of the Jewish Messenger complains bitterly of the Episcopal church's methods of stealing away the young Russian Jews from the faith of their fathers. The Russian Jews are about the most ignorant, superstitious, and poverty-stricken race of people in the world. Under the delusion that gold and silver are found in the streets of American cities, which the Americans are too lazy to pick up, they flock to New York, only to find themselvs at starvation's door. They always, if married, hav large families, and it is here that the Episcopalians find grist for their mill. A missionary, usually a young woman, visits the Jew and informs him that education is the base of success in this country; that without it his children will amount to nothing. Then the missionary offers to provide the education in her school, which she says is thoroughly Hebraistic in tone, and will besides provide the children with garments and one meal per day. Five dollars is also usually left with the head of the family. The children then attend the school, and soon become Christian, "weaned away from Judaism forever." The correspondent recently visited the school, which is located in East Seventh street, and writes: "After passing the most rigid and peremptory cross-examination by the principal, she let her tongue loose, and enthusiastically related to me how often it happens that little girls, after discovering the true nature of the school, burst into tears and sob aloud that the teachings there are antagonistic to their Friday night home surroundings. 'But,' continued the principal, triumphantly, 'we hav a way of obviating these difficulties. A five-dollar note to the parents, a dress and plenty of candy to the child, soon smooth things down.'"

MR. ELBRIDGE T. GERRY'S Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is having a tussle with the legislature. This society employs men to scour the city and grab children from their parents and get them committed by a police magistrate to the care of the society, when they are farmed out to some one of the numerous Protestant institutions which make the rearing of these waifs the excuse for generous appropriations from the county treasury. The law commits the children irretrievably, and the decision of the police magistrate is unreviewable by the supreme court. Very frequently great injustice is done by the officers of the society in seizing children, and it was only the other day that the Evening World compelled the society to return a child torn unjustly from the care of parents who were shown to be both able and fit guardians for her. The bill before the legislature makes all commitments reviewable before a judge of the supreme court, and Mr. Gerry is opposing the measure with all his skill as a lobbyist. Of the bill and Mr. Gerry the morning World says: "It is opposed only by a few bureaucratic societies which draw from the public treasury a per capita allowance for every child they can seize and interne. The more children the more money. Mr. Gerry is lobbying to save his percentages. He has brought to bear secret political and religious influences in a vain attempt to force assemblymen to abandon their championship of parent's and children's rights. He will fail. Justice is too strong for him." This is another instance of the danger of intrusting private societies with power to enforce laws made solely in their interest. Their pecuniary welfare demands the finding of crime and destitution, and their officers consequently hav no difficulty in finding it. This society exists only to supply Protestant institutions with little human levers with which to pry open the money boxes of the city.

Letters from Friends.

GREEN RIVER, WYO., Feb. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please send my paper to Colfax, Washington territory. I am going to go there. I should be pleased to hear through THE TRUTH SEEKER from several parties in Washington and Oregon stating where they think would be a good place for a poor man to get him a home. A piece of land is what I am after.

Yours in Christ, E. M. ELLITHORP.

CENTER, ALA., Feb. 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed money for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND ALMANAC for 1889.

Never let up on the gods till they are demolished. When they are doomed, priests and superstition will tumble in the mire. The invincibles, reason and science, are certainly battering down the fortresses which superstitious tyranny and bigotry hav erected, and on their ruins the great laws of truth and justice will plant their victorious colors.

Your friend in the struggle for liberty, C. DANIEL.

CARROLL, IA., Feb. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: You may, or may not, be advised of the fact that we, in the West, hav a new crop of Jesuses in prospect. I hav clipped the following from the Council Bluffs Nonpareil, which seems to intimate the possibility of such a "visitation:"

According to the Omaha Republican, the Holy Ghost is at work in that city.—Leavenworth Times. That is not so clear. Messrs. Potter and Miller, the revivalists, are at work there, but the third in the trinity may, and may not be. Wait for results.

Truly yours, A. TOMLINSON.

NEW ROSS, IND., Feb. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I believe it would be well if some Liberal thinker or thinkers would compile a guide or code of morals in a cheap and neat edition, convenient for general distribution, answering the question, What does Liberalism teach? or, What does Liberalism offer in the place of Christianity? I suggest the above because such a pamphlet coming from the Liberal press would save Liberals much time in continually answering the question, What are you going to giv us in place of Christianity? I would like to hear an expression on the above suggestion through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

PHILIP BRUCH.

NEOHE, DAK., Feb. 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber to your worthy paper for only a short time, but had read it a great deal before I subscribed, and as it comes to me on the "holy day," I call it my Bible, and prize it just as highly as the good people do (or pretend to) their Bible. There are quite a number of Liberals here, but few of them will come out and own it. I giv away my papers to anyone that will read them. I had one of your ANNUALS for last year, but lost it through lending it. Inclosed find twenty-five cents for your ANNUAL for 1889. Yours for truth and Liberalism,

J. H. MASHER.

OLD RIPLEY, ILL., Feb. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: For many years I hav not patronized our county papers on account of the presses being creed-muzzled.

It seems to me that it would be a good thing to call the attention of all the readers of your matchless paper to the folly and the inconsistency of that portion of the Blair bill providing for instruction in the principles of the Christian religion, when nobody knows what the Christian religion is.

Will you tell us if we can get the account of the Star Route trial, and if so, where, as there are many who would like to hav it? JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

[We do not know where the report of the Star Route trial can be had.—ED. T. S.]

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Feb. 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The ANNUAL AND ALMANAC for 1889 received. Please accept my many thanks. It surpasses any almanac I hav ever had the honor to read, and every Freethinker ought to hav one. Words cannot express my appreciation for it. The knowledge it contains impresses me wonderfully. Such facts, such noble ideas, thoughts rich and ennobling, clothed in the choicest and most refined language, from some of America's most cultured ladies and gentlemen, surely cannot help but make those who read better men and women. Twenty-five cents is very cheap for such a splendid book, and I hope everybody will buy the ALMANAC. With respects to all truth seekers and success to all, I'll take my "exit."

R. R. JONES.

PAYSON, UTAH, Feb. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Charles Watts, of Secular Thought, of Toronto, Can., has just delivered two lectures in this place on the subjects of, first, "Secularism better than Christianity to Liv By, for This or any other Life." Second lecture, "Freethought, or what Unbelief has Done for the World." It was an intellectual feast of scientific Freethought. His lectures were largely attended, the Opera House being filled on both occasions. A more attentiv and appreciativ audience never listened to a public speaker. Mr. Watts, in his fine bursts of elocution and his strong appeals to the reasoning faculties of his hearers, cannot but arouse a greater interest in Secularism, and thus aid in redeeming this fair territory from the power of priestcraft and the domination of ecclesiastical theocracy. Then, and not until then, will Utah be suitable to take her place as a shining star among the states that adorn the emblem of the greatest nation the sun ever shone upon.

Mr. Watts at the commencement of his lectures announced that at the close of his lectures he would very gladly surrender one-half of the stage room to any one or all of the ministers and bishops present that they might enter into a friendly debate of the many points brought out in his lecture. None seemed to be moved by the spirit, so Mr. Watts again came forward and said: "Gentlemen, if my lecture conforms to your views, we hav nothing to discuss, but if it does not, why is it you do not defend your timid flocks now, at the same time not do me the injustice of trying to refute what I hav said after I am far away? Gentlemen, now is your time, and here is the place." None would accept, so H S. Brooks made a motion that a vote of thanks be given Mr. Watts for his able defense of Secularism, which was acknowledged, by the applause, to be superior to any that had preceded him in this city. Mr. Watts added many new subscribers to his valuable journal, Secular Thought. DAVID T. CLARK.

JASPER, ALA., Feb. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Freethought is gaining in north Alabama fast. I suppose there hav been fifty copies of the book called "Robert Elsmere" sold in this town, and the most intelligent portion of the community prefer to read at home or exchange thoughts with their neighbors rather than go to church. Were it not for the influence of woman, the church would fare hard.

Money is very scarce in the hands of those who earn it, or I could get some subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope for a change in this respect. THE TRUTH SEEKER ought to hav two hundred thousand subscribers, and then Liberalism would be popular and respected. No Sabbath bill could be executed then. Superstition and ignorance dare not solve a life problem, but unite to control by man-made law individual rights, and our politicians are their dupes. J. K. DEARTH.

GREAT BEND, PA., Feb. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.75, $1.50 to apply on my TRUTH SEEKER and twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1889. This is a priest-ridden town. I am the only outspoken Liberal that I know of in this vicinity. I lend my paper to all that will read it. The most of them will not look at me or the paper either. The sky-pilots, of which there are six, shun me as a bad debtor does his creditors. I received a letter from Mr. J. E. Remsburg, stating he would giv one or more lectures in my vicinity, if so desired. I would like to hear the lectures very much; but as the people here are so thoroughly Christian, and hold on to the Holy Queer with both hands and eyes shut, I think it would be casting pearls before swine to run the risk of bodily injury trying to enlighten them at present.

Yours for truth, A. B. CONKLIN.

TWIN MOUND, KAN., Feb. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER, as it has become a sort of family attachment, well-nigh indispensable. I hav the promis of a new subscriber in some two or three weeks. I want him to take the paper. Except the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, very few in this state hav heard anything about the six million petitioners asking Congress to establish and enforce a national Sunday and a national religion. We hav been agitating this subject for two weeks, trying to get signers to a remonstrance against the movement, and we hope when the principles involved are more fully explained the people will mostly sign it. The great trouble is, the great majority of people, even some Liberals, think there is no danger—Congress will never do that! and no one has time to canvass for signers. The papers say nothing, the politicians are mum, and the people are sound asleep over a mine just ready to explode. Not Blair, but,

Yours, HENRY HIATT.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Feb. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please excuse me for addressing to you these few lines, as I am not a subscriber to your valuable paper, but through the kindness of Mr. Hare I hav been enabled to read THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last two years, and I am in love with it. I hav been a cripple from my birth, and am now twenty-one years of age, but never went to school a day in my life. I was compelled by my people to join the German Methodist church, and hav been told that if I prayed fervently and had faith, God would enable me to walk without crutches, but, up to date, he has failed to do so, and now I am done with him. I never read the Bible much until the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER called my attention to it, and now I am very much surprised to find so much in it that is unfit for a young girl to read. My eyes are now opened, and I hav no further use for it nor for those who preach from it. I cannot express my thankfulness for the privilege I hav had of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think the cartoons are splendid. Please keep them up, and believe me, Ever your friend, HELEN H. DAHLE.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Feb. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Can you or any of your readers tell me anything concerning the rarity or value of a book entitled, "The Resurrection Defenders Stripped of all Defense," and signed "Moral Philosopher?" It was published in England a hundred and fifty years ago, and suppressed by the English government. The person in whose family this copy has been for a hundred years believes it to be the only one in this country, and probably in existence.

Some time ago two ladies, hailing from Topeka, came here and circulated a petition to Congress in opposition to the one circulated by the churches and Sunday-schools in reference to Sunday laws, etc. Nearly everybody signed it. After they were gone a gentleman, who claimed to know, said he believed there was something wrong, and that they would use these petitions for a different purpose by cutting off the headings and tacking the part containing the names onto the one got up by the churches. I signed the paper, thinking it was all right, but when I asked them several questions in regard to the matter, they eluded them in a way that made me suspicious. I send you a copy of the petition.

J. W. OLIVER.

LURAY, VA., March 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find fifty cents for one copy of "Looking Backward," by Edward Bellamy; also, fifty cents for two copies of "Bible Inquirer; or, A Key to Bible Investigation."

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER exceedingly. It is great food for me, as there are but very few of our Liberal denomination in this country. I knew that there was something wrong about the Bible as soon as I was big enough to know anything. I knew that God could not build human beings out of unconscious dust, and then suffer them to go to endless punishment. If there is a God, he may damn me forever for knowing this, but I expect to stick to it until death, for his sake and for truth's sake.

Please let THE TRUTH SEEKER come regularly, as I will remain, Yours fraternally, M. V. DADISMAN.

ELBA, O., Feb. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It was my good fortune to attend a series of lectures by J. E. Remsburg at Coolville and Little Hocking, O., Saturday evening, Sunday, and Sunday evening of this week. In a former letter I mentioned the fact that few Liberal lectures are delivered in this part of our state, but judging from the enthusiasm and liberality of Freethinkers in the above-mentioned places, lecturers will get more work there in the future. Messrs. N. C. Cooper, of Coolville, and J. W. Tuttle, Little Hocking, hav the honor of being in the front rank as Liberal workers.

The lectures were well attended, yet the weather could not hav been more unfavorable. One lecture was delivered in a Universalist church at Porterfield, and many Universalists were well pleased with it.

At Coolville a Christian or Disciple preacher attended and took notes, and no doubt will answer Mr. Remsburg from his pulpit. This will agitate the subject, and Christianity will be the loser. "Giv the devil his dues," so let us thank the gentleman for any good he may do, if it is unwillingly and unconsciously done. W. J.

HANNIBAL, MO., Feb. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: For the second time within the past sixty days death has chosen a victim from our ranks. On Christmas day old Sister Willis, whose death was announced in your columns a few weeks ago, was stricken down with apoplexy, and on the 15th inst. Brother A. E. Trabue succumbed to a very sudden and severe attack of pneumonia. He was sixty-four years of age, a nativ of Tennessee, a graduate of the Nashville University, and a man of rare literary attainments and moral culture. He had resided on his farm in the vicinity of this city for the past twenty-five years, and notwithstanding his outspoken opposition to Christian dogmas, no man in the country was more universally respected and beloved. The funeral, by request of his estimable wife and daughters, was conducted by Dr. A. R. Ayres, strictly in accordance with our brother's Agnostic views, and was largely attended by citizens of all classes and creeds, who came with one accord to do honor to the noble dead.

F. F. RAU, Sec. Local Brotherhood of Moralists.

ALLIANCE, O., Feb. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I see, by the last TRUTH SEEKER, you speak of the Paine celebrations in different places, and say you hav not heard anything from Alliance, O., so I will say that we were not able to procure a hall to suit us on the 29th, so we had our celebration on the 6th, and I assure you we had a fine time, considering the weather, as it was one of the coldest spells we had this winter. If it had been a little warmer I do not believe we could hav accommodated the crowd that would hav come. We had our largest theater to hold our dance and supper in. In the grand march we had ninety-four couples, and one thing that drew a good many remarks was the appearance of our old lady and Liberal friend, Mrs. Bailey (who is nearly ninety years old), on the floor to dance. Herself, daughter, granddaughter, and great-granddaughter were all on the floor at the same time. It was considered one of the finest balls given in our place for a long time. The ladies, in sympathy with us, served a grand supper, and all enjoyed themselvs well until 2:30 A.M. Although we went to a good deal of expense, we had the snug little sum of $52 left in our treasury, which makes us feel encouraged for the next year. We trust all the other Ohio celebrations were as enjoyable as ours.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, R. G. SMITH.

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The members of our society are much encouraged over the interest that is being manifested in the organization of late. We are now in excellent running order, and hav a lecture on some living issue every Sunday evening at our headquarters, Room 29, City Hall. We hav a program laid out which will cover all dates up to the latter part of March.

Even the clergy of the city are taking hold and giving us lots of free advertising, for which we are duly thankful, of course. We hav just inserted a regular standing advertisment to appear in the columns with the church notices, which seems to ruffle the feathers of the cloth. Last evening Rev. Paul F. Sutphen, of the Woodland Avenue Presbyterian church, said something like this: "There is Socialism and Secularism. I wonder how many there are in this house to night who saw yesterday's paper, announcing the meeting of the Secular Union, which is holding its meeting in this city to-night. The Secular Union is to-night holding a meeting, discussing the great question of Christianity and trying to throw a bombshell against the teachings of Jesus."

But the most important thing on the tapis is a debate which we hav arranged after a good deal of work. It is to be between the noted Mr. B. F. Underwood, who is well known to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Rev. C. S. Bates. The subjects discussed will be: First evening—"Some of the Teachings of Christianity are Detrimental to the Welfare of Mankind." Mr. Underwood, affirmativ; Dr. Bates, negativ. Second evening—"The Bible Contains Special Revelations from God to Man." Dr. Bates, affirmativ; Mr. Underwood, negativ. Third evening—"The Miraculous Both Possible and Probable." Dr. Bates, affirmativ; Mr. Underwood, negativ. This will undoubtedly be one of the most notable oral debates that has ever taken place in this country between the representativs of Christianity and Secularism. Dr. Bates is rector of St. Paul's Episcopal church in this city, and is as able a minister as Cleveland has. Mr. Underwood's record speaks for itself. We hav secured Case Hall, one of the largest in the city, and look for a large attendance. The debate will occur on the three successiv evenings of March 21st, 22d, and 23d—Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

The Cleveland Union extends a hearty and earnest invitation to all neighboring societies and the members thereof, as well as all Liberals and societies who can come, to be present at this interesting debate. F. S. Merrill, Sec.

Kent, O., March 1, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I came to America in the spring of 1873; swore allegiance on June 25, 1878, and supposed I had the right to speak of or publish facts. But it seems not.

A few weeks ago the editor of the Kent Courier kindly gave me permission to enter his printing-office and set up the patriotic poem, entitled, "All Hail to the Flag of the Free!" I also was favored with the permission to publish my paper, the Bugle Blast, or rather one-half of it, which I send you. But when it was discovered that the plot that I was exposing was a Catholic and not an Anarchistic one, I was forbidden printing the other half, and requested to deliver up what I had. I complied with the request, preserving a few copies. All that I delivered up in my presence were committed to the flames. That's the power, Rome in America! The great political parties don't dare publish, or allow to be published, the dark and bloody deeds of the Jesuit church, nor utter a word of the infernal plot she had laid to overthrow this, the only government in existence which promises relief to the oppressed of earth, through fear of losing votes or being "blown up." But, by the eternal! here's the man that will rip open their fiendish plot in the Bugle Blast, which shall be printed under the floating star-spangled banner, and, if necessary, under the protection of a military guard. Let all lovers of liberty "fall in line." I desire your readers to send two one-cent stamps for the Bugle Blast, which will show the avalanche that is about to come thundering down on this republic and sink it into eternal oblivion, unless our people immediately rouse to discharge of their duty.

John Davy.

Alliance, O., Feb. 21, 1889.

Mr. Editor: The admirers of Thomas Paine held a grand benefit ball and supper at Goddard's, the largest opera or rink hall in the city. As we could not secure the hall on the 29th, we had the dance on the 6th instant, which proved to be a complete success, both socially and financially, there being nearly five hundred present, and about one hundred and ninety joining in the grand march. Though a cold night the Liberal element from the country was well represented.

The last of November we had that grand speaker, Mrs. Colby Luther, who gave us three of the strongest speeches it had ever been my fortune to listen to. We expect to hav her with us a month in the spring. And for the next two months we hav Frank T. Ripley engaged to speak and giv tests. He is a Spiritualist, as are also C. Fannie Allyn, Mrs. Colby Luther, and other powerful Liberal speakers. We are getting quite a list of names signed to the petition against the Sunday law, or Blair bill. We are glad to see any effort to oppose the great powers of ignorance and superstition, but we are not awake to the real danger, I fear. Nothing but the education of the people who can be reached, so they will see to what this church control of the government will lead to, can save the country from a return to the Dark Ages, or a fierce struggle to regain what we may lose of our religious liberties, or hav already lost. But I expect we shall hav to lose more before the people will be awakened to the true state of danger so as to arise and resist the encroachment of ecclesiasticism. Heston has well represented the church and state union in the last Truth Seeker.

Mrs. S. S. Rockhill.

P.S.—I do not wish to be understood as saying that the Secular Union hav engaged a Spiritualist lecturer and test medium. Those who knew of our Independent church will understand that we hav all Liberal thought presented from our platform, and that the majority of the society are Liberal Spiritualists, the writer included. Newark, Feb. 24, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Last week a New York paper referred to Mrs. Webber committing suicide because she was poor and could not obtain work, while high-toned ministers are receiving large salaries. The editor failed to say one word against Roman Catholic priests, who receive good pay and are well fed and housed, and who preach the most bigoted and dangerous religion in the whole world. Sectarian editors are like politicians; they dare not say one word against Rome. The churches in Judea and Jerusalem were not half so corrupt as this wicked monster. They pretend to preach and hold up Christ as our savior, and his mother, holding Christ in her arms in his swaddling clothes, as the mother of God. He said our father was in heaven. Christ never claimed to be God; only his son. No man can be his own father. He called his mother woman. Christ was a tramp, and did not hav home, church, or altar. His disciples were illiterate, uneducated men, who followed fishing for a living—yet an honorable calling, far more respectable in my way of thinking than ministers or priests who fish for dollars and cents to support them in luxury, while the poor are starving in cellars and garrets in New York and all over the world.

The Christians preach charity, but they take good care of number one first. I hav seen Sisters of Charity leave an order for a family of six to get eighteen cents' worth of provisions at a grocery store to keep a poor family from starving, and that is called charity to the poor. There is no charity to bless the paupers in Potters' Field. Their blessings, like their anathemas, are harmless for doing good or evil, but that is all the capital they hav to start business; other professions hav to possess the solid cash. Those sanctified beats, when traveling, always parade and advertise their piety by reading their prayer-books in cars and steamboats. The sister when begging is always accompanied by a child, who resembles the sister enough to be her own child or a relation; however, that is their lame duck to create sympathy for begging. If all church property were sold, and the money spent in building tenements for the poor to liv in, it would reach and do more to lessen crime and lure people from their evil habits than to hold out vicarious atonement, by giving them absolution for their crimes and when dying to hold up a dirty cross for them to kiss. W. W. Morris.

Feb. 19, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I want to thank Brother Washburn for giving us a Hymn Book with music set to the words, the very thing I hav wanted for years. I hope he grew in grace, and long may he liv to enjoy the fruits of his labor. The Truth Seeker seems to grow better all the time, and our family could not think of doing without it. The youngest member asks as eagerly for it as the oldest. Of course, the "Children's Corner" and pictures are their chief delight. There is one thing I would like to see your correspondents improve in, and that is their treatment of each other. They should use milder and more brotherly language in discussing each other. We are all striving for the same end, viz., freedom of speech and complete separation of church and state. Our warring brothers remind me of the fable of the dragon teeth of old that were sown and grew into soldiers strong and brave, but some cunning fellow threw a stone among them and straightway they fell to and destroyed each other. I think all Secularists, Spiritualists, and Infidels should remember that divided they fall, united they stand and become a power that will eventually be felt and listened to with respect. If you must fight, let it be with the friends of superstition, having only words of cheer and brotherly love for each other. Yours fraternally, H. Bell.

New Cambria, Kan., Feb. 24, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I hav just heard the discussion by the three opposing religious thinkers read for the third time. The opening and closing remarks are very characteristic of Colonel Ingersoll, a man who uses his own reasoning on all subjects, speaks his own thoughts, exercises his inherent rights, and defends all others, of whatever shade their opinions, to exercise every right he claims for himself. But not so with Mr. Coudert, and it is of his remarks I wish to speak. He has given us his opinions in regard to free speech, yet, in accordance to the tenets of Catholic faith, he does not claim for himself the right of either free speech or free thought. Yet his inconsistent attitude toward his faith is as consistent as the arguments he uses. In the preface to his arguments he says that if President Palmer's remarks had referred to "the expression of a natural desire to see him —Colonel Ingersoll—speedily annihilated," he would "hav thought, but not said, amen." How do we know he would not say it? How do we know he would not execute his thoughts had he the power? The past history of his church reveals the fact to us that he would, but free speech is the barrier in his way which he opposes. And then he goes on to make the foundation of his argument against free speech on the basis that, if speech were free, crimes might be committed in consequence thereof, and cites the murder of Desdemona to prove his theory. He adheres to the doctrins taught to him in his cradle, simply because they were taught him there. He insists on giving them to all his posterity just as they were given to him, and simply because they were thus given to him. He was taught to accept them in blind faith. He insists that they shall do likewise. He would make the brains of his future generations automatic machines, all running in the same groove until they wear out. He would deny others the right of free speech for fear they might prove that a "falsehood" which he has never dared to question, which proves that the first impression made on the mental faculties is hardest to remove. Has he the right to influence the young mind into accepting something as infallible because it was taught to him in that way, and of which he is as ignorant as the child? And then deny Radicals the right to undeceive the rising generations in what they can prove to be a delusion and a snare? In conclusion, I would say that he need hav no fear of Catholics ever destroying the "bib" of their faith, for priests and parents see to it well that the infant's reasoning faculties are caged before it leaves the cradle, which is the only means by which it could be destroyed; and this is well illustrated by his own arguments. Mrs. F. A. Abbott.

Central City, Col., Feb. 24, 1889.

Mr. Editor: We hav a three-cornered fight out here on the school question. The Catholics make the statement that, owing to the public schools, crime is on the increase, and they in proof quote the proportion of crime of to-day as being vastly greater than it was a few years ago, and notably so when compared to many years ago in the infancy of, or before the existence of free schools. The section assailed is New England, and especially Massachusetts. In an editorial of The Truth Seeker you stated that New England is being settled up by the French Catholics of Canada, and notwithstanding I hav all the numbers of The Truth Seeker for years, I am unable so far to find it. The point I would make would be that in the districts quoted the Catholics are in the majority, and not only that, but if I am not mistaken, the statistics of crime show that about one-half of the whole number of criminals are Catholics. There appears to be a combined and determined effort on the part of the Catholic church to destroy the free schools, and by assisting me in combating their assertion regarding who make up this body of criminals you will do me a favor. It would be wise if friends throughout the country would at once report to you the point of attack, and thus allow you, through your central location, to hunt up the evidence in rebutting the charges. I shall make the assertion that about one-half of all the criminals are Catholics, and await your reply for its confirmation. Could not some capable person publish, to a profit, a work on The Power, Wealth, and Aggressions of the Roman Catholic Church, giving the per cent of crime in Catholic districts over others, with the proportion of Catholic criminals against all others? D. D. Lake.

[The passage regarding Canadian Catholics in New England to which you refer is probably this: "Canadian Catholics . . . hav driven the New Englander out of his woods, the shoemaker from his shop," etc. By squalid habits of living, such as letting buildings and all belongings fall into disrepair, going without the appliances of enlightenment, such as books, papers, etc., they underwork the Americans with their higher civilization and its accompanying requirements. But their increase has not been sufficient to cause the growth of crime you mention. This is no doubt due to the great influx of Irish Catholics. The percentage of these in Massachusetts has rapidly and steadily increased for the last thirty years. During that period, says Scribner's Statistical Atlas, they hav spread very thickly throughout all the manufacturing towns. You may make this affirmation with confidence and refer to any work of statistics of authority. Whenever one sees an increase of crime, it is always judicious to begin to look about for Catholics. The following is from the Catholic Union and Times: "As an illustration of how the old order has changed in New England, it is stated that in the entire district of South Boston included in the large parish of Our Lady of the Rosary there are only four non-Catholic families. New England has become New Ireland, and the prestige of the Puritans is at an end."—Ed. T. S.]

Adrian, Mich., Feb. 18, 1889.

Mr. Editor: One J. H. Weber, a reverend evangelist who is a sort of traveling missionary, is causing a sulphurous wave to vibrate through the Methodist Episcopal sanctuary in this city. The Rev. Mr. Weber has been holding revival meetings at various places in Michigan. An odor from Hillsdale, this state, his last place of revival effort, comes wafted on the wings of gossip to the effect that Weber, the evangelist, is a crooked disciple of Jesus. He is employed here by the Methodist Episcopal church at a salary of $50 a week to convert the ungodly of this place, and is paid by collection $8 a night. The contributions do not come up to the standard. He, the reverend, lashes the crowd with threats of hell unless they contribute the amount. He is abusiv in his remarks, calling the pillars of the church hoary-headed sinners and devils who will surely go to hell. The other night he was telling of the piety of his mother and the ungodliness of his grandma. She was a very wicked woman. She also is dead and now reposing in hell while he was rehearsing this. Some of the younger boys who were standing near the door started to leave the house. The reverend pointed his finger at them and shouted, "Those boys are all going to hell." One of the youngsters sang out, "Say, Mr., do you want to send any word to your grandmother?" The reverend was nonplussed for a moment, but rallied to the abuse of sinners. Thus he has now been a week abusing the church and the outside sinners. I am unable to attend the meetings myself, but a young student at Brown's Business College boarding at my house attends church nightly and keeps me posted faithfully. Rev. Mr. Weber has a lady companion with him. Rumor says she is not his lawful wife. Indeed, the lady admits herself she is not. She and another lady were doing some missionary work across the street from my house. The lady said to my neighbor: "Mr. Weber came to the town she resided in to conduct revival meetings. She took him to her house and kept him seven weeks free. She is now with him, helping to convert our city sinners. She, I am informed, stops at the Lawrence Hotel, a high-toned house"—which is a fact. The firm looks like a traveling harem. I hear he is going to call upon all Infidels in this place. If he comes to see me I will propound him a few conundrums. If he tries any of his bullying upon me I will turn him out. I cannot kick him, because I am crippled in both hind legs. However, I will extend to him hospitality unless he merits other treatment. I am an obtuse sinner. My weapons are scientific truths. I will countenance no nonsense from such a source. He is ignorant, and a fit subject for the mission. If such men are called of God, I pity omnipotence.

Church routine is getting monotonous. A new bull must be enacted. An evangelist is sought for. One is found—one who is qualified to perform the most attractiv antics and can enunciate the biggest fabrication. The crowd is delighted, the people turn out en masse, hurrah, a great excitement prevails. After the show society quiets down. What's the matter? There is no cause for further excitement. Now the show is over. A great work has been done for the cause of Christ and honor to the church. The exhorter has departed, the cause of excitement is removed, solemnity and wonder take the place of the "ruction." A few of the more superstitious adhere to the impression received by the exciting times just passed, while the crowd, with the Infidel, the bald-headed old reprobate, the one who has not the fear of God, cyclones, the lightning-stroke, or any other calamity, continue to jostle each other in the race of life. O. S. Barrett.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Dear, Blessed Now.

"There's a land that is fairer than day,"
Nor by faith do we see it afar;
For the fathers hav taught us the way
To prepare us a dwelling-place here.

CHORUS.—In the dear, blessed now,
We hav met on a beautiful shore.
In the here and the now,
Let us make it a beautiful shore.

Why wait for a "sweet by-and-bye?"
Why swap for some fanciful bliss,
Some wonderful world in the sky,
All the beauty and glory of this?

Let us cherish the blessings of earth,
Let us joy in the friends of to-day;
For who shall e'er measure the worth
Of our angels enveloped in clay?

Let us dream with the prophets of old,
Of a world free from sorrow and sin—
See! the hill-tops now glitter with gold!
As the reign of the Right cometh in!

Oh, sing of our glorious land!
Sing a race that is worthy its home!
Sing of Freedom! Fraternity's worth!
Sing the Kingdom of Man that's to come!

Then a truce to your "sweet by-and-bye,"
In the place where the good people go;
We can beat all the tints of the sky
If we garner the glories below.

CHORUS.—In the here and the Now,
We hav met on a beautiful shore,
In the dear blessed Now
Let us make it a beautiful shore.

A Tribute to Mary Baird Finch.

O bard of bleak Nebraska's plains,
Of tender heart, impressiv brain,
The mantle of Old Scotia's bard
To thee, most worthy, I award.

Ah, how thy sweet and thrilling lays
Recall to me thy girlhood's days;
Ah, thirty-seven years ago
How little I or you did know.

Without teachers, without schools,
Pedantic forms, restrictiv rules,
Thou hast gathered a vast store
Of science, history, Scottish lore.

In all thy glittering diadem
Thy "Bonnivard's" the brightest gem;
Oh, what a scathing condemnation
Of this enslaved and ruthless nation!

What pathos, sympathy, and heart
Thy words arouse, excite, impart!
Humanity their burden, goal,
Oh, how they permeate the "soul!"

Under repulsions, toils, and pains,
From pictures of thy fertil brain,
Clothed with comprehensiv word,
My higher nature's ever stirred.

O noble, fragil, careworn friend,
Our pen-impressions soon will end;
May your concepts, thoughts sublime,
Bless men and women through all time.

Why Freethought is the Best Thought.

Freethought is the best thought—it expresses freedom. It does not confine the powers of intellect to any subject.

Freethought has been the parent of science and inventions.

Those who are masters of their own minds, and are uncontroled by creeds and dogmas, do not believe anything until they hav just cause to do so. Those who go to church and believe all that they hear without having satisfactory proof, would probably believe that the earth is flat, as it must be according to St. Matthew iv, 8.

Freethought givs liberty of action in all things by which others may not be injured. It regards this life—we know nothing of the hereafter.

Freethought teaches man to search for the morality in nature; to study the truth and judge for himself. MILLICENT H. SCOTT.

A YOUNG man once picked up a silver dollar lying in the road. Ever afterward as he walked along he kept his eyes steadfastly fixed on the ground, in hopes of finding another. And in the course of a long life he did pick up at different times a good amount of gold and silver. But all these days as he was looking for them he saw not that the sky was bright above him and nature beautiful around. He never once allowed his eyes to look up from the mud and filth in which he sought the treasure; and when he died, a rich old man, he only knew this fair earth of ours as a dirty road to pick up money in.

Correspondence.

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 25, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send an essay on "Why is Freethought the Best Thought?" It is my first effort on any subject. I graduated from the public school about two weeks ago. My age is sixteen years.

From your sincere friend,
MILLICENT H. SCOTT.

VESTA, NEB., March 6, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I now seat myself to write you a few lines. My sister Maggie and I are going up to the school-house. We hav another neighbor—it is Mrs. Wade and Mr. Wade. Papa got some lead pencils and some slate pencils. I read in the Second Reader. My two big sisters read in the Third Reader. Two of my little sisters do not go to school. I am eight years of age, and my little sister Anna is one year old, and my other little sister is three years old. We just finished eating dinner. Good-bye.

Your loving friend, BERTHA WEDEKIND.

BOND, KAN., March 8, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter, as all the other little folks are writing to the Corner. I like to read the letters in the Children's Corner very much. I liv with my uncle and aunt. They hav a large bay-window full of flowers. Many are in bloom. I go to school. My teacher's name is Shuck. He has fifty-seven enroled scholars. I study reading, spelling, writing, and arithmetic. I go to literary meetings when the weather is nice enough. I will close for this time, hoping to see this in print.

Your little Freethinker friend,
IDA HICOX (aged 9 years).

SIOUX CITY, Feb. 13, 1889.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: I hav been a faithful reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last year, and hav read with pleasure the Children's Corner. I enjoy reading the bright, spicy letters written by the young children from all parts of the United States, and hope they will always continue to brighten the Corner. I hav two children of my own, aged six years and three years, whom I will endeavor to hav grow up as free from superstition as your faithful readers and correspondents. I am also pleased to see how the Casey dime fund has increased. Hoping I hav not been too lengthy in this, I am, sincerely, Your Liberal friend,

MRS. JASON PASSMORE.

BOND, KAN., March 8, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to the Children's Corner, as I take great interest in reading the Children's Corner and looking at the funny pictures. My little brother Otto would like to write to the Corner, but he is too little, because he is only four years old. I hav three sisters and three brothers. My oldest brother takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. My papa has a large orchard, and he sold about one hundred barrels of apples last fall. I go to school, but I hav been but three times since Christmas, because I hav been sick, and then it has been so muddy, too. I study reading, writing, spelling, and arithmetic. I will close for this time, hoping to see my letter in print.

Your little Freethinker friend,
THERESA HELLSTROM (aged 8 years).

VESTA, NEB., March 6, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Becoming interested in the Children's Corner and seeing so many letters from others, I ask leave to join the circle. I don't go to school any more; our school was out yesterday, and we had a great dinner. All the scholars and their parents were there, and some came that were not scholars. Our Literary is ended, and we can't speak there any more. I spoke two pieces the last day, and my little sister spoke one, too. My grandpa is talking of coming out here, and I guess he will come this spring. We are going to hav summer school this year, and Mr. Gibbs is going to teach it. I hav an aunt and uncle out here. My birthday is the 4th of May. I had a present last year—my aunt sent it to me. I think of nothing more to write. I hope I shall see this in print. Yours truly,

MAGGIE M. WEDEKIND.

SALONICA, TURKEY, Feb. 20, 1889.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I received your last kind letter some weeks ago, but as I had recommenced my schooling, I put off answering it; but the weather being damp and our whooping cough worse (I do not know if you hav heard that we hav it), mother has kept us at home. But I hope to go again to-morrow if the weather is fine.

First, let me thank you for the pretty pictures you sent me. I liked them very much.

Mother is afraid our kind friend, Uncle Fish, must be ill, as he has not written to us for more than two months—not since he sent us our nice Christmas present—so please, mother says, if it is not giving you too much trouble, would you send us a line or two to tell us what is the matter with dear Uncle Fish?

Mother has known Uncle Fish ever since she was a girl, and she feels sorry to think he is ill.

Papa has had a garden made for us, and we are all going to help to work in it. We hav planted very few flowers as yet, but we hope to get some nice ones soon. Our first flowers that we planted were "daisies" and "lilies," and you see these are our names. We hav such a nice dog. His name is Bolt. Father brought him from Constantinople. He is a "Gordon setter," and he loves me best of all.

I must be saying good-bye, for I hav no more room. With much love from mother and myself, believe me, always,

Your affectionate little DAISY SUTER.

COLUMBUS, KAN., March 2, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send another pentribute to Mary Baird Finch, whom I knew as a good, amiable girl of fifteen on the Illinois prairie thirty-seven years ago. I thank and bless you for the truth you are spreading, the good you are doing, and the upward and onward direction in which you are leading both young and old. At seventy, and in poverty, pains, and loneliness, I am here, not able to work, teach, or lecture, but I can still think and feel for humanity. I shall soon, at the most, rest from persecution and "the sorrows that encumber." Your appreciativ friend,

PROF. J. H. COOK.

[Thanks for kind words. May the onward days of our friend who has done good and brave work for humanity be full of peace, joy, and prosperity. He has done signal service in his time, and it should bring its reward.—ED. C. C.]

VESTA, NEB., March 6, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Interested with the Children's Corner, I thought I would try my hand again. Tuesday, March 5th, was the last day of our school, and we had a good time. We had a great dinner. We were treated with peanuts by our teacher, Albert Gibbs. My papa sends and gets seeds and has a large garden. I hav five sisters and no brothers—Maggie, Bertha, Dorothy, Susie, Anna—and my name is Eda. Maggie's age is eleven, Bertha's eight, Dorothy's six, Susie's three, Annie's one and a half, and mine is nine—I shall be ten the 7th of July. We had fourteen Pekin ducks and sold them to a man named Smith. We hav a hand working for us named Emil Smith. I guess I shall hav company to-day—three little girls—Mabel Parker, Sadie Russel, and Winnie Colton. But I think they won't come now. I've nothing more to tell. Hoping to see this in print, good-bye. Your loving friend,

EDA WEDEKIND.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IA., Feb. 24, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I would like to write a nice letter for the Corner if I knew how. I am nine years of age, and hav six sisters and three brothers, the youngest of which is nearly nine months old, and is named Robert G. Ingersoll. Papa and my eldest sister are music-teachers. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I can remember, and mamma has told me as long as I am living, and that's the reason I am a Freethinker. Our dog's name is Bruno and he seems to be an Infidel, too, as he doesn't mind Sunday any more than we do. He can say his prayers as well as I can. He is a brave dog, and when we go away from home he will accompany us. He would rather die than hav any harm done to us. I am going to school, and my teacher's name is Mrs. Ware. She is the principal of Bloomer school and does the praying every day. She begins her prayer by saying: "Remember who you are talking to," and closes with, "O God! let us all do right to-day, for Christ's sake. Amen" Papa says we can all do right without God's permission. I don't want to wear you out with my first letter, and close this before I go to bed.

Your little Freethinker,
CORNELIA KUHN.

[Cornelia has written a very nice letter, and we hope to hear from her again. Her teacher should tell her scholars to do right for the right's sake, and not for Christ's sake, who cannot be benefited in any way by our actions.—ED. C. C.]

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

A little friend of mine, on returning from church last Sunday, when questioned by her father about the sermon, said naïvely, "I only remember that he said Paul planted and had Apollinaris water!"

Grandmamma had been explaining to the little girl how our earth is kept from flying off into infinit space by the attraction of the sun, which is constantly trying to draw the earth toward itself, while the latter always keeps its distance. "Grandma," said the little girl, "I should think the sun would get discouraged after a while and let it go."

Mamma was explaining to the children the creation of the first man, and told them that God made Adam out of the dust of the earth. All during the story four-year-old Maud was attending with deep concern, and when mamma had finished she said, with an air of profound conviction: "Now, that won't do, mamma, 'cause if God had made him out of mud, when he got dry he would all peel off."

Josie, a bright little three-year-old, had just made his first visit to the barber's. He looked very dissatisfied upon his return, and his mamma asked the reason. "I don't like my hair combed this way, all in little curls," he said. "How do you wish it?" queried his mamma. "Why, I want it like Uncle Tom's. I want it in two slices." Josie's admiration of the smooth hair and straight parting suggested the funny comparison of two slices.

A minister's little daughter, who had been to church for the first time, and heard her father preach, was questioned by him on reaching home as to how she liked his sermon. There was an embarrassed silence; then the little maid, tired out with the long strain of "being good," and yet anxious not to offend in any wise, made answer, with a little, long-drawn breath of patient resignation, "You preached awful long, papa, but I beared it."

A few weeks ago a favorit uncle of Stephen Abbey, a lad belonging in the neighborhood of Kingston, N. Y., went away, to be gone for an indefinit length of time. Stephen thought the proper thing for him to do was to buy a present for his relativ, and the object he set his young mind upon was a Bible. "He has more than one Bible now," said Stephen's mother. "And he'll hav another when he gets mine," was the imperturbable reply. The Bible was purchased, and then it was decided by the boy to write an "appropriate" verse of scripture on the fly-leaf. And these were the significant words selected and written by Stephen: "And ye fathers provoke not your children to wrath (Eph. vi, 4)." Stephen's uncle, who is a man of family, was, in all probability, duly impressed.

Science Column.

Tobacco.

The scientific name of tobacco is nicotiana tabacum. Jean Nicot first sent some seeds of the plant to France from Lisbon, and from him it gets the name nicotiana. He thought, good man, it a very excellent medicin. Tabacum comes from the word tabaco, which is the name for pipe in St. Domingo. There are about fifty varieties of the plant, and it grows in America, Turkey, Germany, Sweden, and other countries. It is a nativ of America. It has large leaves, and clusters of pale-green flowers. The leaves are used after being dried in smoking, chewing, and snuffing. It is not agreeable at first, and boys and men are frequently made sick by its use. Strange to say, they will persevere in using it until the system becomes accustomed to it. No doubt it has caused the death of a great many people, who did not realize its injurious effects on the system. The writer has seen boys who first attempted to chew tobacco made very faint and sick at the stomach. Its use will produce convulsions, and it induces heart disease by quickening the action of that organ. Some people hav been made blind by its use. Notwithstanding there are many horrors attending, there is no habit so common as smoking and chewing tobacco.

As a medicin it is beneficial in gout, rheumatism, neuralgia, ringworm, and even toothache, it is said, may be cured by tobacco. "Ah, ha!" says the user of tobacco, "then don't say a word, but let me hav my cigar." But medicin is good in its place. We do not want castor oil, rhubarb, aloes, or any other medicin used every day, or at all hours of the day. Tobacco is an activ poison. The fashionable cigaret, as well as the cigar, is responsible for much disease and trouble. We frequently hear of people dying of cancer of the tongue or throat, which was induced by using tobacco. Those who work at the business of cigar and cigaret making are sometimes frightfully diseased. They moisten their work with their filthy saliva, and offensiv matter often clings to the finished cigar. So I hav been told by those who looked on and saw that they reported. It is better never to contract the habit of tobacco-using, and then you will not suffer any disturbances from it. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is the scientific name of tobacco? From what is it derived? How did Jean Nicot regard the plant? How many varieties of it? Describe it. Is it a poison? Name the effects of its continued use. What of tobacco as a medicin? What filthy practice can be named in the making of cigars and cigarets? How many of you will pledge yourselvs never to contract the habit of smoking, chewing, or snuffing tobacco?

One of the books that dropped upon THE TRUTH SEEKER editorial table last week is "Three Years Among the Americans," by Amrita Lal Roy, with the author's compliments. We remember Amrita well, and with affection. He was for several months a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER's composing room, and the best technically educated man in the whole office. He is a Hindoo of high caste, slight in stature, shrinking in manner, but possessing a great deal of quiet courage. He visited England and this country to get "civilized," but we fear his experience did not bear out the expectations he had formed from missionary reports. He wanted to learn, he tells us, the secret of the present greatness of Western nations—how the English and Americans labor, struggle, and triumph over the difficulties of nature and the problems of men. He had outgrown his own country, and his curiosity, simple as a child's, was to know what lay in the wide world outside his Hindoo notions and traditions. Contact with the English conquerors of his country probably inspired this ambition, which first turned toward a medical diploma and a commission in the English army. To that end he started for an English university to learn the secret of health. But he had not left Bombay harbor before his views widened, and his greater project formed in his mind. Two years were spent in Edinburgh University, and then he was thrown upon his own resources, to starve to death or liv as his own efforts might determin. By ways known principally in the bohemian world he struggled along in London for several months, balancing between a little hungry and very hungry, his one thought to save money enough to buy a passage to the United States. Becoming discouraged at saving it, he borrowed the cash, and then found he could retain most of it by working his passage as surgeon's assistant on a Dutch steamer. So he landed in this city with something less than forty dollars in his pocket, and then promptly contracting the pneumonia, rose from a sick bed to really begin life here with a cash surplus of a dollar and a half.

Putting off for a few days his purpose of digging out the secret of Western greatness, he bestirred himself to find out how he was to liv. That he left the country three years later with the acquaintance and friendship of "some of New York's best men in point of intelligence and culture," with an invitation "to write on the delicate subject of English rule in India in the foremost of American periodicals" (the North American Review), shows that he was not wholly unsuccessful in his search, and that there is in the Hindoo race sufficient energy to rehabilitate India and make it a nation of force and power if the English conqueror ever givs them the chance. Amrita had a friend in Dr. Holbrook, the health publisher, in Laight street; afterward in Dio Lewis, and he occasionally sold an article to the Sun. Previous to this rise, however, he accepted a porter's situation in a downtown manufacturer's office, and after he left Dio Lewis he obtained a stand in this office, almost by accident, when, he says, his path was one of pleasantness and peace. His wanderings previous to that, however, hav some interest to TRUTH SEEKER readers, though the Christian associations and Dr. Ward, of the Independent, will probably not relish his ingenuous disclosures.

Recovering from the pneumonia, he called on Dr. Holbrook, whom he had never seen, but with whom he had corresponded. The doctor's advice was to apply to the religious associations which send out missionaries for the benefit of the heathen, and see if a heathen at their door would equally draw their sympathies. He was averse to this, he says, as he had had enough experience with missionaries both at home and in England, and "knew what they were like," and felt sure he could serve neither missionary or Christian association without clashing with their hobbies and fads. But without a cent, and knowing no one, he had to throw away his squeamishness and knock at their doors. The result did not disappoint him. He says:

> I went on calling at the offices of all the Christian newspapers and associations, as well as on some well-known pastors, whose addresses I could find. But the result of my applications was the same everywhere, and as I had somewhat anticipated. They could do nothing for me, although, as I subsequently learned, some of them had large funds which were often spent in the most worthless ways. They might—indeed, they would be glad to—help me if I would turn a willing ear to the word of the Lord and giv hopes, if not the promis, of a speedy conversion—in which case I might even be sent back home after a time with a salary and a "mission" to my benighted countrymen. In other words, they could not think of taking care of my vile body until they had made secure my precious soul. None of them, of course, said as much in so many words, but it needed no more than a couple of eyes in one's head to see what they were driving at. Since then I had definit proposals of a price for my soul by men and associations whose names there is no need of mentioning. But I might, I think, very properly repeat a few words of the conversation I had with a gentleman belonging to the richest American religious paper, the New York Independent, an organ of the Presbyterians. Unless my memory fails me, the gentleman was a Dr. Watt [Ward], and, I believe, the editor of the paper:
> Dr. W.: Do you know Chunder Sen (meaning Keshub Chunder Sen)?
> I: Yes, I do. I belong to the same caste and village with him, and we may be said to be somebow related to each other. (This was before Baboo Keshub Chunder died.)
> Dr. W.: Do you sympathize with his views?
> I: No. Little, if at all.
> Dr. W.: What are your points of disagreement with him?
> I: Both in regard to creeds and practices.
> Dr. W.: Well, Chunder Sen's creed is not all correct, I agree, for he has not yet opened out his heart to receive the truth as he might; but don't you think he is preparing the way for the rule of Christ in India?
> I: There is not much chance of such a thing ever coming to pass.
> Dr. W.: Then you do not go so far even as Chunder Sen does in accepting Christ?
> I perceived the mistake I had committed in the decisiv reply I had just given. I said now that I was afraid my views were not so advanced as those of Chunder Sen in regard to the future of Christianity in India, but that I was yet a young man who had not paid much attention to religious questions, and that frequent intercourse with enlightened Christians might by and by giv me correct views on those questions.
> Dr. W.: Well, sir, I am sorry for you, but I don't see what can be done in this office to help you. You seem to be a bold young man and think you can do without Jesus, but I hope he will not forsake you in your trials. Try somewhere else. There are stores (houses) dealing in Indian goods where your knowledge of your country might secure you something.

Now that he is home again, and thinking of these experiences instead of undergoing them, Amrita can philosophize. "I hav often wondered," he says, "what meanings a great many pious people and philanthropic associations attach to such words and phrases as charity, benevolence, brotherly love, doing good to others, helping the poor, and the like—seeing that their preachings and practice are so much at variance with each other. Such inconsistency is by no means a characteristic of Christian men and organizations alone. Hav we not enough of it in our own midst? Hav we not plenty of patriots who extol the virtues of the self-denying Rishis of ancient India, or weep tears of blood over the condition of the saltless ryot, but who at the same time scruple at no means to turn a rupee, or liv a life of luxury and extravagance that loudly mocks at the privations suffered by those with whom they profess to sympathize? Hypocrisy is the curse of the age, a hypocrisy fostered by the fact that the current religious beliefs of the day hav been found to be at variance with the facts of life, and therefore hav lost their hold upon the educated mind. They are professed as a matter of form, but having lost life their phrases and formulæ hav degenerated into meaningless cant. No gospel has yet preached that the performance of duty toward our fellow-men is the supreme religion, and so men now recite pious or philanthropic cant, and earn the reputation of being good and great, even if they outrage every requirement of duty and spend time in worshiping self."

However, the missions were of use to Amrita, if the associations and individual Christians were not, and on Christmas, 1882, among bootblacks and newsboys and the wretched of all sorts, he obtained a good meal at a downtown charitable "home," but which, he says, put him vividly in mind of the days of want ahead. The missions only feed the hungry on holidays, leaving them to rustle the rest of the time. Some of the poor who attend one of their Christmas or Thanksgiving banquets are not present at the next. They are in Potter's field, which Christian civilization keeps in order, and Archbishop Corrigan blesses, for their especial benefit. But Amrita, on the day after his feast at the mission, secured the place as porter, to which his nationality helped him, the proprietor preferring an "intelligent colored man," as his advertisment stated. From that on, Amrita suffered no more, and though he did not sweep the Cliff street office long, he always knew where he could get a meal of victuals. Writing for the Sun and other papers, and helping Dio Lewis on his Monthly, filled in his time till he came to this office. Reporting he found to be difficult, as his complexion and timidity were against him. Besides, it kept him so busy that no time was left to dig out the secret of Western greatness, which was his object in the country. So he looked, he tells us, for a situation where he might hav regular wages and need not be bound to stay longer than he liked. He tried various trades, and his last thought was of the printing-office. He knew a little of the art, not enough to make large wages, but he could eke out the income by contributions to the daily press, and so, he says, he "kept looking out for a job as a printer, and before long it came." He tells us how it was:

> It was in the office of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, the leading organ of the American Antichristians, followers of Bradlaugh and Ingersoll. In accordance with a rule of the printers' union of New York, few printing offices would employ as a journeyman printer anyone who had not served three years' apprenticeship in the business, but an exception was made in my case through the services of a friend who was one of the officers of the union, and the proprietors of THE TRUTH SEEKER were willing to giv me a chance. I joined their office toward the end of 1884, and stayed with them till the day of my leaving America. I was soon practiced in type-setting enough to make a living, and as the "boss" of the place allowed me liberties not generally given in printing-offices—for instance, in the matter of the hours of coming to work and leaving it—I spent my most peaceful days in New York as a printer at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. At this date I cannot help comparing the conduct of these so-called "Infidels" with that of the pious Christians of New York, to whom I had applied for a situation on my arrival in America, very much to the prejudice of the latter. Nor can I refrain from acknowledging with gratitude that by few persons in New York were the peculiar circumstances in which I was placed so considerately recognized, or so much facility for making my way given to me, as by the Infidels of THE TRUTH SEEKER office.
> From the day of his entrance he was welcome. And when he left, the boys gave him a "send-off" that very nearly wrecked the office, and at which more talent assisted than often gathers round the great ones of earth when they take steamship for Europe. The officer of the union to whom he refers was John N. Bogart, a labor reformer, and the "boss" who allowed him liberties was the foreman George Macdonald, now one of the editors of San Francisco Freethought. Amrita picked up "civilization" fast, and under the genial tuition of the warm-hearted printers soon learned many things astonishing to the simple heathen. A prince in his own country, he was in this a steadfast friend of the workingmen, and took great interest in all their movements, attending their meetings and speaking from their platforms. His pen was freely at their service. In his own way he was independent as a king. Once some thief broke into his lodging and stole his clothes while he was asleep. He came down to the office the next morning in borrowed garments, and truly Solomon nor any of the other wise men of the East were arrayed like unto him. The boys felt genuinly sorry for him, and printers' sympathy always takes the form of a subscription. The writer and the business manager and foreman were mulcted a couple of dollars apiece, and the printers and clerks made up enough to buy a good suit of clothes. But Amrita vetoed the scheme, when he found it out, and the money had to be returned to the donors. He says now in his book that it is a consolation to know that during his three years' stay in America he never was obliged to anybody's charity, nor did he ever borrow a dollar that he could not quickly repay. He carried this independence even into his work, and set type when it suited his own convenience rather than the necessities of the office. Under another foreman he would not hav retained his situation very long. But George saw the angel feathers cropping out, and let him come and go as he pleased. This was necessary, for Amrita's object was not to make a fortune, but to see for himself "what made the Americans a successful people in the struggle of the world." THE TRUTH SEEKER was not only enlightening the United States, but it was a base of supplies for the regenerator of India. Our princely compositor is now publishing in Calcutta a paper which he calls Hope, and which, perhaps, will hav a great deal to do with the inspiration of a new energy, if it be possible, in the Indian race.
> Amrita imagins he found our secret. It is, Energy. Our customs and manners he cares little about; they are the merest externals of life and he would not transplant them to India. But the push and swing and activity of the West, mental and physical, carried into Indian life would, he thinks, giv his race more of the profits of India's connection with England, of which heretofore she has been outwitted. One cannot help thinking that he has not in this taken sufficiently into account the influence of climate and the habits of the two races in eating and living. Energy requires cold weather in which to grow, and brain is made from blood. Rice and vegetables are food for ascetics, for religious brooders, for mystical poets; but business men, manufacturers, inventors, pioneers, men of action, want blood-making foods. But these cannot be safely eaten in hot climates, and though it appears that the Hindoos must change their mode of living before they will be able to cope with the English among them, the latter constantly recruited from England's colder climate, it is doubtful if a change is possible. The history of the world has shown us the inexorable natural law that only where winter alternates with summer heat can man attain his highest development. The energy displayed in developing India during the past thirty years is more due to foreigners than to nativs. The nativ population has seen its period of youth and manhood; its decay must be prevented by the infusion of new and vital blood.
> When Amrita landed in New York he supposed himself to be a direct descendant of the Supreme Brahma. This idea the missionaries had never been able to wrest from him. But at the "chapel send-off" (this is not slang, but a technical name for a printers' farewell meeting) given him by the printers of this office, he said that what the missionaries had failed to do Freethought and the workingmen's cause had accomplished. He had concluded to drop the sacred thread which bound him to the gods, and merge himself with the great family of mankind, who embodied all the godliness of which we hav any knowledge. At this meeting, which took place around the composing-stone March 12, 1886, revolutionary talent was conspicuous, and Amrita has gone back to Calcutta imbued with all the independent notions of Irish agitators, Russian Nihilists, American labor reformers, French Positivists, and United States heretics. He was an apostle of each and all. There were James Redpath, Mr. Somoff, Ed. King, and John Bogart, all carrying the most explosiv notions in their heads, and Roy had been indoctrinated by each. He had an awful load to carry back to India, and the wonder is, if not that one small head could hold it, that he has not ere now come into contact with the Calcutta authorities, who hav small patience with revolutionists. That he has not may be credited to the civilizing and orderly influences of the Freethought ideas he gained in this office. But he will undoubtedly be heard from in time, though not, it is hoped, through carrying out Mr. Somoff's political policy. Mr. Redpath is a better model, as he never had to flee his country.

Obituary.

Mr. Joseph A. Allen, one of our very few New Hampshire subscribers, sends us this obituary of his wife, published in the New Hampshire Argus. Mr. Allen has our honest sympathy in his affliction. His wife, we know, was all the obituarian writes:

Mrs. Isabel M. (Trescott) Allen passed to spirit life February 7th. She was born in Claremont, N. H., Nov. 2, 1852, and was the only child of Abner and Malvinia Trescott. She was married to Joseph A. Allen April 30, 1873. The two first years of her married life were passed in the small manufacturing village of Guild, in Newport, N. H. From there she and her husband moved to South Acworth, where they hav since resided. She leaves a husband, one son, an aged mother, and a wide circle of friends to weep for her departure. She was one of those generous persons whom everyone respects, and her memory will be enshrined in the hearts of all who knew her. She was kind and loving, good and gentle. Purity, sincerity, and charity were the activ living principles that guided her life. Beneath her quiet and modest exterior were stored precious gems of useful knowledge. She was an ardent supporter of everything conduciv to human well-being, either physically, mentally, morally, or spiritually. Charity for all was the rule of life with her. She was a stranger to selfishness and always tried to see how much she could do for those she loved. Those who knew her best loved her best. Earth has lost a noble soul, while spirit life has gained a treasure. She has but laid aside her earth form as a cast-off garment, that she may expand into a more perfect state.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

News of the Week.

THE pope is about to issue an encyclical to induce the nations to compel Italy to restore his temporal possessions.

OF the 11,000 people arrested in New York for the last quarter officially reported, over one-half were without occupation.

JOHN BRIGHT is very ill again.

HARRISON begins every day with family prayers.

MINERS are now idle about two-thirds of the time.

TWENTY-TWO states hav established labor bureaus.

THE Knights of Labor are reported to be reviving.

HONOLULU, Hawaii, has been lighted by electricity.

A PORTUGUESE anti-slavery society has been formed.

CHICAGO Socialists hav issued a ticket for the election.

THE weavers' strike at Fall River, Mass., throws out 20,000 employees.

INDUSTRIAL training is found to be the best basis in education of Indians.

SWEDEN now furnishes as large a number of our immigrants as any other country.

IN the late labor riots at Rome many buildings were broken open and plundered.

THE Japanese minister of the interior has arrived at Berlin to study the German system of government.

THE average age of criminals is diminishing. Two-thirds of professional criminals are under twenty-one.

THE great famin in China continues, and many are committing suicide in despondency, it being yet three months before harvest.

THE remarkable achievements of the Lick telescope hav stimulated emulation, and proposals to construct still larger ones are made.

THE New Jersey Federation of Trades are pushing a bill forbidding employers' taking a pledge from their workmen not to belong to a union.

THE New York legislature is considering repeal of compulsory vaccination, many doctors holding that vaccination is valueless or injurious.

PRINTERS' unions denounce Harrison for nominating as minister to France the editor of the Tribune, Whitelaw Reid, an enemy of organized labor.

THE New York state labor appropriation of this year allows $15,000 for the board of arbitration, $30,000 for factory inspection, and $20,000 for labor statistics.

IT is reported that the French government has complained to the pope of the support given by the French clergy to Boulanger, the would-be usurper and military dictator.

A PAPER called the Woman's Journal has been started in Greece by a nativ woman, who says that in that land "the rights of women are almost nil." Greece is enthusiastically Christian.

IN London, which forbids the sale of papers at news-stands Sundays, the New York Herald has started the delivery of its European edition by means of cabs, and is being denounced by the duke of Argyle, Cardinal Manning, and such pious despots.

THE Palmer Brothers engaged the New Haven Opera House for a Spiritualistic séance on the evening of Sunday the 17th, but as the doors were about to be opened the crowd waiting to buy seats were compelled to return home by the arrival of a notice from City-Attorney Dailey that all who attended would be prosecuted under a law of 1784: "Any person who shall be present at a concert of music, dancing, or other public diversion on Sunday, or on the evening thereof, shall be fined $4."

THE LUST FOR STRONG DRINK APPROVED.

And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink.—Deut. xiv, 26.

Odds and Ends.

"I DON'T know how it is," said the expressman, "but ever since our town went no license, more'n half my packages are marked 'Glass, handle with care.' I'm getting sick of it; I can't load and unload in twice the time I used to."

PHILADELPHIAN: "Is it true that the Sorosis Society has gone or is going out of existence?" New York girl: "Yes. You see, everybody knew who the charter members were, and—and—well, they thought the society had lived long enough."

SCENE: Village Sunday-school. Clergyman questioning a lot of small boys in a farming district. Clergyman: "How did Jacob know that it was really Joseph sending for him from Egypt?" Small boy (excitedly): "He seed his name on the wagons."

"ADELE, hav you seen those lovely prayer rugs at the down-town stores?" "Yes, I hav one myself." "Oh, how nice!" "Yes; I told papa that I wouldn't pray any more unless I had one, and that fetched him. Papa is quite pious at home, you know."

HE was taking her home, after the theater and a little supper at Delmonico's. "Darling," said he suddenly, as he gazed dreamily at the silvery disk overhead, "why am I like the moon?" "It isn't because you're full, is it?" she asked, as she edged away from him. "No," said he, sadly; "it's because I'm on my last quarter."

BEFORE EVOLUTION.

Sweet monadess, my darling,
We love each other now,
But in the evolution
Will you forget your vow?
Oh, will you love me dearest
(The monad's pleadings ran),
When you've become a woman,
And I've become a man?

NAPIER'S famous dispatch from India announced his victory in one word, Peccavi—which is, by interpretation, "I hav Scinde." Very much of the same kind was General de Bourmont's message to the French war minister in 1830, when the dey of Algiers escaped him after being taken. Perdidi Diem—I hav lost a dey. It is said that Drake, when the ships of the Armada turned their sails, sent to Elizabeth the word Cantharides—that is, the Spanish fly. This last is probably a fable.

KISSING BY PHONOGRAPH.

Few, of true amorous orthodoxy,
Hav ever cared to kiss by proxy,
But Cupid's realm looks clean awry
When Edison—beshrew the man!—
Produces this preposterous plan
For kissing by machinery!

"Make me immortal by a kiss!"
Cried Helen's lover. How would this Strike learned Dr. Faustus?
Though Science dominates the earth,
One sometimes wonders is it worth
What it seems like to cost us?

Troy's paragon—pray do not laugh—
Had she possessed a phonograph,
Might hav bequeathed her kisses
To Faustus, or to you or me.
She din't, and I don't quite see
That much a fellow misses.

Of course, to press one's lips to hers
Were rapture; but a man prefers
Direct and labial contact
Ard, when one thinks of wax and wire
As media for love's "kiss of fire"—
No, Edison, it won't act!

MRS. R—— was telling her Sunday-school class of small boys about the "Shut-in Society," an organization whose members are mostly confined with illness to their beds or rooms. "Whom can we think of," said she, endeavoring to awaken the interest of the class in these unfortunates, "that would hav had great sympathy for those that are so shut in?" "I know," said a little boy with brightened face, "some one in the Bible, isn't it, teacher?" "Yes," said Miss R——, "and who, Johnny?" "Jonah," was the spirited answer.

THE PROFESSOR OF BOTANY TO HIS FAIREST PUPIL.

Thou tender, graceful little maid,
I see thee now at play at tennis,
In modesty of youth arrayed.
Thou 'mindest me of the daisy, which to enlightened minds is yclept bellis perennis.

I can but love thee, little girl,
I fain would call thee mia sposa;
Thou art as blooming and as fair
As that queen of the garden the rose; see Linnæus—Rosa.

My doting heart doth fly to thee—
It is thine own heart—nolens volens;
And in the garland of thy years
I pray may come no rue, the proper name of which, by the by, is Ruta graveolens.

For all thy blue (viola) eyes,
Thy lips and cheeks like blushing rosa,
Thou art as modest and as shy
As the common field flower popularly known as the buttercup, but generically as the Ranunculus bulbosa.

Thy lips like Cupid's bow appear
Or like a charming coral chalice.
Thou art as innocent and pure
As purest snowdrop—the snowdrop is the colloquial name; in reality it is the Galanthus nivalis.

Although so gay and thoughtless thou,
Thy joys on wantonness ne'er border,
Thou art an airy butterfly—
Butterfly is only the vulgar vernacular for an insect of the Papilio family, Lepidoptera order.

When thou dost smile in maiden glee,
Thy profile is a classic Grecian,
Thy teeth to pearls I must compare
(Pearls, by the way, are merely bicarbonate of lime, interstratified with animal membrane: in mollusks the result of a diseased secretion).

If thou dost love me, dear, or no,
I love as Strephon loved his Phyllis.
I pray thy fair head may be crowned
With wreaths of laurel—which as you probably know is the Laurus nobilis.

Gems of Thought.

IT is salutary for pious Christians to liv retired, and separated from the world; this is calculated to make them sour, unsociable, and, above all, to heat and excite their brain. The society of men spoils us, and is a stumbling-block in the way of our salvation by preventing us from giving ourselvs wholly and entirely to the contemplation of the sacred truths we shall never be able to understand.—Voltaire's Pocket Theology.

THE settled practice of republican and imperial Rome was to hav swift communication with all her outlying provinces, by means of substantial bridges and roads. One of the prime duties of the legions was to construct them and keep them in repair. . . . But the dominion of papal Rome, depending upon a different principle, had no exigencies of that kind, and this duty accordingly was left for the local powers to neglect. . . . These restraints upon intercommunication tended powerfully to promote the general benighted condition. Journeys by individuals could not be undertaken without much risk, for there was scarcely a moor or forest that had not its highwaymen.—Professor Draper in The Conflict Between Religion and Science.

SOME claim that the precepts of Jesus are the source of all morality. He certainly was largely imbued with the spirit of morality, but Seneca and Epictetus gave precepts equally elevated. Renan says: "Jesus Christ neither overturned nor discovered anything." Some of his teachings are impracticable, and some of his acts are open to criticism. . . . The New Testament givs low views of marriage, represses woman, upholds tyranny by preaching submission to "the powers that be," givs but slight intimation of kindness to animals, and attempts to show that when God seemed to care for oxen it was really ministers of the gospel who were the objects of his concern. . . . Slavery received no condemnation, and worldly learning and physical culture were despised.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

THE love of health is wrong; the body is the enemy of the soul, and does not deserve our care. "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." "Bodily exercise profiteth but little." "There is nothing from without a man that, entering him, can defile him." The pursuit of natural science is wrong; doubt and free inquiry are sinful; submissiv faith is the gate to heaven. "Blessed are they that hav not seen, and yet hav believed." "He that believeth in me hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation." "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maranatha." "If an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we hav preached, let him be accursed." "He that believeth on me is not condemned, but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he does not believe in the name of the only begotten son of God." "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them and cast them into the fire, and they are burnt." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." The trust in secular remedies is wrong; diseases can be cured by faith. "Receive thy sight, thy faith hath saved thee." "If any man is sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." "And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." "And, when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of disease."—Professor Oswald in The Secret of the East.

IT is incessantly repeated, and many sensible persons are induced to believe, that religion is a restraint necessary to men; that without it, there would no longer exist the least check for the vulgar; and that morality and virtue are intimately connected with it. To perceive the inutility of religious notions, we hav only to open our eyes and contemplate the morals of those nations who are the most under the dominion of religion. We there find proud tyrants, oppressiv ministers, perfidious courtiers, shameless extortioners, corrupt magistrates, knaves, adulterers, debauchees, prostitutes, thieves, and rogues of every kind, who hav never doubted either the existence of an avenging and rewarding God, the torments of hell, or the joys of paradise.—D'Holbach.

ALL that is good in our civilization is the result of commerce, climate, soil, geographical position. —Ingersoll.

NOTHING can be more infamous than intellectual tyranny. To put chains upon the body is as nothing compared with putting shackles on the brain. No god is entitled to the worship or the respect of man who does not giv, even to the meanest of his children, every right that he claims for himself.—Ingersoll.

THE TROUBLE WITH PAT.

The Irish nation lies between the millstones of Papal and Protestant tyranny, and at the slightest effort to make a healthy movement one or the other givs it a grind.—Chas. De Kay in March Century.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Methodist Missionary Society expects to be something less than $300 000 short in its collections this year, and special contributions are solicited.

Two Scotch tramps, man and wife, make a good living off of the baby. "We just gets 'im christened," explains the man, "in all the towns we passes, and then, you see, parson makes us all comfortable wi' summat to eat and money for beds. On days orful bad we has to do 'm twice."

DURING 1888 the pope's income amounted to £504 0 0, of which £372 000 came from Peter's pence, and £132 000 from the interest of money invested out of Italy. The Vatican expenditure amounted to £340 000. His holiness also received in money presents during his Jubilee the sum of $480,000.

TONY PILCHER, of Melrose, Fla., became impressed with the belief that the only true baptism was immersion, and that everybody and everything should be baptized. He took all his chickens and pigs to a lake and baptized them, and almost every day he would baptize himself. When Sheriff Shelly went to arrest him Tony tried to baptize him, but the sheriff was too much for him, and got the irons on him.

A NEW ENGLAND Sunday-school teacher had for a lesson the story of the Prophet Elijah and the widow whose whole supply of food, when the man of God asked for refreshment, was "not a cake, but a handful of meal in a barrel and a little oil in a cruse." When the teacher asked her class how much food the widow had, the answer came quickly from one little fellow: "She had just enough meal to make a cake and oil enough to start a fire."

THE startling announcement goes forth that Keely, the motor man, has perfected the cylindrical device which will enable his ether etheric to annihilate the obstacles which hav hitherto stood in its way, and that his machine can now pump water and raise stock in a more remarkable way than ever. Keely put his trust in Providence, R. I., and had the cylinder referred to made in that city. It is capable of withstanding a pressure of 3,500 pounds to the inch.

THE journal Science says that in an experimen al observation of thirty-eight boys of all classes of society, and of average health, who had been using tobacco for periods ranging from two months to two years, twenty-seven showed severe injury to the constitution and insufficient growth; thirty-two showed the existence of irregularities of the heart's action, disordered stomach, cough, and a craving for alcohol; thirteen had intermittency of the pulse, and one had consumption. After they abandoned the use of tobacco, within six months one-half were free from all their former symptoms, and the remainder recovered by the end of the year.

THE North Carolina papers contain surprising news of the negro exodus from that state. The colored people are leaving some of the eastern counties in droves, and the consequent decrease in the supply of field hands is alarming the farmers, who are anxious to hav the migration prohibited. It is estimated that between fifteen and twenty thousand hav left the state this year. At first they struck out for the cotton plantations of Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana, but more recently they hav been going to Arkansas, where, it is said, they propose to colonize on unoccupied lands, as tillers of the soil in an independent way. An Emigration Society has been formed, and a state convention is soon to be held in Raleigh to promote its objects. Many North Carolinians desire to take forcible means of putting a stop to the exodus; but there is no probability that the measures proposed for that purpose could be enforced for any length of time. There does not appear to be any objection in Arkansas to the new-comers from the Tar state.

POLYGAMY, says London Truth, starts with the great advantage of the support of revelation. For whereas—as all searchers of the scriptures are aware—the practice of polygamy is frequently recommended in the sacred writings, it is nowhere condemned, except—and then more by way of caution than of prohibition—in the single case of bishops, who, being usually elderly—and in those days invariably poor men—were advised to content themselvs with one wife. In fact, I take it, upon a calm and dispassionate view of the subject, that monogamy must be regarded as a politic concession made by the early Christianized Jews to the pagan Romans. It was, in fact, a sort of giv-and-take, or compromise. The pagan Roman found himself with many gods but only one wife. The Christianized Jew had many wives but only one God. They "split the difference," as Artemas Ward would hav said, and the result was "Christian marriage."

THE promulgation of the new constitution of Japan on February 12th, was the occasion for a murder that must always be memorable. It was that of one of the most influential nobles in effecting the change in Japan's fortunes, Viscount Mori. He had become imbued with ideas in advance of his country through a European education, and it was his contempt for all superstition that cost him his life. A very bitter opponent had been his elder brother. He thought that the adoption of Western institutions would be fatal to the country, and when the new order of things was decreed he recorded his solemn protest in a memorial, and taking the document to the office of the council of state, disemboweled himself in the street, an act, doubtless, that served to stimulate the fanaticism which led to Mori's murder. That came about in this way. One of the chief religions of Japan is Shintoism, really a form of sun-worship. In the eyes of its votaries, among which Mori had been born, Shintoism and imperialism are synonymous. They hold that the emperor derives his divine right to rule from the Shinto deities, his ancestors, and any semblance of disrespect to the shrines of the latter constitutes a sacrilege. Mori had lost all respect for the supernatural elements of the religion, and on a visit to the shrines of Ise two years ago, the chief temple, he entered the principal shrine without removing his boots, and raised a sacred curtain with his cane. A weak and delicate devotee, a government employee named Buntaro, was so worked upon by this conduct, that upon the day of Mori's triumph, the promulgation of the constitution, he stabbed him to the heart, and was cut to pieces the next moment by the attendant soldiery. Strangely enough, the murdered man was buried with Shinto ceremonies.

How They Behaved When They Had the Power.

Important lessons are drawn from history. Human nature remains much the same as century after century glides into the misty past. How man behaved himself, under certain conditions, in times gone by, furnishes a fair index to his conduct at present, the conditions being the same. A brief review of our colonial history is of the utmost value to us at this our critical period. Such review unearths "religious man" as he really is when clothed with authority. His selfish zeal leads him astray, and transforms him into a demon. We read the Blue laws of Connecticut with amazement, and wonder how the judgment of man could be so twisted as to make it a crime to be punished for a mother to kiss her babe on Sunday. We read of Cotton Mather, of the Rev. John Winthrop, both filled so full of the Holy Ghost that holiness oozed out at every pore, and think how much better for humanity had they never been born! How worthless is a man when he is filled with something that cannot be verified, is not susceptible of proof, and benefits neither himself nor anyone else! Cotton Mather and the Rev. John Winthrop differ from Ghengis Khan and Caligula only in extent of opportunity. The same loathing disgust arises when rehearsing the deeds of one as of the other. The name of John Calvin is in the same list. Some of the worst monsters in human shape hav been very religious. The amount of religion professed is no index to the manhood possessed.

If anyone desires further testimony relativ to the thoughts suggested in this article, such a one is referred to "History of Early Quakers," by Sewell; "History of Quakers in New England," by Joseph Besse; "The Baptists," by Morgan Edwards; the writings of George Bishop, entitled, "New England Judged;" "The Bloody Tenet," by Roger Williams; "History of the United States," by John Howard Hinton; Benedict's "History of the Baptists;" also, a lecture by E. P. Bassett, Esq., on "Calvinistic Cruelty," before the Progressionists of Toledo, O.

The Blair Sunday bill is now at rest until the next session of Congress. In the mean time it is well to not allow its rest to be one of continued quiet. We sit in judgment-seats whether we will or not. We say of a man he is good or bad, according to his deeds. A political party is tried by its record, i. e., its works. The same is true of creeds. Our verdict is, good or bad, as results show. If more good than bad, our judgment affirms; if more bad than good, we say, "Down with it!" These conclusions force themselvs upon us whether we will or not.

Now comes Senator Blair, seconded by his orthodox friends, and asks that a law be passed by Congress to nationalize the Christian Sabbath—unite church and state. We cast about us to see how these Christians behaved themselvs in times past when thsy had the reins of government in their own hands. From the time the Puritan fathers landed on Plymouth Rock, in 1620, to the Revolutionary war, this Calvinistic school of Christianity swayed the scepter of power over the American colonies. This historic period covers a little over a century and a half. Now let us examin the record and see how these early Christians behaved themselvs.

In 1629 the first court of the colony of Massachusetts was held in Boston. This court enacted that none should be admitted freemen or entitled to a share in the government, be chosen magistrate or serve as jurymen, except they be members of their church. By this law, all persons that disagreed on points of doctrin, church disciplin, or forms of worship were at once divested of all the rights of citizens. Later in their colonial history, Charles II. forced these fanatics to alter this cruel law, but they only changed it in appearance, not in its severity.

The Rev. John Cotton was the first minister of the church of Boston. By request of the general court, this reverend framed a code of laws, founded on the laws of Moses. By these laws the government, in imitation of the Jews, became a theocracy.

The Catholic colony, under Calvert, had fastened itself in Maryland. This colony gave protection to all religious sects. The persecuted from the Puritans on the north, and the persecuted from the established Church of England on the James river, south, alike found an asylum with the Catholics in Maryland. These Protestant fugitivs soon became numerous, revolted against the hands that had protected them, overthrew the Catholic rule, took Governor Stone prisoner, and condemned him to be shot. The victors persecuted and drove from the colony all who could not rest on their "iron bedstead," and wound up the ungrateful proceedings by declaring that any person professing the Catholic religion should not be considered within the protection of the law.

The Podunk Indians rejected with scorn the Christ of the Rev. John Cotton and the Rev. John Elliot, but accepted the Christ of the "Black Robes"—Catholics.

Roger Williams entered the land of our Pilgrim athers in 1631. He was a liberal Puritan, an advocate of intellectual, political, and religious freedom. Williams was soon banished from the colony, and took refuge with the Narragansett Indians on Long Island sound, and formulated the model for the future republic of the United States, so far as concerns the total separation of church and state.

Sir Henry Vane arrived in Boston from England October, 1635. Sir Henry was, perhaps, the first man that laid down with precision the inviolable rights of conscience and the exemption of religion from all civil authority. As soon as his sentiments were known he encountered violent opposition from the clergy, headed by John Winthrop. He returned to England to find a more tolerant home than the land of the Pilgrim fathers.

Anne Hutchinson, with her husband, landed in Boston in 1634. She was the founder of the Antinomian society in the New England colony. She also had the hardihood to assert women's rights in a theological point of view. For this the ecclesiastical synod banished her, with several of her associates, from the colony in November, 1637.

In 1639 six persons made an attempt to organize a Baptist association at Weymouth, some fourteen miles southeast of Boston. Six of these offenders were arraigned before the general court of Boston. Some were fined and imprisoned, others fined and disfranchised. No Baptist association was formed at Weymouth.

Lady Moody was a woman of note, and quietly resided on a plantation of her own at Lynn. She denied the efficacy of infant baptism, for which she was banished from the colony in 1638. As early as 1642 this Protestant colony had enacted a code of laws making twelve crimes punishable with death.

These Puritans hated to the death the religion professed by colonists of Rhode Island, founded by Roger Williams, whom they had banished in July, 1651. Obediah Holmes, John Clark, and a Mr. Crandall, representativs of the church at Newport, R I., by request, visited the house of William Witter, of Lynn. It seems that Witter was in sympathy with this Newport church, but of too great age to visit Newport. On Sunday, the three, in company with Mr. Witter's family, held divine worship at the house of Witter, some two miles from Lynn. While Clark was preaching, a constable entered the house, arrested the three friends of the venerable Mr. Witter, hastened them to Lynn, seated them in the church, where prayers were being said. The three refused to take off their hats, whereupon, by order of the magistrate, their hats were plucked off. Mr. Clark arose and dissented from their worship and refused to join in it. They were immediately committed to prison and remained in jail two weeks before they were granted a hearing. The warrant for their arrest charged them with being "erroneous persons" and "strangers." The court of assistants passed upon them this sentence: "That Holmes should pay a fine of £30, Clark £20, and Crandall £5, and in default of payment to be publicly whipped."

They all refused to pay their fines and were returned to prison. Mr. Clark's friends paid his fine without his consent. Mr. Crandall was released under promis to appear at the next court. Mr. Holmes was kept in prison until the next September, when he was dragged to the whipping-post and publicly whipped in a most unmerciful and barbarous manner. In Mr. Benedict's "History of the Baptists" the sentence of Obediah Holmes is copied in full. He denied infant baptism, was an excommunicate, and came within the colony. In a note copied from Gov. Joseph Jenks's manuscript we read that "Mr. Holmes was whipped thirty stripes, and in such a cruel manner that in many days, if not some weeks, he could take no rest but as he lay upon his knees and elbows, not being able to suffer any part of his body to touch the bed whereon he lay."

The punishment of the good man, Obediah Holmes, was so shocking to humanity that a number of persons expressed sympathy for the sufferer. For these offenders, warrants were promptly issued. Eleven escaped arrest, but two, John Spur and John Hazel, were caught, tried, and sentenced to pay a fine of forty shillings, and in default, to receive ten lashes. Rather than witness a repetition of the cruelty incident to the whipping-post, their friends paid the fines. John Hazel was nearly sixty years of age, and died before reaching home.

The first Baptist church in Boston was organized May 18, 1665, consisting of only nine persons. Benedict tells us that this little church, a part of whose members were females, and the rest illiterate plowmen and mechanics, made full employ for the rulers of Massachusetts for a number of years.

Mr. Morgan Edwards further tells us that it would require a volume to contain an account of the sufferings endured by this little band of Baptists, inflicted by their rulers. The faithful nine were first fined, then imprisoned and sentenced to banishment. They refused to leave the colony, and were kept in prison nearly a year. Soon after this three more, Elder Russell and his son, and one Foster, were thrown into prison and remained six months. It seems these three denied the efficacy of "infant baptism," for on May 20, 1672, we find the general court of Boston passed an act by which the penalty of banishment was to be inflicted upon all who should openly oppose, or condemn, "infant baptism." Amid all this persecution the adherents to the Baptist church still increased. Six years after this it was decreed by this same court that no person should erect, or make use of, a house for public worship, without license from the authorities, under penalty of forfeiture of the house and land on which it stood. Soon after, the king interfered in behalf of these persecuted Baptists, but it was more than a year before this little band were again permitted to meet in their own church for worship.

Early in the history of these New England colonies, the thirst for "Quaker blood" was intense. Cruel and inhuman measures were enacted to drive the innocent and unoffending "broadbrims" from the colonies, also to prevent others from landing.

Mr. Hinton givs us some mild statements describing the persecution of these much-detested Quakers. The first that landed on the soil of these Puritan Protestants were Mary Fisher and Anna Austin. They came from Barbadoes. Soon after nine others arrived from England. These eleven in number were speedily arraigned as "contemptuous persons," committed to prison, sentenced to banishment, and the captain of the vessel that landed them on New England soil was put under heavy bonds to carry these "contemptuous persons far beyond the confines of these New England colonies." The Quakers were kept in jail until the vessel was ready to sail. While in prison Mary Fisher and Anna Austin were accused of being witches by Lieutenant-Governor Bellingham, and he appointed a committee of women to search them. This committee called to its assistance a number of men. The accused were stripped stark naked in the presence of the men, and their persons submitted to indignities that modesty forbids to relate. The books of the accused were seized and burnt. At the next session of the general court it was enacted that the captain of any vessel bringing a known Quaker into the colony should pay a penalty of £100, also that the Quaker so landing should at once be sent to the house of correction, receive twenty lashes, and be kept at hard labor until transported out of the colony. A fine of £5 was imposed on any person who should distribute Quaker books, and severe penalties imposed on anyone who should defend the doctrins of the Quakers. Any person that harbored a Quaker in his house was subject to a fine of forty shillings. Any Quaker, after the first conviction as such, if a man, was to lose one ear, and after the second the other ear. If a woman, each time to be severely whipped. At the third conviction, whether man or woman, to hav their tongues bored through with a red hot iron, and all Quakers that should return to the colony after banishment should be put to death. Under this law William Robinson and Marmaduke Stephenson were hanged at Boston, Oct. 27, 1659. The following June Mary Dyer suffered death on the gallows, and soon after William Leddra was tried, condemned, and publicly executed on the same gallows. Wenlock Christeson was also condemned to be hanged June 13, 1661. While Wenlock Christeson was lying in jail to await execution, the king again interposed to stay the bloody hands of these Boston Calvinistic Christians, and Wenlock Christeson, together with twenty-seven others, were liberated from the Boston jail. This timely interference on the part of the king of England shortened the bloody record of these Boston bigots. The names of the twenty-seven released from the Boston jail are given by Joseph Besse, a reliable and accurate Quaker historian. These twenty-seven were hastily transported beyond the limits of the Massachusetts colony. The next year a letter from King Charles II. to Gov. John Endicot, and the other governors of the New England colonies, put a stop to the inhuman practice of banishment.

The horrors of the Salem witchcraft will be passed by for the present. Anyone not acquainted with the sickening details of this disgraceful page of our New England colonial history, will find it given in Combe on the "Constitution of Man." Here we hav an actual experiment made with church and state united. The lesson taught is a silent but very impressiv one. It proclaims to the world in the tones of Boanerges that no religious sect can be intrusted with the reins of government.

Such a step as the introduction of the wily, slimy, Blair Sunday bill into the national Congress should arouse all the lovers of liberty to vigorous and immediate action. The meaning of the petitions piled upon our senators' desks cannot be mistaken. The clergy, the lady laity, the gullible Sabbath-school teachers and pupils, are all banded together in one ignorant, bigoted phalanx to unite church and state, as in good old colonial days. There is as much ignorance among the masses now as then. The hatred of religious zealots for Atheists, Deists, Agnostics, Infidels, Freethinkers, Liberalists, and Spiritualists is as intense now as their hatred for Baptists, Quakers, and witches was in colonial times. Giv to the churches the reins of this government, and our jails and state prisons would soon be crammed with the most intelligent and exemplary men and women of our land. A gallows would adorn every churchyard. The rack and the thumb-screw would be common implements of torture. Every Liberal paper in the land would be summarily suppressed. Ministers of the "gospel of peace" would sit in our legislativ halls as they did in colonial days, and dictate legislation. Superstition and cruelty, silence and sorrow, poverty and ignorance, would usher in another long night of mental darkness, known in the dim future, as the historian writes, as Dark Age No. 2.

Fall River, Kan. P. VAN HYATT.

Faith and Knowledge, Fact and Fable.

This universe is a great, incomprehensible fact; there is no denying it. We must admit its infinity. No man can find its limitations or measure the force that moves through it, holds it together, and binds all parts into the whole,

> Whose body nature is
> And (possibly) God the soul.

It is not difficult to conceive abstractly that there can be nothing outside of nature or the universe. But no man can find or even form a conception of any outside. If there is any outside, what is there beyond the outside? If there is anything outside, then the outside becomes the inside. No beyond can be conceived of, for the reason that in any possible beyond there must be space, and space is a part of the universe. Therefore there can be no known or conceivable limitations.

In essence and phenomena the universe is infinit. No man comprehends what he can see, much less what he cannot see, or the spirit or force which moves through what he sees. The child knows about as much of the infinit mystery as the man, and the fool about as much as the philosopher. The infant in the cradle looking into space comprehends about as much as the astronomer looking through the Lick telescope. The questions of children are proverbially quite as profound as the questions of philosophers, and the answers of the latter hardly more satisfactory than the answers of the former.

Mankind, covering the earth's surface, are as flies crawling over a globe in a school-room, and comprehend but little more of the whence and the whither of the universe than flies comprehend of the globe and the meaning of the school-room.

There is, in fact, much less difference between the intelligence of flies and the wisest man, than between the wisest man and the wisdom that could construct the universe and run it. Men flippantly ascribe to such wisdom the attributes of infinit loving or cruelty, beneficence or malevolence, and undertake to define his, her, or its powers, purposes, and motivs, to tell what pleases or displeases him, her, or it, and call such opinions and definitions religion. To the highest human consciousness such definitions as we human flies invent concerning the infinit are arrogant and irreverent, and would be wicked and blasphemous if we were not as flies, and if there could be sincere, honest, ignorant wickedness and blasphemy. Suppose a philosophic fly should try to tell his fly comrades his honest notions of the school globe on which he crawls and of its maker and his purposes in its construction, as well as the, to him, wonderful phenomena of the school-room, however wide of the truth such lucubrations might be, they would not be wicked or displeasing to the pedagog in charge of the school, but would only interest and amuse him, coming from a fly. There would be no blasphemy in the poor fly's thoughts or words, and there could be no wickedness in them if he was an honest fly. It would be very silly for one fly to accuse another of blasphemy or try to make laws to punish him. The little papal human fly at Rome, for instance, crawling about the rooms and gardens of the Vatican, putting on airs of infallibility and trying to make his fellow-flies accept him as the agent on earth of infinit wisdom, is inexpressibly ridiculous. He and all who listen to him and believe such nonsense are very silly flies. So of all theological attempts to define creation or the creator, or to tell what his object was in creating the universe—what he intends to do with it or with any part of it; what pleases and what displeases him; what his attributes are, or even whether he really exists or ever made the universe at all or not.

The man who looks out upon this universe and is most overwhelmed by its infinity and his own inability and littleness is probably the most reverent toward his maker, if his maker exists, and really the wisest among the fly philosophers of mankind. He is overwhelmed and givs it up, being wholly unable to explain what he sees, and only able to crawl about within the narrow limits of his own mental world, and content to measurably solve, if he may, his own rule of life, without attempting to tell his fellow-flies all about a God of whom he comprehends nothing. If to be an Agnostic is honest, he is content to be an Agnostic. He may possibly be able to see and to say that if God exists he must be inside, and not outside, of the universe, and a part of it. That if he exists he is probably infinitly obedient to law; that the universe is in his hands, including the human race, and that it is infinitly safe in his hands to hold and to run; that St. Paul was mistaken when he tried to scare somebody by saying that it would be a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God; that everything is in his hands, if at all, not because it "fell" into his hands, but because it was always there resting safely and beneficently.

Certain it is, mankind know of no other power that could do better with such an infinit job, if they are wholly unable to comprehend it. It is nevertheless true that men suffer enough to challenge faith in the beneficence of the power called God, with their inability to comprehend what they experience and observe of the way all things work together for their good and their evil, so far as they can judge what is good and evil to themselvs.

If there is a God he no doubt expects in men just what he finds in them. Men are and do about as he knew they would be and must do. They know about as much of him and themselvs and the universe as he expected, if he is infinitly reasonable and knew exactly what he was doing when he put causation to work to bring about the human result. And it is further probable that God, if there be a God, did the very best he could in making man, if he did make him, and man does the best he can on the whole, made as he is or has been, however good or bad that is.

No doubt God gaged human capacity, intellectual, moral, spiritual, as well as animal, to suit himself. Man, so far as he can observe, has never been consulted as to his own make-up. He has no responsibility until he reaches the point of voluntary self-re-creation and improvement, if there is such a point. Such power and responsibility, reached by mental evolution, may be possible to the race or the best of the race, somewhere, some time in the infinit journey, if the journey be infinit in development. If man is only a germ in this world, to be perfected in never-ending life, he ought to be happy even in all the incidental suffering he encounters in this rudimental life.

Possibly pain and suffering, physical and mental, are processes by which spiritual ripening goes on, and that such processes of ripening are the best infinit wisdom could employ. These facts, if facts, would be more comfort to know, than all that theology as yet has been able to afford. At any rate, we must endure the suffering and pain as they come to us, whether they tend to rot or ripen us. We can not escape this real, practical life; we must meet it as it comes—better heroically than with cringing fear—with brave and cheerful hope, if we can, than cowardly endurance. We hav to get along with our own ignorance of ourselvs and the universe, with all its drawbacks. It is no help, but a hindrance, to believe what is not true. Credulity is a wretched substitute for wisdom. If we can build a consoling faith on what we know, let us do so, but not on what we do not know. If solid facts help us to console or be consoled or comforted, and to climb and be strong, let us be comforted, climb and be strong; otherwise let us sit on the old seat of disconsolation and keep up mental activity at the expense of hope, as long as we liv, and be honest. The cut-and-dried faiths of the creeds and schools of superstition do not help, but delude, bewilder, and cripple. Belief in a lie always damns. What men hav thought in the past is not authority to men who think now, nor what men think now, for men who will think in the future. This endless chain of authority which has fettered the race must be broken forever. Truth is the only authority. Faith suggested by facts is the only true faith. Faith and hope, which thinking about the universe impresses on the human mind, as fragrance comes from the flowers, are the only true faith and hope. The quality of such faith and hope is determined by the quality of the thinking—the attainments of men. The teaching of any faith that is not natural, is not in any true sense religious, but irreligious. There is no doubt that it would be better for the world if there was less faith and more facts, less theology and more ethics, less guess-work and more certainty, less pretension and more sincerity. Let us try and substitute facts for fables, no matter how few and poor the facts. There is more value in one little grain of fact than in all the Alps of fable of all the creeds. Let us look for all revelation in the facts of nature and science. Probably if we knew enough one little grain of sand would tell the story of creation. But we reverse this method and build from a little grain of knowledge a fabled universe, of heaven and sheol, purgatory, devil, angels, thrones, redeemers, celestial cities, etc., all as fantastic as fabulous, as profitless as untrue. Better a grain of fact than such a universe of fiction. Better try to find out how little we know than how much we can believe; for the chances are "the more we believe the less we shall know"—the greater our credulity the more worthless our faith. I hav faith that the seed of a plant will sprout and grow. This faith is founded on observation of nature. If observation of nature givs faith in the immortal and progressiv outcome of human life, blessed are they who hav such facts and such faith. But faith, resting on the alleged resurrection of a fabled, not even a historic character, is not worth much. Man can be sure in this world of only three facts, viz., himself, phenomena, and the impression which phenomena make upon his mind—the camera, the object, and the picture. The quality of the picture depends upon the quality of the camera; both of these are, it is to be hoped, improving, but phenomena remain the same. The picture in all ages will be the faith and philosophy of man—and these must be variable. There can be no such thing as salvation by one particular faith, or indeed by faith. For man makes and preserves faith, but faith does not make or preserve man. Phenomena will remain infinit. What man knows of phenomena will remain finite, because the finite can never grasp the infinit.

But uppermost and innermost in the consciousness of man springs the hope, if not the assurance, that his own being is infinit though his development is finite. This hope is the spring of aspiration, and the safeguard against despair. It lifts and bears man over the rough and painful journey of life, and keeps his courage up. It makes the sun shine and the flowers bloom, in spots, along his path, and lights up the dark threshold of the grave.

Is this hope delusiv? Possibly. But continued life "is no more wonderful" than the life we are living. Hope is as much a fact as love or thought. Why should hope be a liar any more than conscience, or any other faculty of the mind? Why should nature delight to deceive? Why should falsehood be planted in the human soul? I prefer to believe in no such necessity; that there is nothing that naturally lies in human nature or the universe. That there are better things in store for all men than they know or can comprehend, or even hope. That mankind will hav a chance to master, to some extent, the infinit lesson before the school of life closes.

The Church—Its Moral Status.

In previous articles I referred to the low and depraved condition of the devotees of the church in the first, second, and third centuries. Human beings are not capable of reaching a lower depth of depravity than that occupied by the early Christians. Ignorant, deluded, and with a constant and abiding faith in their own "innate vileness," there was no crime so hideous but they were ready to perpetrate it in the name of religion.

Dr. Cave in his celebrated work, "Primitiv Christianity," informs us that the "early Christians when assembled at their love feasts were wont to take a live infant, bray it in a mortar, anoint it with honey, and eat it as a hungry dog eats flesh;" and he also describes some of their libidinous orgies that would bring the blush of shame to the calloused and hardened cheeks of those old arch-reprobates, Lot and Solomon. A pretty set these early saints, surely; and yet they pretended to be sorely vexed over the naughty practices of the heathen. Like Lot, represented by a New Testament writer "vexing his righteous soul over the filthy conversation of the Sodomites." Modern clergymen rave in the pulpit about the altars of the heathen gods being stained with the blood of human sacrifice, and yet never condemn a celebrated judge in Israel for offering up his innocent daughter as a burnt offering to their grim-visaged Jehovah. The church grew worse instead of better so long as it held the dominant power. With its doctrins of "original sin," "total depravity," and salvation through the merit of another, improvement was simply impossible. In all the range of its doctrins it possessed not one single element of progress, or a single fact to support its claims.

Wesley, in describing the condition of the church in the fourth century (Wes. Ser., vol. 2, p. 63), states that, "Christians did not gradually sink, but rushed headlong, into vice," and adds, "Then one might truly say:

> "At once in that unhappy age broke in
> All wickedness, and every deadly sin.
> Truth, modesty, and love fled far away,
> And force, and thirst for gold, claimed universal sway."

After critically studying the character of the church, how any man or woman claiming even a moderate degree of common decency can stand up and unblushingly defend it, is to me a most perplexing mystery, and reveals the dark and damning influence of a God-defaming, man-degrading superstition on the human race.

But the end is not yet. The original fountain was vile and corrupt, and the stream grew more filthy and poisonous as it broadened and widened in its deadening and destructiv sweep down through the ages.

THE priesthood, in every age, in every country, forbid discussion, frown down all investigation; they require, like other tyrants, passiv obedience and non-resistance. They denounce every man who opposes their views—not merely their spiritual, but their temporal views. Their intent here, as elsewhere, is to fetter your minds first, and your bodies afterwards; and, finally, to command your pockets.—Dr. Thomas Cooper.

Rome Dominates the Dominion.

Canada is on the threshold of a crisis fraught with danger not only to English interests, to Protestant supremacy, to Freethought and progress, but also menacing our republic. It may be that, in the not distant future, the intensely loyal Tory Protestant will be pleading for annexation to the United States rather than remain under the medieval rule of Rome. In this matter we should see the warning to all Americans to take time by the forelock and keep the state and church forever separate.

The France of progress is on the banks of the Seine; the France of Bourbonism and bigotry lies uncomfortably close on the banks of the St. Lawrence.

The province of Quebec represents all that is illiterate and retrogressiv, owing to the overwhelming influence of the Ultramontanes, the chief organ of which, L'Etauard, floats at its head the white banner and golden lilies of the house of Bourbon.

The Quebec provincial Parliament has recently granted the Jesuits $400,000 as indemnity for lands taken generations ago. But what excites the antipathy of the Protestant portion of the entire Dominion is that this same bill has a clause which leaves the disposition of this money thus obtained to be distributed subject to conditions to be made by the pope. Protestant Ontario is alarmed, and their folly in religious matters is growing quite apparent. A movement is on foot to compel the Dominion Parliament to annul the above grant, but the province of Quebec has there a sufficient representation to score a victory, for on matters pertaining to the church there is no division among the representativs from this province, which has a guaranteed representation of sixty-five members regardless of the matter of population and not subject to change. So far back as 1759 a grant was made to the Romish church of Quebec of 2,117,000 acres, which, of course, has been immensely enhanced by diplomacy, shrewd bargaining, solicitation, and the natural increase of value.

This province has in round numbers a population of 1,300,000, over 1,000,000 of whom are nativ-born French Canadians, and there are not more than 250,000 English-speaking people, and their ranks are steadily decreasing. The French Canadians are bound together by strong ties of race, religion, language, and laws to which they cling with the tenacity of ignorance. They look upon the English in the light of intruders.

After Wolfe's victory at Quebec, the British government guaranteed them, by the treaty of Montreal, their laws, their language, and their religion.

As the first "emegrees" to Canada were from Normandy and Brittany, who were conspicuous for conservatism, ignorance, and religious devotion, it is safe to say that their descendants hav not lost their hereditary ear-marks. England acceded to the concessions made them rather reluctantly, but it was an exigency of the times, as England felt rather uncertain as to other provinces, and, after all, it served as a wise diplomatic move, for had it not been for this fact, instead of resisting the gallant Montgomery, they would hav opened the gates of the citadel and joined the revolution of the thirteen states.

The laws prevailing in that province are only slightly modified from those in vogue under Bourbon rule in France. Several of the old seignorial systems still exist—a system by which vast tracts of land are held by the "lord of the manor," or the church, and rented out to the peasants, or "habitants," as they are called. As these French Canadian provinces were early settled by religious orders who received vast trusts to aid them in propagating their faith, and in Christianizing the Indians, and when it is known that the church in Quebec is still supported by the tithe system now prevailing in England, but which has been abolished in most Catholic countries, a faint idea can be had of the wealth of the Romish church in Quebec. According to the tithe system, every Roman Catholic family must, by law, pay a fixed percentage on their crop to the church, but a Protestant, who occupies the land, is exempt. As the church is a banking and money lending Shylock in Quebec, when a farm comes into market it takes care that it is occupied by one who will put coin in its coffers. If a new parish is made by the bishop of the diocese and a new church erected, an ecclesiastical assessment is levied which takes precedence over all mortgages. In fact, the Jesuits, who are being driven out of old France, are flourishing and fostered in the new, for Quebec is more Catholic than Italy or Spain. Among the laboring and agricultural classes not more than seven per cent can read and scarcely any can write. But their fecundity is wonderful, and they increase with astounding rapidity, families of from twelve to twenty being quite common. The clergy encourage early marriages, sternly punish infanticide, and accommodate their people with foundling asylums and lying-in hospitals, so that they increase in greater ratio than their Protestant competitors.

The power of the papal hierarchy in Quebec can be conjectured from the following estimate of its wealth:

Annual tithes on 200,000 farms	$ 700 000
" taxes on families not owning land	300,000
For masses, baptisms, marriages, funerals, pew rents, and objects of piety	2 000 000
Legacies, solicited gifts, mortmain property, over.	3,000,000
Taxes imposed to construct and maintain churches	2,000 000
Grant from province (charity)	250,000
Total	$8,250 000

This is in itself a tolerable annual tax on 1,359,027 inhabitants, of whom 1,170,718 are Catholics, and 178,309 of other denominations, thus showing that no special inducement has been offered non-Catholics to settle in that section. In Quebec the Romish church owns:

800 churches of a value of	$37,000 000
500 parsonages, palaces, etc	900 000
12 seminaries	600 000
17 colleges	850 000
259 boarding schools and academies	600,000
80 convents	400 000
69 hospitals and asylums	5,000 000
Total	$54,350 000

It also owns the greater part of the numerous towns and villages, with lands, stores, houses, and invested capital in large quantities, and the bulk of all this wealth is exempt from taxation, while the government of Quebec recently went out of office declaring itself bankrupt and unable to liquidate its indebtedness. The bank of Montreal is the wealthiest monetary institution in Canada, but the order of St. Sulpicians alone can discount that great financial institution. But the visitor to Canada must not be surprised to hear le bas Canadiene pere, whose sons and daughters find employment in the States and send their earnings to enable him to pay his tithes, loudly declaiming against annexation.

The aggressiv attitude of Rome is illustrated by the fact that at the opening of the provincial parliament Cardinal Taschereau persisted in demanding a seat beside the vice-royal representativ, and in taking precedence as a prince of the church of Rome.

Furthermore, to crown the climax, a resolution was adopted by the provincial Parliament, requesting the queen of England to intercede for the restoration of the temporal power of the pope in Rome. Dare she do it?

As an indication of French Canadian exclusivness, Father Dowa, of Montreal, recently announced from the pulpit that, acting under orders from the vicar-general, he was directed to condemn the Catholic order of Foresters of Illinois (with headquarters in this city), and to prohibit his congregation from joining the order or encouraging those who desired to extend its branches into Canada. His objections were based on the fact that it was a foreign organization, and did not allow interference on the part of the clergy. He warned them against joining these interlopers, and requested those who had joined to sever their connection forthwith.

The Ultramontanes do not regard with favor the tri-color of republican France, but are unanimously in favor of a restoration of the old French monarchy, which was always a strong protector of the church. There is little doubt but much of the plottings and turbulence tending to wreck or weaken republican rule in France are hatched by the Jesuits in our neighboring city of Montreal; for it is one of their dreams that on this continent they will yet found a French monarchy which will be supported by a strong ecclesiastical power. Their orators and journals boldly declare this as their desire.

To the United States the French Canadians are the "Chinese of the East," for being hardy, sturdy, and frugal almost to penuriousness, they find no difficulty in getting employment, and they form already no inconsiderable portion of the population of Dakota, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. As Prof. Goldwin Smith once remarked: "If it were not for copious emigration to the United States, the people of Quebec would be in a chronic state of starvation." Their conservativ, non-assimilating tendencies are strongly marked in the characteristics of the cities they hav settled—Detroit, St. Louis, or New Orleans.

When this element mingle with that of the Catholic Irish—among them intermarriages are frequent—and combine, the United States will hav a problem on its hands more serious and important than the Mormon question. These minions of the papacy will use all their combined power as citizens to destroy freedom, and vote at the beck of the clergy to disrupt this republic, as they are attempting to do with the sister republic of France. The only salvation of the United States is in the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union.

When all these ecclesiastical aggressions—Romish and Protestant—are clearly, fully proved, we then meet with so-called Freethinkers who throw back their heads, and with eyes portraying the intelligence of a hog, offer as an explanation for not doing anything, supporting nothing, not even subscribing to a Liberal paper: "I'm a Freethinker who think for myself and let everybody else do their own thinking."

It is such silly, inane, asinin utterances of professed Infidels, all talk and no practice, which fill us with more contempt for this set who crawl under our tent than for any foolish capers of the sincere, earnest Salvation Army devotee.

LAID OUT AT LANSING.

The measure proposed by our friend Representativ Wettlaufer, in the Michigan legislature, which was partially a Secular measure and partially a "single tax" scheme, which, however, would hav taxed all and of the ecclesiastical corporations and churches, was defeated in the lower house by a vote of 68 to 10 last Wednesday. That was not so bad a showing for a "compromise" bill, and I really think that a straight-out bill for the taxation of church property, pure and simple, would hav fared as well, if not better. Mr. Wettlaufer made a lengthy and able defense of his bill, but it had the misfortune of being very voluminous as to detail.

E. A STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Who Can Comprehend the Infinit?

The outgrowth of ideas is caused by expansion of perceptiv power. Both new and modified symbols are necessary to a progressiv mental state. Outside of mathematics there are few ideas of absolute import, that is, which will not admit of that variation produced by intellectual advancement, and intellectual advancement must be accompanied by a corresponding modification and creation of language, otherwise freedom of thought would be hampered by endeavoring to represent a growing idea by an inflexible sign. Anyone may readily see in the analysis of compound words how simple ideas, in their development, acquire complex signs, and complex signs, by further advancement, again become simple in expression, that is, by constant use no longer call to mind heir components. To advance with the world it is necessary to use the symbols of the age in which we liv, otherwise confusion of thought would arise in the attempt to express by an ancient or undeveloped sign a complex modern idea.

This is observable in speculativ thought by the endeavor to express the modern idea of the infinit by the old-time symbol—personal God. Is it strange that those who contemplate the infinit in this way travel the slowest on the path of progress, that they are intellectually stunted? Great ideas, to be properly expressed, require signs of relativ import, the lack of which impedes their conveyance, and ultimately causes their obliteration. Thus, if a man persists in symbolizing the infinit as being personal, a finite attribute, will not the expansion of his conceptiv faculties be retarded or perverted?

How can a mind fully expand and impart its knowledge to others except by the creation of new signs to represent the discovery of new relations? Among the ancients, when abstract reasoning was less intense than now, when all conceptions were necessarily gross or imperfect, with a tendency to personify the phenomena of nature, the conception of the infinit on other than personal grounds must hav been very difficult. The idea was then weak, so to speak, unable to stand alone or be transmitted from one to another without the powerful support of the attribute—personified intelligence. Yet, to-day, there are thousands who still require the use of this miserable crutch to convey to consciousness a working idea of infinity. To avoid this error it is only required that ideas purely objectiv be preserved from subjectiv influence. To illustrate: The only expressible idea of personality implies limitation. If God be infinit, how can it be proved that he is personal? Here are two ideas in absolute mutual antagonism—the one finite, the other infinit. Yet in their reconciliation only lies the possibility of the establishment of the personality of God.

The objectiv in this case is influenced subjectivly in conformity to a law of ideal growth, which requires the mind to clothe in the easiest possible forms its primitiv conceptions. It is but a few steps in advance of the savage who personifies and propitiates his wooden image, that the Theist performs the same operation in regard to the infinit. The former marks the preponderance of the objectiv, or the realistic, over the abstract; the latter the next to the last step in the emancipation of true ideal thought.

What barbarisms! "Moses went to Mt. Sinai to confer with God." "God came down." The infinit walked in the garden of Eden. The infinit described as a thing moving from place to place. What objectiv absurdities! What gross misconceptions!

What mind can speculativly advance when fettered thus with such incomparable grossièretés? But these hav had their day. Already the night of gloom is clearing fast, and fancy's fears are dying, one by one.

What a contrast! The Liberal student seeking in the laws of nature the secrets of material progress to reduce to a minimum the necessity for physical labor by ever-increasing labor-saving appliances; to uproot disease and impure mental conditions by reforming institutional abuses; to return again to all that with which injustice and cruelty has endowed the few; to make life longer, and purer, and nobler. These are his aspirations.

The Christian student buried in theological lore, striving for truth among rusty myths, ever seeking to reinvigorate the old, to make again presentable fallacies a thousand times exploded. Who spends his youth in studying backward, and from false standpoints judges men and things; and struggling for freedom amidst fetters that bind him down, finds nought but that which others found a million times before; to reason in a circle; to liv on other's counsel; to abnegate self even to servility; to attain greatness of the parrot-like variety; to turn men from the service of science to that of the church; to choke reason and to extol faith. These are his realizations—the Lord only knows what his aspirations were.

Which strives for the advancement of the world? To whom will we owe our future civilization? Which is the best fitted to survive? They mark progressiv steps—the savage with his simple fetich, which is but his own reflection—the Roman who deifies passion, principle, and element—the Christian with all the former gods reduced to three—the Deist, who denounces all yet cannot free himself from one; and finally the Atheist, who sees nothing in the infinit save that of man's reflection, nothing but shadows, in which struggled the early mind.

> The Atheist fears no thing that hides in temple walls,
> Nor God divine that rules but is not seen,
> Nor ghost, nor death, that brings but sleep,
> With quietness.

There is a current idea much used by an Atheistical writer of prominence which contains a palpable fallacy, and, as it has unthinking supporters it is worthy of refutation. It is: "The finite can comprehend the infinit." The definition of "to comprehend" he gives as "to take in mentally," that is, to receiv into the mind impressionably the image of an object—as, I comprehend that church by taking it in mentally.

This definition we all accept as perfect, and with it we show up the fallacy. There is some difference between knowing that a thing is and comprehending the thing itself. We know that a thing has size. Can we comprehend the thing perfectly without knowing what size?

The multiplication table is illimitable in process—that is a condition of it. We comprehend that perfectly, but the table itself?

If thought be the recognition of relations between objects and condition, then it is dependent in degree on the definitness of their signs or images—their reflections. How represent an illimitable distance, an object of infinit size? A church or any object involves limitation. Could that church be "taken in" as a whole if it had no end? If not, would the image of it be perfect—that is, represent the whole of it? Then would not the comprehension of that infinit church (or the universe) be defectiv?

If we could comprehend the infinit we would hav a logical instead of a relativ demonstration of the non-existence of the deity. And, vice versa, if God exists faith would be unnecessary, as he would then be demonstrable. When this state arrives THE TRUTH SEEKER will change its policy or go out of business. This, then, we hav: Comprehension implies the knowledge of a whole, or a part, in limited things. The infinit, being illimitable, cannot be conceived as a whole, which precludes complete comprehension.

Orange, Mass. H. W. HAMMOND.

Pericles's Religion.

Not to the royal Athenian, but to him who wears his mantle in a recent TRUTH SEEKER, I address my sympathy with his "esoteric" sentiments, but am critical toward his language. I may do this the more fully because, although imperfectly cognizant of his aims, I hav reason to think that his ideal is not found in the past. It is to the past that religion bounds back, practically as well as etymologically, re, back, ligo, I bind.

There are two pasts; the past is a palimpsest; the past endeared to "Pericles" is that of art. It was Greek, sometimes, perhaps, Egyptian, Aryan, not Semitic, unless with the Moorish scion of Ishmael's progeny. But religion as understood by those whom "Pericles" addresses is essentially Semitic. When Solomon patronized art it was Phœnician. Christian artists had to seek their inspiration at pagan founts. Besides art, there is honor. Noblesse oblige. Ligo is of the party here again, and the back binding refers to the sources of privilege remembered by the better types of old nobility, forgotten by the modern plutocrat. Catholicism has nothing that claims "Pericles's" homage but what it has borrowed of paganism. Protestantism, in so far as it is not negation of papal authority, is infected with a Puritan virus still more hostil to those artist traditions which "Pericles" loves. What is the sentiment of "worship" to which "Pericles" clings? Though a Comtist, I doubt whether his piety prays every morning to the saint in order on the Humanitary calendar. Every artist worships with the tools of his art, as I pray to the sun with my spade. But my Methodist neighbors do not call me religious or a worshiper. Admiration is the sentiment avowed by "Pericles" as the sentiment of worship. What can he find to admire in the objects or aims of our worshiping religionists? Admiration and worship belong to love, those of churches are shoddy. No metaphysical abstraction is admirable. But the cosmos? Well, the part is certainly bound back to the whole, but the whole is full of holes, through which the holy water of religion escapes—holes of crime and misery, at the bottom of which humanity grovels. As for other worlds, distance may lend enchantment to their view through telescopes, but I am yet to learn what is known of them beyond the mathematics of their orbitation. This may be an admirable affair, but somehow I cannot harness mathematics and religion in the same team, and it seems that Dr. Draper was not any more successful with chemistry. Hence the "Conflict of Science and Religion," a book whose judicious point of view is well fitted to cure "Pericles's" infatuation with his neighbor, the church's, wife.

THUCYDIDES.

Is Christianity Moral?

A religion which did not teach us how to liv on earth would hav small claims upon our respect when it claimed to teach us how to prepare for heaven.—Lyman Abbott in the Century, August, 1888.

This is precisely what the Christian religion does not do—it does not "teach us how to liv on earth." Then what becomes of his logic? Does it not logically follow that it has "small claims" upon our respect?

This is one reason why thousands of us hav logically dropped the Christian religion—and every other sort. Millions still cling to these religions. But, by their own confession, they are illogical. Who that loves truth as he does his life does not rejoice that his thinking places him on the side of logic with the minority rather than on the weak-sided, one-sided, wrong-sided majority with all the glittering pageants marshaled by grave doctors of divinity?

To whom else shall the people look for instruction in the moral principles of a true social order if not to the ministry? —Lyman Abbott.

To themselvs, my dear doctor. We Americans govern ourselvs. "The ministry" hav no better opportunity to learn and practice moral principles than we hav. "Instruction in the moral principles of a true social order" is not to be found coming from the ministry. The clergy do not hav this kind of principles in stock—never had.

Shall they look to the politicians?—Lyman Abbott.

As nearly all the politicians hav been pious this year, what is the difference?

Forgiv the glaring solecism, but how weak is a strong Christian!

Mr. Abbott, in his article published in so influential a magazine as the Century, further exhibits, unconsciously, the weakness of Christian teaching.

The people cannot learn the moral laws of the social order from the politicians; the politicians must learn them from the people.—Abbott.

And the people, he had just said, knew nothing about them!

Would it not be a more direct method to shut up the preachers and politicians by themselvs and let them fight it out on that line? If the warfare should terminate fatally—for both sides—we would try hard to bear up under the affliction.

Shall we, then, look to the editors for moral instruction in sociology? The editors ought to be public teachers, but, with few exceptions, they hav abdicated.—Abbott.

That is a better showing than the politicians made, for they all abdicated. We know who the "few exceptions" are among the editors—Eugene, George, Samuel, Horace, Luther, Moses, Edwin, Benjamin, et al, Freethinkers every one.

Lyman Abbott, however, as we might expect, concludes that the Christian clergy are the true instructors in moral principles. That is the way such a story, written by one of the cloth, ends. But are they moral instructors? Can they be, as long as they adhere to the Bible and teach Christianity? One of the preachers in New York city, in a sermon, said: "Morality is no better than wickedness, and will save a soul no more than blasphemy can." Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage remarked: "All our good works and morality on earth will not take us into the gate of heaven."

And these are the men, are they, to teach us morality?

I will answer calls to lecture in Colorado, Nebraska, Iowa, and further East; will attend grove meetings throughout the summer, and meet the clergy in debate wherever arrangements can be made. Address, W. F. JAMIESON.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG has now lectured in five hundred different cities and towns, as follows: Kansas, 83; Illinois, 61; Ohio, 57; Iowa, 50; Texas, 40; New York, 32; Missouri, 31; Nebraska, 30; Pennsylvania, 26; Indiana, 25; Michigan, 20; Wisconsin, 12; Minnesota, 10; Ontario, 5; Connecticut, 4; New Jersey, 3; Massachusetts, 2; Rhode Island, 2; Kentucky, 1; Tennessee, 1; Maryland, 1; Dakota, 1; Quebec, 1. In the performance of this work he has had to travel one hundred and ten thousand miles.

What the Sabbatarians are Doing.

It is reported that Ann Arbor has suppressed the sale of Sunday newspapers in its borders.

The Sunday League of Sioux City, Ia., is preparing to resist the desecration of Sunday by baseball games on that day.

Connecticut authorities prevented Barnum from starting his menagerie from the depot in that state until the close of the Sabbath.

The authorities of Baltimore forbade any Sunday parade on St. Patrick's day, and also prevented Forepaugh's circus from entering the city on that day.

The committee on criminal jurisprudence in the Missouri legislature March 12th reported favorably a bill introduced by Mr. Moore, of Laclede, prohibiting the playing of baseball on Sunday.

The first act of Secretary of War Proctor has been to abolish Sunday occupation in the army by dropping the evening dress parade and transferring the Sunday morning weekly inspection to Saturday.

The police commission of Chattanooga, Tenn., has resolved to break up the selling of liquor on Sunday. A year ago the saloonkeepers all signed a pledge to observe the Sunday laws without special police supervision, and while this pledge was observed for a time, the compact is now openly broken.

The Cincinnati District Committee of the American Sabbath Union organized during the field secretary's recent visit to that city by electing the Rev. J. W. Simpson, president of the Evangelical Alliance, chairman of the committee; the Rev. John Pierson, vice-chairman, and the Rev. Dr. Ritchie, district secretary.

A bill is now before the Massachusetts legislature to abolish Sunday towing, and a large majority of Boston's towboat engineers are in favor of its passage. They dislike the unnecessary labor they are forced to perform on Sunday, and hav organized for the purpose of securing legislation to forbid it, though all would giv their services when life or property were endangered.

A committee consisting of Judge Bennett, the Rev. Dr. Hopkins, and J. K. Mullen, representing the mass meeting recently held at the Opera House, addressed the board of aldermen, Denver, Col., March 4th, advocating the passage of an ordinance to close the saloons on Sunday. A resolution introduced by Mr. McGilvray, that the city attorney draw an ordinance providing for the closing of saloons on Sunday, was defeated in the board by a vote of 7 to 2.

The ministers of Cleveland, O., unite in asking the mayor of that city to enforce the law of Ohio, which reads as follows: "Whoever, on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, participate in or exhibit to the public with or without charge for admittance, in any building, room, ground, garden, or other place in this state, any theatrical or dramatic performance of any kind or description, or any equestrian or circus performance of jugglers, acrobats, rope-dancing, sparring exhibitions, variety shows, negro minstrelsy, living statuary, ballooning, or any baseball playing, or any ten-pins, or other games of similar kind or kinds, or participates in keeping any low or disorderly house of resort, . . . he or she shall, on complaint made within twenty days thereafter, be fined in any sum not exceeding $100, or be confined in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both, at the discretion of the court."

Our Pious Administration.

From San Francisco Freethought.

We are entering upon four years of national piety. The president and his secretary of state hav secured pews in a Presbyterian church at Washington; orders hav gone forth that no business is to be transacted at the White House on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; Postmaster-general Wanamaker will visit Philadelphia once a week to take charge of the Sunday-school; and Mr. Proctor, secretary of the war department, it is reported, has abolished the Sunday dress parade of the boys in blue.

It will be a most edifying spectacle for the people of this country to behold their representativs bowing themselvs down before the contemporary fetich, and participating in the incantations of Presbyterian superstition-mongers. We shall all take pride in knowing that our state buildings are locked every seventh day by the Roman hypocrit and cutthroat who made Sunday the Sabbath fifteen hundred years ago. Likewise shall we be glad to know that the same barbarian assumes command of our army on that day. The people of Washington who hav enjoyed listening to the band on Sunday will gladly forego that pleasure when they come to realize that the musicians' souls are taken out of jeopardy by the new order. The Washington Post hints that the arrangement is directly in the interest of the liquor traffic, because when the soldiers are off duty they will imbibe more than when they hav to drill or mount guard.

But Postmaster-general Wanamaker's position will be the most critical. Every Sunday he will be found at church endeavoring to teach morality from a book which, under a fair construction of the postal laws, would be condemned as unmailable by the department of which he is the head.

Fortunately we are able to say that these men do not represent the sentiment of the American people. There are a lot of devout old women who admire piety, but the average citizen does not, to use his own expression, care a "damn" for it. Society—the snobs, the dudes, and the dead-beats—go to church, and the ignorant and the imitativ follow their example. Public men, in our day as in all other days, simply conform to the popular error.

"In the Beginning"—An Orthodox View.

Six thousand years ago God lived alone. He had always lived that way. There had never been anybody for him to liv with. If there had been, he would hav lived with them as he livs with us now. He is everywhere, is inside everybody, and everybody is inside him. At that time which was before time, he filled all space before there was any space. Now that there is space, he fills it entirely, and there is space enough left for all creation besides.

This God is one. He is also three. There are the father of him, the son of him, and the Holy Ghost of him. He is three distinct persons, and each one of him is the same as the other two. The father begot the son, who is the same age as himself. The mother had not been born then. She came into existence about four thousand years after the creation of time. Her son was begot in the beginning of the first part of the undivided eternity, which was before time, and had no beginning. God created time, but we do not know yet how much he made. He inserted it between the two divisions of eternity which remained undivided and were without beginning or end.

The Holy Ghost proceeded from the father and the son. He also had no beginning. As they each filled all space when there was no space, he proceeded into the space outside the space that never had been. He was the same as those he proceeded from. Some heretics hav dared to deny that he proceeded from the son. They contend that he proceeded from the father only, who is the same as the son, and not from the son, who is the same as the father. Orthodox Christianity informs us that such damnable errors will be burnt away in the eternal fire of hell which never consumes.

God was eternally, infinitly happy by himself. He is love. Love had nothing to love but love, but love loved love with a perfectly infinit love, and love was perfectly, infinitly lovely. If I were love, and could love love and be loved by love in that loving way, I would be satisfied to love love and be loved by love forever. But "God's ways are not as our ways." His wisdom is infinit, and ours but finite. Being infinitly happy when there was nothing, he made things that his infinit happiness might become infinitly happier.

God made a considerable number of things. He made a world out of nothing. After he had made it, it was "without form and void." That is, it had no shape, and it was empty. It was partly land and partly water. These were not separate from each other. God's works are all perfect from the beginning. He made many improvements on their original perfection. He divided the land from the water, and gave the earth a shape. He rolled it out flat like a pancake. Then he made light and darkness. Later on he created a sun to giv light to see the light by, and a moon to rule the darkness. He put a roof over the earth, and hung a number of little lamps from it. This roof he called the firmament. It divided the waters that are under it from the waters that are over it. He put some windows in it. He sometimes opens these windows and lets the waters that are above fall through.

God looked at his work and told himself that it was very good. Then he thought that he would like to hav others admire it. He wanted to be praised. He made some things that they might praise him. First he made some fish. I suppose they did not praise him, for the psalmist afterward exhorted them to do so. I do not think they paid much attention to the psalmist, for I never heard of a fish praising the Lord. I would not myself if I were a fish—more especially if I were a little fish, and encountered a big fish who had not yet dined.

God next made some birds, and afterward beasts of all sorts and sizes. These were all original inventions of his own. He had no models to work by. The material he employed was nothing. Then he said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." He made him out of dust. It has been suggested that the supply of nothing was exhausted. But God is omnipotent, and could hav made more nothing if he had wanted it. He need only hav said, "Let there be nothing," and nothing would hav sprung out of nothing in unlimited quantities. For his own good purposes, whatever they were, he made man out of dust. Dust is a dry material to make a being who is three-fourths moisture of. Herein we see the infinit wisdom of God. He foreknew all things. He knew that the man would find something to moisten himself with. The man did find it. The man has continued to find it, Prohibition laws and temperance agitation notwithstanding, "even unto this day."

"God made man in his own image." "God is a pure spirit without body, parts, or passions." He made man with a body, a considerable number of parts, and more passions than he has ever been able to carry with any comfort to himself. He looked at the likeness he had made of himself, and said that it was very good. The man, however, was not entirely satisfied. All the other creatures had been made in pairs, male and female in separate persons. But in him the male and female were united in one body. "God made man in his own image, male and female created he them." He was obliged to carry the female half of himself with him at all times, and he found it troublesome. Then God performed the first surgical operation. He put the man to sleep that it might not hurt him. He took out a rib and closed the flesh up again without leaving a scar. When Adam awoke he was short of a rib, but he owned a woman. He was happy for a whole week after that. That is the tradition handed down to us from the early Christian fathers. The Bible does not say how long it was. The early Christian fathers were unmarried men.

God had placed the man and woman in a garden. It was a large garden. There were four rivers in it. All kinds of trees, bushes, fruits, and flowers grew there. The tree of knowledge of good and evil and the tree of life were in the midst. God commanded the man and woman not to eat of the tree of knowledge. See the infinity of his wisdom. Had they not eaten of that tree none of us would hav known the difference between good and evil. Some of us make mistakes even now. But God did the best that infinit wisdom could do. He did not write this knowledge on a scroll and giv it to the man to read; he did not put it in the mouth of an oracle and bid his creatures seek it out and inquire; he did not utter it himself, and order them to listen and take heed. Had he done any of these things we might hav known nothing about the matter, "even unto this day." He inclosed it within the fruit of a tree and commanded the man and woman not to touch it. Then he left them and awaited results.

The woman took a walk in the garden. She met the serpent. The serpent began to talk to the woman. The man was not there. The woman liked to talk to the serpent. She had been talking to one man all the week of her life, and wanted a change. He was a very handsome serpent. God had made him, and he does all things well. He had bright, sparkling eyes, an elegant shape, and could slide on his belly with the most captivating grace. He told Eve that if she ate of that fruit, she would not die, as God had said she would, but could become like God himself, knowing good and evil. The serpent had probably dined on that fruit himself, for he knew good from evil very well. He was not a selfish serpent, but full of the milk of serpent kindness. He wanted to share the knowledge he had acquired with the woman. She was willing. She took some of the fruit and ate it. Then she knew it was good, and gave some to the man, who also ate. The virtue of that fruit has been inherited by all their descendants. That is why there are so many various opinions concerning what is good and what is evil, and men and women wrangle and fight over them, "even unto this day."

When our first parents had eaten of that fruit, they became aware that it was an evil thing to hav no clothes. Eden was in a southern latitude, and the winter season had not commenced. Their first attempt to remedy this deficiency was an exceedingly simple one, yet it was not accomplished without some difficulty. They sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselvs aprons. Their trouble was the absence of needles and thread. God has not told us in his book what substitutes they found for these useful implements.

When God returned and found how well all his plans had succeeded, he was very angry at his success. He cursed everybody and everything that had had anything to do with it. He likewise cursed everything that had had nothing to do with it. He cursed the earth, the elements, the animals, and the birds. He had threatened that Adam should die the same day he ate of that fruit, and Adam died a little less than a thousand years after. That is why God is said to be all truth. The serpent had said the knowledge of good and evil would be the result. It was. That is why he is called the "father of lies," and "that old dragon who was a liar from the beginning."

The first curse was pronounced upon the serpent. He was to go upon his belly and eat dust all the days of his life. He was accustomed to going on his belly. In fact, he had never practiced any other manner of going. Dust had proved good enough to make a man, and was, no doubt, well adapted to build up the constitution of a serpent. He was not, however, limited to dust. He had to swallow some every day. Others who are not serpents do the same. A little game is sometimes added to his bill of fare. Occasionally another serpent finds its way down his elastic throat. There was to be enmity between him and the woman. That is so, "even unto this day," but as they carefully avoid each other's society, breaches of the peace are not frequent between them. Her seed was to bruise his head, and he was to retaliate by a bruise on the heel. This bruising match, like those of some more modern bruisers, is yet within the doubtful future. The serpent was the author of all the mischief. He therefore escaped with a lighter punishment than the others.

As the woman, at the time she took the forbidden fruit, did not know good from evil and therefore was not aware that it was an evil thing to do, the curse upon her ignorantly dispelling her ignorance was a severe one. "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception." She had acted so badly that the Lord resolved to make many millions more of her to act the same way. She has carried out this end of her creation better than most of his works. "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." Her desire has been to her husband, or some other woman's husband, and he has ruled over her, except when she has ruled over him, and so it is, "even unto this day."

The man was to "eat bread by the sweat of his face." He has eaten bread by the sweat of his face, or roast turkey by the sweat of some other man's face, "even unto this day."

Besides the tree of knowledge, the tree of life grew in that garden. God was afraid that the man would eat of that also, and so escape the threatened punishment of death entirely. So "the Lord God said: Behold the man is become one of us, to know good and evil. And now, lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life and eat and liv forever; Therefore the Lord God sent him forth out of the garden of Eden to till the ground from whence he was taken. So he drove out the man, and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden cherubim and a flaming sword, which turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life."

Fear.

Fear of God.—In the village where the writer attended school in his childhood was a little Irish tailor named Kennedy. He had an enormous nose, a jolly twinkle in his eye, and a special fondness for children, who were wont to spend much of their idle time in his cosy shop, listening to his pleasant oddities, spoken in his quaint Hibernian brogue. He had many stories to tell his eager listeners, and among them one in particular about a mysterious goblin called "Old Bellison," who, he alleged, lived overhead in the loft of his shop, and who, at his bidding, could and would do many queer and fearful things, especially to bad little boys. The little fellows, with staring eyes and hair almost on end, believed as firmly in the reality of the tailor's bugbear as they did in their own existence; and so firm, too, was their faith that, had anyone of their number ventured to express a doubt on the subject, he would hav been set down at once by his horrified companions as a reckless Infidel, whom "Old Bellison" would be sure to visit with some direful punishment. Through this fear they had of "Old Bellison," the tailor, who was not a little amused at their childish credulity, found a ready means of exercising over them a controling influence that brought him, by way of propitiation, many a present of flowers and nice, red apples. And thus it goes the world over; every priest being nothing else than another Kennedy, making a similar use of his "Old Bellison" overhead to stultify, rule, and despoil grown-up children, and all through their silly, superstitious fears.

Of all human infirmities, fear seems to be the most available for the wily purposes of priestcraft; on this feeling it practices its arts with the greatest assiduity and success. Every calamity befalling either an individual or a community, the priests, with unblushing effrontery, are always ready to ascribe to the displeasure of some offended deity—a plague, a famin, a tornado, or an earthquake being, according to them, a righteous judgment, decreed by him as a punishment for unpardonable wickedness. In solemn, sepulchral tones they habitually dwell upon the "awful majesty of God," whose wrath on occasion waxes hot to consume his enemies, and before whose altars all the children of men are expected to stand bowed in the attitude of trembling slaves.

Above all things they insist on reverence, on fear—crouching, cringing fear—until their abject dupes quake and shiver whenever they chance to hear an audacious unbeliever criticise their religion or talk what they in their fanaticism are pleased to pronounce horrible blasphemy. It is fear of God that makes the bigot; and the bigot, when he has the power, never fails to make the bloody persecutor. It is because the honest believer has his feelings disordered and his mind warped and unbalanced by this palsying fear that he is hostil to argument and incapable of reasoning in regard to the absurd dogmas he cherishes. The priests themselvs are ambitious of being feared, as is plainly evident from the prefix which they never omit to place ostentatiously before their names—that of "reverend," a word derived from Latin and signifying to be feared.

Fear of hell.—An implicit belief in the doctrin of endless torment not unfrequently has one very bad effect, that of increasing crime. After going a certain length in the commission of offenses, the true believer comes to look upon himself as past redemption, and in a spirit of despair and defiance grows more and more reckless in his wicked career, resolved that if damned he must be, he will snatch from his impending doom all the selfish indulgence that his opportunities afford. If hanging is to be the penalty for stealing a lamb, why not, while one is stealing and while he has a chance, take the entire flock? Thus reasons many a believer who, in sheer despair, commits offenses of which otherwise he might hav remained altogether guiltless. May not the fear of future punishment, which holds in check the timid only, but increases the excesses of the bold, be one of the main factors helping to make Christendom what it undoubtedly is, the world's hotbed of crime and general rascality? The whole end and aim of life is happiness; but this, in the case of many a poor, cowering creature, the fear of hell blights and utterly destroys. Out of a million imagin a single instance, that of a lovely woman, who, it may be, is as pure and as innocent as an unborn babe. Observe her face. It wears a deep shade of melancholy; the music of her heart is silent, and a gloomy shadow chills and overawes her troubled soul. And would you know the disturbing cause? She is a victim to the terrors of religion. She has been listening to the doleful rant of a wily priest, who, for purposes purely selfish, has been practicing upon her fears and harrowing her nerves, by holding up to view the horrors of an imaginary hell. All day she thinks of nothing else—all night she dreams of nothing else—until in great anguish of soul she wonders why she was ever born into a life beset with so much anxiety and so many perils. She sees the blue sky above and the bright sunlight all around; she hears the birds warbling in every flowering shrub, and the babbling brook flowing in musical ripples on its way to the mighty sea; and more—she sees giddy people, with no thought of their souls, looking on all these vain, transitory things with seeming enjoyment, with even bright smiles beaming on their faces—yea, forsooth, with smiles—and they, poor creatures, heedless of the hell that moment yawning at their feet! Even though her heavenly father should vouchsafe to spare her from that awful place, will his bowels of compassion be moved, will his tender mercy be exercised, toward others, toward those whom she loves far better than she loves herself? To her, what were the joys of heaven when not shared by the objects of her affection on earth? what were even a harp and a crown when, perchance, her own dear mother must lie struggling and agonizing forever in the raging heat of hell?

Overwhelmed by doctrins so monstrous, no wonder that gentle, tender hearts are crushed with sorrow, and that minds naturally sound giv way and drift as hopeless wrecks into madhouses. And yet, for all the stupefying fear with which he has filled the souls of his victims, and for all the manifold miseries growing out of this fear, what cares the cruel, selfish priest?

The end for which he plans and preaches is increased membership, he knowing full well that success here means increased expectation of promotion and also of additional dollars in his pockets. To attain this end the terrors of hell serve him a valuable purpose, so valuable, indeed, that he could not afford to dispense with their use. Lay these aside, and the love of God alone would prove a dismal failure; the church would soon dwindle away, and the arrogant calling of the priesthood, including high honors, high living, and the love of the dear sisters, would soon become a dream of the past. To protect himself and his brethren against such a possible disaster, he clings with stubborn determination to his precious hell as a rich mine which he diligently and adroitly works for all it is worth.

The fear of man.—In addition to the fear of God and the fear of hell, there is still another species of fear, equally widespread and equally hurtful—the fear of our fellow-men as persecutors. It is this that demoralizes every community and fills it with hypocrits. There are thousands with too much strong common sense to believe the palpable absurdities of Christian creeds but who nevertheless allow themselvs to pass for believers, and sometimes even zealous believers, in order to avoid injury to their business, to themselvs, and to their families. To be made a subject for prayer by self-righteous fanatics, and an object of abuse by malignant fanatics; to be shunned, hated, and ostracized by the pious in general, and all this, too, for merely an honest difference of opinion, is an ordeal through which only a few hav the moral courage to pass. In a situation so trying, it is commonly thought to be much easier and altogether more profitable to sacrifice all manhood and independence, go with the stupid, intolerant multitude, and seek refuge in the practice of hypocrisy. Thus we see that the fear of Christian persecution in some form breeds dissemblers by the thousand, and sows the land broadcast with the prolific seeds of dishonesty.

In the palmy days of slavery, where was there in all the South a single editor that dared to print one line in opposition to the "divine" institution? Where was there a single individual that dared in public to raise his voice in favor of its abolition? The heavy pecuniary interests involved imposed a slavish silence upon the minds of the whole mass of people, and engendered in them a spirit of intolerance equaled only by that which religion this day, by reason of similar interests, exercises over the minds and feelings of millions of bigots throughout Christendom. Dr. Franklin once remarked that "he who spits against the wind only spits in his own face." It is for this reason that timid people, instead of boldly facing a stupendous fraud, prefer to keep silent, and crucifying conscience and their common sense, play the unmanly part of slave and hypocrit.

Gods are naught but horrid phantoms,
Unknown to fishes, birds, and beasts,
Yet planned and preached to frighten men,
And make them willing slaves to priests.

Hav the People Any Rights Which the Clergymen are Bound to Respect?

The Lynn Society of Independent Spiritualists has been so far sensible as to employ that stalwart Secularist and irrepressible iconoclast, Mr. L. K. Washburn, to lecture both afternoon and evening, March 17th. Herewith are a few extracts from the afternoon effort, which I noted down for THE TRUTH SEEKER, trusting that they will not explode to the danger of the Editor.

Clergymen are like other men—with a few honorable exceptions.

Clergymen are governed by the same motivs as influence other men in the choice of a profession; that is, they seek what they think they are best adapted to do and can make pay the best.

The day is done when we can be made to believe that ministers are specially favored with a divine call to proclaim inspired truth. We know and they know, and they know that we know, they learn to preach just as lawyers learn to plead. The gospel ministry is a business, the same as legal attorneyship.

We respect clergymen not because they hav been ordained to preach, but because they behave themselvs—with many glaring exceptions.

A divinity school does not change human nature; it sometimes serves to eliminate common sense. The more you hav of the gospel minister the less there is generally of the man. When the professor of a divinity school performs an operation on a theological student he administers a mental anesthetic, so that the student may stupidly undergo transformation.

The average minister is best able to discourse upon what he knows nothing about. In his training he has been guarded against acquiring too many troublesome facts.

There are a few, a very few, great ministers who can go outside of their pent-up creed and speak on subjects beneficial to mankind. These ministers are larger than their pulpits, larger than their creed, larger than their church. There is not a large pulpit in the land. Most ministers are made to fit the pulpit, the pulpit is never conformed to the minister.

It is conceded by the church, and repeatedly proclaimed by the press, that the pulpit has lost its power. The clergy do not receive the homage that used to be given as a matter of course. This is because they do not evince the honor and ability which call for esteem.

There is an effort being made to reinstate the clergy on their lost popular pinnacle. The clergy is expected to regain its power by taking away the rights of the people. The restoration of the ministers, if made, would be of short duration—but a momentary escape from Elba for banishment to St. Helena.

What the pulpit has to giv is not worth taking; what the pulpit has to sell is not worth buying.

The church loves the world when the world can be imposed upon. When people were ignorant they could be coaxed or threatened into submission. When the people hav learned something they become independent and strike out for themselvs. The clergy become lowered as the people are elevated.

The church has made the assumption that unbelief is sin; a crime, it declares it to be, to ask for proof of its own authority, which must be punished in this world, if possible, and hereafter, anyway.

The assumption of authority is the foundation of all the bloody persecutions of the past, and even now it calls the clergy, uninvited, to our doors to denounce us for reading or hearing or saying whatever makes against their claims.

Liberty of conscience is the victory won by the Protestantism of the sixteenth century. Shall we in the progressiv nineteenth century surrender that inheritance which cost our ancestors so dear?

We hav no further use for the pulpit. To-day it is useless for the pulpit to say to us it has a message for mankind. The pulpit knows nothing that mankind do not know.

Christianity is dead, its burial is not far off.

The pulpit inveighs against the Sunday paper.

The people hav a right to go where they like and read what they please on Sunday, and if the clergy cannot interest them the pulpit will hav to pocket the loss.

It will not make Christianity true to stop the mail on Sunday. It will not establish the inspiration of the Bible to stop the press on Sunday.

We are not going back to the times of barbarism when it was wicked to dance around a Maypole, to rejoice about the heretic tortured at the stake.

The sacredness of the priesthood is played out.

The horny hand that holds the spade and digs is more sacred than the pious palm lifted in prayer.

There is nothing sacred but the useful.

The pastoral office is an impertinence; I wonder that it is tolerated.

The custom that givs friends and acquaintances the liberty to visit each other in their homes is beautiful. We would not debar clergymen from the benefits of social friendship; but they must come as friends, not as dictators.

The world has grown too large to be chucked under the chin and rewarded with a plum for promptly reciting catechetical nonsense. The minister who insists on his pastoral privilege of inquisitivness and unsolicited advice, has not the instincts and training of a gentleman.

The minister is like the negro guide—when he gets to the last crossing, where there is no finger-post, the way to take is the very thing he wants to know himself; he does not know it any better than we do.

Once the clergy led and formed public opinion; that was when the people did not read much, and nearly everything published was on some religious topic. The public opinion was mostly religious opinion.

When clergymen ruled liberty was ruined. But the people broke through the fence. Then liberty was a small word, but the tree has grown under the fostering care of the press. To types and the press the world owes most of its civilization.

The press has freed the people from the domination of the pulpit. The average mind to-day is indifferent to the utterances of the pulpit.

The power of the priest cannot exist with the rights of man.

The press leaves man free to judge, the pulpit fetters the understanding.

Let the pulpit place itself on the same plane as the platform and we will listen to it.

We insist on the right of investigation.

The press defended the right of free speech in the antislavery agitation when the clergy mobbed and haltered such men as the liberty-loving Garrison.

Well may Africa discredit Christianity, which robbed her of her children.

America, under the clergy, was a Mecca from which the dark-skinned pilgrim returned not.

The South was saved by the bullet; it might hav been saved by the ballot had the pulpit been true.

The Sunday paper is killing the Sunday pulpit. The pulpit speaks one day in seven, the press speaks seven days in the week.

Christian ministers are not up with the times; they ought to read the Sunday papers.

What the pulpit calls gospel salvation is really only spiritual old junk.

I can get more good, more instruction and satisfaction, out of a copy of the Sunday Herald than I could derive from all the sermons preached in the pulpits of Lynn this afternoon.

One of man's rights is to read the Sunday paper; another is to make it.

The cause of the clergy's attack on the Sunday paper is jealousy.

The theater interests the people, the church does not.

The people can get along without the clergy; the clergy cannot get on without the people.

The evening lecture on "Romanism" was a masterly presentation, solid as a rock, and every sentence a stinger. The Investigator has already published it. Without being sensational and alarming, like Mr. Fulton's array, it is suggestiv in warning of what we hav to expect if we do not resist the menace of Rome.

Brother W. A. Simpson, of Stockton, Tenn., wrote me on the reading of my abstract of the sermon on "The Church that is Wanted," asking that I "do so some more." I trust that the above will redeem my promis to when I found some more so to do.

Turkish Freethinkers.

A. S. Francis, in the North American Review.

The progress of Freethought is not altogether confined to the lands of the north Caucasian nations. In the cities of Japan the name of a Buddhist zealot has become a byword, as odious as "Jesuit" in its latter-day significance, and the private creed of educated Turks is generally a vague Theism, strongly tinged with Agnosticism. In the bookstores of Constantinople, skepticism in its most pronounced types forms the staple of conversation. The padisha himself (like Mohammed II. and the Caliph Al Motadi) is well known to be a Rationalist; and a correspondent of the Pesther Lloyd describes a soirée at the residence of a Syrian pacha who entertained his guests with anecdotes à la Mary Montagu, quizzing the ulemas and the superstitions of the orthodox peasantry. Meshdân—literally an epileptic, a person gaining influence by pretended fits of religious ecstasy—is a sort of Freemasonry term which an investigator found to apply to no less a personage than the Prophet himself, and which metropolitan Moslems often use with a chuckling irreverence that would delight the soul of Colonel Ingersoll. "If Mufti Meshdân had revealed the secret of breech-loading six-shooters, instead of his ordinance of six daily prayers," remarked the impious Syrian, "we could still smoke our pipes on the ramparts of Buda, and probably on the Alcazar of Toledo."

The following anonymous communication is a good specimen of the way uninformed folks jump at conclusions:

"I am astonished to see published in THE TRUTH SEEKER an advertisment entitled, 'The Limitations of Toleration,' by Colonel Ingersoll, Hon. F. R. Coudert, and General Stewart L. Woodford, price ten cents.

"Only a little over one year ago five men were by law cruelly and inhumanly murdered in the city of Chicago for merely having expressed their opinions; and as far as I am aware, the great firm of Ingersoll & Co. never uttered even a word of protest. Yet this firm poses as champions of Liberalism.

"Skies! oh, where are your cleansing waters?
World! oh, where do your wonders end?
"A CRANK.

"San Francisco, Cal., March 15, 1889."

Some humorist has pithily said that it is better not to know so many things than to know so many things that are not so.

In this country the voice of Liberalism has never been raised in favor of any injustice, but has been heard against all acts of tyranny and wrong, from slavery to the taking off of the men lamented by "A Crank." In the latter instance, which our crank makes a test case, the great mass of the Infidels protested and spoke and wrote against the unjust verdict. THE TRUTH SEEKER was among the very first and last denouncers of the trial. We lost subscribers and friends by demanding for the victims a fair trial, which we conceived they did not get. It is very gratifying now to know that the public is beginning to see that we were right. Only two or three weeks ago the Chicago correspondent of the New York Sun confessed that a reversion of feeling toward the condemned men is taking place, and that most folks now considered their execution to hav been a "mistake." The principal police officers who worked up the testimony against them hav been accused of receiving stolen goods and of manufacturing testimony, and the mayor considered the charges sufficiently serious to warrant their removal from office.

The position taken by Colonel Ingersoll in the matter can best be stated in his own words, in an interview with him by the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. "I was anxious, in the first place," he said, "that the Anarchists hav a fair and impartial trial. The worst form of Anarchy is when a judge violates his conscience and bows to a popular demand. A court should care nothing for public opinion. An honest judge decides the law, not as it ought to be, but as it is, and the state of the public mind throws no light upon the question of what the law then is.

"I thought that some of the rulings on the trial of the Anarchists were contrary to law. I think so still. I hav read the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, and while the conclusion reached by that tribunal is the law of that case, I was not satisfied with the reasons given, and do not regard the opinion as good law. There is no place for an Anarchist in the United States. There is no excuse for any resort to force; and it is impossible to use language too harsh or too bitter in denouncing the spirit of Anarchy in this country. But, no matter how bad a man is, he has the right to be fairly tried; and if he cannot be fairly tried, then there is anarchy on the bench. So I was opposed to the execution of those men. I thought it would hav been far better to commute the punishment to imprisonment, and I said so; and I not only said so, but I wrote a letter to Governor Oglesby, in which I urged the commutation of the death sentence. In my judgment, a great mistake was made. I am on the side of mercy, and if I ever make mistakes, I hope they will all be made on that side. I hav not the slightest sympathy with the feeling for revenge. Neither hav I ever admitted, and I never shall, that every citizen has not the right to giv his opinion on all that may be done by any servant of the people, by any judge, or by any court, by any officer—however small or however great. Each man in the United States is a sovereign, and a king can freely speak his mind.

"Words were put in my mouth that I never uttered with regard to the Anarchists. I never said that they were saints, or that they would be martyrs. What I said was, that they would be regarded as saints and martyrs by many people if they were executed, and that has happened which I said would happen. I am, so far as I know, on the side of the right. I wish, above all things, for the preservation of human liberty. This government is the best, and we should not lose confidence in liberty. Property is of very little value in comparison with freedom. A civilization that rests on slavery is utterly worthless. I do not believe in sacrificing all there is of value in the human heart, or in the human brain, for the preservation of what is called property, or rather, on account of the fear that what is called "property" may perish. Property is in no danger while man is free. It is the freedom of man that givs value to property. It is the happiness of the human race that creates what we call value. If we preserve liberty, the spirit of progress, the conditions of development, property will take care of itself."

"A Crank" can now see just how much value there is to his complaint. If the possession of these facts shall make him more careful in future about formulating charges against people, the space we hav used in presenting them will not be lost.

And this reminds us of a story: After the Dorsey trial at Washington had resulted in the acquittal of the accused some good man wrote to Colonel Ingersoll lamenting that a leader of Liberalism, a moral teacher, one upon whom the breath of suspicion could not leave a cloud, should hav been instrumental in securing the acquittal of a man whom the whole country knew to be guilty. By defending Mr. Dorsey this man thought that Colonel Ingersoll had lowered the tone of Freethought, and he was thereby greatly grieved.

The story goes that Colonel Ingersoll answered him in this wise: You're just the man we want—the fellow we've been looking for for months. The United States government with all its power and money could not find evidence against Mr. Dorsey and no one else could. Now you say he is guilty, and of course you must hav the evidence to prove it. Come right on to Washington—bring the evidence with you. Your expenses will all be paid, and you will get compensation for your time. All you hav got to do is to bring the evidence here.

The good man on receiving this request sat down and wrote to Colonel Ingersoll. All he said was this:

"I am a damn fool."

Absolution and Ignorance.

It would be well to hav a short and handy formula for the naming of those elements in Christianity that cause the great immorality of believers in that faith. We will omit as of minor importance the influence of the example of a God of wrath with his hell of revenge, the influence of the specimens of God's favorits held up to us as patterns in the Old Testament, and the influence of the substitution of a social standard of theological orthodoxy for one of natural morality. Absolution, and ignorance—these remain as the two heads under which may be grouped nearly all of the remaining immoral influences of the Christian faith.

Absolution, supernatural absolution for the asking—a moderate time spent in reflection on how this must work in the human disposition will render it obvious that had the devil himself come to earth to devise some method of making people immoral and keeping them so, all his ingenuity could hav devised no more efficient machinery for the purpose than this. The influences that keep men from wrong-doing are two, outward and inward. The outward influences consist of the appliances of the law and its agents to inflict material punishment on the offender by deprivation of property or bodily confinement. The inward influences consist in a set of painful effects upon the feelings of the offender produced by the disapprobation of his fellows and of himself upon any wrongful act. Of these two sets of influences the former, though the ones that strike the eye and perhaps seem the principal ones, are comparativly insignificant. By far the greater part of moral restraint flows from the latter, the inward influences. These latter, these painful influences upon the feelings caused by the disapproval of self and others, being so important, clearly we should avoid everything that can lessen them, that can in any way weaken their action upon the mind or avert their following immediately upon every misdeed. We should do everything in our power to strengthen and render invariable their action, and avoid most sedulously everything that can in the slightest degree tend to remit that action. Suppose, then, that we get up some great being outside of nature and bring him forward as the source of all these moral feelings—all judgment, praise, blame, approval, love. Suppose we get men thoroughly convinced of the existence of this being, so incomputably superior to all mere human creatures in love, and in power to bless and reward, that the trifling glimmerings of judgment and love in his creatures are in comparison unworthy of regard and even of naming. Suppose we then tell men that this being is always overflowing with love for them and longing to grasp them and soothe them in his bosom, whether they hav done right or wrong, requiring only the simple preliminary of their saying that they believe some incomprehensible stuff and dropping some coins in the purses of ourselvs, that being's agents. What would be the probable action of such a belief upon the emotional processes of a wrong-doer—upon one of us creatures who, we all know, are only too prone to shrink from rigidly just examination and judgment, and flee to the sympathetic, unblaming bosom of partial friendship and love? Would this be likely to add to or detract from the action upon the mind of that sense of disapproval of which we spoke, and which otherwise would hav prompted to the cessation of the misdeeds? What would be the effect of such a device on right conduct? This is the Christian system, both Catholic and Protestant.

Ignorance—it is known that the Christian religion plunged the peoples of the whole civilized world into the blackest ignorance and kept them in it for fifteen hundred years. How does ignorance affect morality? In so many ways that the one or two we can here point out are but a few among multitudes. For one way, knowledge is our only means of securing any end. Morality is an end continually aimed at by all laws, all societies, all human regulations. Just according to our knowledge can we intelligently achieve any other desired end; just according to our knowledge can we achieve this end. The laws that govern conduct, the conditions under which right conduct is produced, are just beginning to be known. To science nothing is impossible; and this applies to mental as well as to physical science. Moral conduct is a product of certain determinate factors, just as any other product. When people knew nothing of chemistry, they could not put together certain chemical substances and obtain certain results; now that they know something of it they put together certain substances and a certain result follows. When people know nothing of social science, they cannot put together certain social factors and obtain certain desired results; as they begin to learn something of it they can more and more put together certain factors and desired results will follow. The mental and moral world are controled by laws as fixed and inevitable as those that control the physical world; the only difference is that in the former the phenomena are more obscure and complex and we are consequently longer in finding out their laws. Christianity has done her best to keep us from ever finding them out. For another way in which knowledge produces morality: In proportion as we attain knowledge of the inward life—the mental processes, the hopes, fears, desires, pains, joys—of others, in that proportion does our own being merge with theirs; do they become identified with us, their desires with our desires, their pleasures with our pleasures, their disappointments with our disappointments, their pains with our pains, and do we, consequently, feel their pain as our own pain, and avoid inflicting it upon them. The faculty by which we vividly conceive of the emotional states of others—let it be called the imagination or whatever one will—can work only upon the material supplied it by knowledge. An extensiv knowledge of other persons and other classes than our own, an ability to conceive of and thus to enter into their wants, their feelings, their temptations, and their ways—this is one of the greatest factors of moral feeling—this is dependent upon general knowledge, mental activity and development—and of this Christianity has ever been the deadly foe. Knowledge is the source of every possible good.

Absolution and ignorance—this is the convenient formula for the expression of those influences of Christianity which hav made notorious for immorality those periods in which that religion has most prevailed, and which confer the same notoriety upon those peoples by whom it is most believed now.

Turning the Barrel Over.

A few years ago the Rev. Mr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, astonished the public by preaching sermons defending the Bible account of creation. In those sermons he had vegetation growing under the light of the aurora borealis and volcanoes in activ operation on other planets; God making matter out of his own omnipotence; the deluge reduced to a "local option" flood, and made other equally absurd and unscriptural statements in order to support his Bible. He made quite a noise at the time and raised a hearty laugh all over the country. His stump pulpit speeches were directed toward Infidelity, and supposed by himself to be an answer to Colonel Ingersoll's "Some Mistakes of Moses." In a series of "Interviews on Talmage" Colonel Ingersoll replied, and since then comparativly little has been heard from Mr. Talmage.

This obscurity evidently does not suit the Tabernacle entertainer. He pines for newspaper comment and notoriety. He wants to be talked about. To bring himself again into prominence he has fished one of these old sermons up from the bottom of the barrel, revamped it, and given it to the syndicate who furnish country papers with patent insides, and also delivered it from the Tabernacle pulpit. In its new form it is as amusing as in the old. "In the beginning," he says, is not a limitation; "there you can roll in ten million years if you want to." The idea he seeks to convey by this is that God may hav been many eons of time preparing the universe, until he got it almost ready to liv in—the roof on, the plumbing in, the plastering done, as it were—and then he finished it up in a week—"curtained and chandeliered and cushioned and upholstered for a bride and groom." His exuberant imagination then givs us "God's days" throughout the week in which it was completed, which days are as a thousand years. We are now living therefore in the Sabbath day, the seventh thousand of our ordinary years. This is a pretty conceit, and it has been given before, but it has one drawback in that it disarranges the scriptures. God made animals and man in the sixth day, and if Mr. Talmage's latest imagination is correct, man can only hav been on earth between one and two thousand years. As a matter of cold fact he has been here for a great many thousands of years. This would seem to militate against the theory of "God's day"—but then, we don't suppose Mr. Talmage offered his explanation seriously.

The Bible represented that light was created on Monday, the sun on Thursday—"God's days." Mr. Talmage got over this by repeating his old deliverance about the aurora borealis and volcanoes on other planets, and adding rocks in crystallization, heat, and electricity. The flood, he still thinks, was a "local option" spell of wet weather. The one poor window in the ark he makes a "window course," a whole range of lights. "Ignorant Infidels," he says, "do not know a window pane from twenty windows." The ark story, in his opinion, is perfectly reasonable. The statement that Joshua stopped the sun and moon in their courses is as easy of belief as the other. "By unusual refraction of the sun's rays the day might hav been prolonged." This is a good phrase, and Mr. Talmage should carefully preserve it. This is the second time he has used it and he may need it again. The Jonah incident is the last biblical narrativ vouched for by Mr. Talmage. It looks reasonable in Brooklyn, as Colonel Ingersoll said to Stewart Woodford. Jonah, says Mr. Talmage, could hav lived inside the whale for three days, "if he had kept in motion so as to keep the gastric juices from taking hold of him and destroying him." Of course! It would be a little tiresome for Jonah to dodge the gastric juice for three days, and the ventilation might hav been a little poor, but what is believing the story compared with enduring the heat of hell for an eternity!

In fishing up the sermon from the barrel and preaching it again Mr. Talmage has achieved his purpose. The papers are making fun of him, and this he considers better than being ignored. He will now pass down in the country's records not only as the most versatil and amusing scriptural commentator, but as one of the few preachers who had the nervous caliber to deliberately turn his barrel over before the congregation had had time to forget the bottom sermons. If anyone wants to see this dusty speech treated in just the manner it deserves, let him get Ingersoll's "Interviews on Talmage."

The Difference.

The New York World is very indignant that the Bloomingdale Asylum is allowed to dodge the tax assessor, and it puts the matter in a very clear and forcible way. Listen:

"The Bloomingdale Asylum is a private, money-making institution. It is in no sense a charity, although it seeks, by taking an occasional free patient, to found a claim to be so considered. There is nothing to prevent the enormous property from being sold out to-morrow, if such a thing were practicable, and the proceeds divided among the so-called trustees.

"The Asylum has not only obtained the exemption of its building and grounds proper from taxation, but has also managed to get about $4 000,000 worth of land exempted which has no more connection with the institution than the New York post-office has. This is proved by the fact that ninety-eight of the lots in the vicinity of the Asylum are now offered for sale. None of these hav paid taxes since they hav been in possession of the Asylum people.

"While the taxpayers hav for years been compelled to pay this wholesale incorporated tax dodger's share of the public burdens, the property owners in the vicinity hav been seriously damaged and sometimes impoverished and ruined by the obstinate blockade maintained by the Asylum against street openings and improvements. It is time this monstrous imposition should cease. Instead of any further exemptions, the taxes ought to be restored on the whole of the Bloomingdale property, and the law ought to compel the opening of streets through the so-called Asylum grounds. There is no reason whatever why the honest taxpayers of the city should be mulcted for the benefit of this entirely private and speculativ incorporation."

Do you hear the anger verging on wrath in those tones of indignation at the outrage upon New York's taxpayers? Every word of it is truer than gospel, and the injustice is monstrous. But hav you heard the World say anything about the "Female Academy of the Sacred Heart," a neighbor to the Bloomingdale Asylum? The cases are precisely parallel. The Academy is a money-making institution. It is in no sense a charity. It owns a million dollars' worth of land, and buildings costing hundreds of thousands of dollars besides. There is nothing to prevent the enormous property from being sold out to-morrow, and the proceeds being divided among the managers.

The Academy has not only obtained the exemption of its buildings and grounds proper from taxation, but it has also managed to get about $1,000 000 worth of land exempted which has no more connection with the institution than the New York post-office has. This is proved by the fact that forty-seven lots in the vicinity of the Academy hav just been sold for $160 000. None of these hav paid taxes since they hav been in the possession of the Academy people. While the taxpayers hav for years been compelled to pay this wholesale incorporated tax-dodger's share of the public burdens, the property owners in the vicinity hav been seriously damaged and sometimes impoverished and ruined by the obstinate blockade maintained by the Academy against street openings and improvements. It is time this monstrous imposition should cease. Instead of any further exemptions, the taxes ought to be restored on the whole of the Academy property, and the law ought to compel the opening of streets through the so-called Academy grounds. There is no reason whatever why the honest taxpayers of the city should be mulcted for the benefit of this entirely private and religious incorporation.

Hav you heard the World say anything like this about the Academy? It is as absolutely true of the Academy as of the Asylum. But the World doesn't say it, and will not as long as the Roman Catholic church can swap votes for cash and tax exemptions. The Asylum managers havn't got a hundred thousand votes of ignorant religionists behind them.

Christianity in Georgia.

The Rev. George B. Starr, superintendent of the Central Bible School for Home and Foreign Missions, at Chicago, has received from Alpharetta, Ga., the following letter written by Elder M. Huffman of the Seventh Day Advent sect:

"Brother D. Conklin, of Michigan, who, with his family, has lately moved into this neighborhood, has been reported to the grand jury, and a bill found against him for working on Sunday, and all he did was to cut a few sticks of wood to build a fire. They hav in this state a 'chain gang,' where those who violate the law are taken, and with a ball and chain fastened to one leg, they are made to work on the public roads and railroads. Many of them are treated worse than brutes, many hav been whipped to death, and doubtless if he should be taken there for working on Sunday he would be compelled to work on the Sabbath. Should we be beaten in the circuit court would you take the case to the supreme court, and if so can you help us? We are all poor here."

This seems to be a good case for the Adventists of Battle Creek, Mich., and Oakland, Cal., to fight. They possess the wealth and hav many brainy men in their movement. Their paper, the American Sentinel, could easily obtain subscriptions sufficient to carry on the war and make things particularly uncomfortable for their fellow-Christians in Alpharetta, Georgia.

Against the Blair Sunday bill the Adventists hav done glorious work. Let them fight in the concrete as well as in the abstract and Brother Conklin will never wear a ball and chain in the convict gang.

What a barbarous, uncivilized, tyrannical, and infamous set the evangelical Christians of Alpharetta are! And they are the kind of folks who are trying to control this government and to put a ball and chain on the limbs of everyone who dares to think and act for himself. If of such is the kingdom of heaven, what is the kingdom of the other place?

Editorial Notes.

THE present law allows only thirty-four chaplains for the army. A bill introduced in the last Congress increased this useless force to one hundred. The bill died with the Congress, but it will come up next fall, and possibly be smuggled through. The church is making desperate efforts to prolong her official life, and to get the state under her control. Surreptitious measures like this chaplain bill—introduced quietly, referred in silence, and to be passed without argument—are her reliance now. Luckily the politicians were too busy with their own schemes to spare the time to make this bill a law.

READERS of THE TRUTH SEEKER residing in Nebraska are requested to correspond with Tripp & Miner, of Hay Springs, that state, regarding a "Nebraska Lecture Association." Messrs. Tripp & Miner are real estate agents there, and report that there are many Liberals in the place and more desired. "We are," they write, "going to organize and hav our own social gatherings and make the church respect us. We hav the morals, money, and sincerity, and we intend showing fight every time they assail us. We shall stand by our supporters socially and financially." We venture to predict that if this program is carried out in honest and generous good faith Hay Springs will not be very fertil ground for the church.

THE French Roman Catholic journal published in Worcester, Mass., where the fight between the nativ population and the foreigners has raged hotly for months, comes out plain in its advice to its readers. Hear it: "The French people must make a bold and united stand in favor of the parochial schools. In view of the criticism of the various school committees that the nuns' schools are not as good as the public schools, the French people must support the parish schools more generously than ever before, in order that the priests in charge can employ more nuns and thus keep the schools up to the legal standard. Politically, at the spring elections, in all the towns where there are French Catholic voters, they are advised that they must make close alliance with the Irish Catholic voters, with a view to take between the two races the entire charge of as many town governments as possible. And this should be done without regard to party politics, because religion is of more account than party affiliations. Democracy and Republicanism are of small account compared with the religious faith of the Irish and French." These are the honest sentiments of all Roman Catholics, and it needs no comment to impress upon the minds of all Americans the fact that when Rome succeeds, those places in which she succeeds will be no places for men who hav formed the habit of doing their thinking and expressing their thoughts.

Letters from Friends.

LEADVILLE, COL., March 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Charles Watts, the celebrated lecturer and brilliant orator, is now giving a series of five lectures here. He is meeting with great success, and also giving the Liberals a great many new ideas on which to work and think. Leadville is a city of fifteen thousand inhabitants and is ten thousand two hundred feet above sea level. The principal industry is mining. I wish you great success in your work. Yours truly, H. S. KENT,
Sec. Leadville Freethought Association.

OMAHA, NEB., March 9, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to know if you or any of your readers remember a poem, which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER about six years ago, before I became a subscriber, and of which the following memorized lines formed a part:

Thou great unbounded infinit, thou great unbounded whole;
Thy body is the universe, thy spirit is its soul.
. . . . . .
If thou doth fill the universe, if thou art all in all,
Then I am God, think as you will, or there is no God at all.

These lines are all I recollect of the verses, which at that time appeared to me to pretty well define Materialism, and I should like to see them in print once more. C. H.

UNION PARK, ORE., March 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for over a year and I like it very much, and I do not know how to get along without it. I am a Spiritualist in belief if not in action. Now, I think the Spiritualists are as much opposed to church and state as the Liberals, and we want to keep together on that point—I mean church and state—and I think we need all the help we can get.

There is a little settlement here called the Park, a beautiful little place, and the Spiritualists hav the majority, and preachers are scarce around here. We hav debates here, but there are not Christians enough to balance us on a religious question. Please send me your catalog of books.

Yours truly, WALTER M. LOUTH.

ADRIAN, MICH., March 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It is a sad sight, even only realized in a simple cartoon, the goddess of liberty in the midst of the ruins of a republic. The picture, I fear, is prophetic. What could cause a more profound and sad sensation than to see this country in ruins, brought about by means depicted on the opposit side of THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 2d—to see the dilapidated structure of liberty shattered by unscrupulous superstition, orthodoxy, religious fanaticism in the Constitution devised by our forefather sages, who guarded against the incorporation of a fanatical dogma in its construction? The picture is a sad one, and I fear sooner or later will be realized. We of the present generation will not see it. I desire to be numbered with the unknown before the calamity. If popery and its concomitants can bring the ruin, be assured they will do it. All this ruin for an unknown God. Over his glory and the disruption of this fair fabric, America, humanity mourns. Virtue must cease to rejoice.

O. S. BARRETT.

ESOONDIDO, CAL., Feb. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The most logical contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER is Watson Heston. Its inclination toward Spiritualism and female suffrage are enough to make a conservativ Infidel giv it the "frozen elbow." Of course many good grains of wheat are to be found among its editorial chaff; but the same may be said of a thousand other papers which do not claim to be abnormally "Liberal."

I could get you a few subscribers here without much trouble, but I do not propose to encourage either Spiritualism or female suffrage, which means "God in the Constitution."

I hav been sick for the last two weeks, and perhaps will be called upon to "pass in my checks" before I find time to pay the few small debts I owe. My life has been a long, dreary storm of adversity, and the little good or harm I hav done in the world will be hard to identify in a thousand years from now. If I liv, I will send you what I owe you within three months; otherwise—what I should much regret—you may never get it. You can consult your own interest about continuing to send me the paper. Some of its features I very much admire. HIRAM WENTWORTH.

SOUTH CHELMSFORD, MASS., March 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I attended a prayer meeting at this place, where they talk to space and vacancy. The meeting was conducted by a revivalist by the name of Fuller, from Lowell, Mass., who said he got his orders from God every morning. He delivered an oration at the opening of the meeting on the sin of unbelief—he said it was the greatest sin. He said there always were and always would be Infidels. The greatest Infidel, Robert G. Ingersoll, had a great deal to say about the mistakes of Moses, and had written a book on the subject. But that Ingersoll was kicking a dead lion. If Mose was alive he could tell about the mistakes of Ingersoll. That when Ingersoll was in the army and got into battle, and the bullets began to whistle around him, he ran over to the enemy, and a sixteen-year-old boy discovered him in a farmer's pig-sty. "These are facts," was the way Mr. Fuller wound up his tirade against the greatest Infidel.

I think the Christians conceal the truth and abound in lies, and hav taken pattern after the apostle Paul (2 Cor. xii, 16).

They hav made several converts, all half-grown children, all girls, unless the little boy that got anxious that evening has got there since. JOHN M. BLAISDELL.

COBOCONK, March 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly allow me a very small space in your valuable paper to express my thoughts, and ask for information, on the following subject, namely: I was walking down the street on Sunday morning, March 11, 1889, when one of my neighbors arrested my attention and asked me if I knew of any remedy for poisoning, at the same time leading me into an outhouse, where a magnificent specimen of the Newfoundland dog was suffering the most excruciating pains and spasms, having evidently taken poison laid out by some sneak, who, out of jealousy toward his neighbor, thought fit to poison his dog. And there this poor dumb animal lay, with his big intelligent eyes dilated with suffering at times, and then, when the spasms would pass, he would look up to us, seemingly imploring us to help him, and finally, after four hours of such suffering, he died, exhausted.

Now, these were my thoughts while looking over the scene: Was it a sin in the man who committed the mean, miserable act, namely, of deliberately poisoning that poor, yet noble, docil, and faithful creature who never harmed the hair of the smallest child, and whose species hav performed more acts of noble heroism than hav those whom these poor animals look up to and recognize as masters? Now, tell me, will the blood of Christ atone for that brutal act? Will that man, who caused all that pain and suffering, go on his way rejoicing, feeling that the blood of Christ atones for all sins? And if this is sufficient atonement, then would it not hav been better for these dumb creatures had Christ never been born? And must we come to the conclusion that the originator of all nature, in all his wisdom, hath made no provision for the protection of his faithful dumb animals? J. H. HARVEY.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., March 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the following courteous epistle from B. R. Tucker, and as I know he will not print my answer, I want to see if you will:

BOX 3.366, BOSTON, March 3, 1889.

C. L. JAMES, Dear Sir: Do you expect anyone to believe that miserable pretense of yours that that mathematical error was intentional on your part? Bah! You simply made an idiotic blunder, and are ashamed to own it.

Yours b'untly, B. R. TUCKER.

Let's reason the matter, Comrade Tucker. Henry George, whom I select as the typical Malthus-demolisher, because he has brought together all the refutations without being at all particular about their consistency, founds his principal argument upon this assertion, that ten men can produce ten times as much as one man in the same space, while Malthus ignorantly imagined that production advanced only in an arithmetical ratio to a geometrical ratio of numbers. It is true Mr. George goes further, and says ten men can produce more than ten times as much on poor land—e. g., on the top of Mount Blanc (?)—as one man on good land. But Zeno and Tucker are not so hardy. They are content to assert as a self-evident proposition that if one man can produce x on an acre, ten can produce $10x$. Therefore, if a hen and a half lay an egg and a half in a day and a half, one hen lays one egg a day, and six hens will lay forty-two eggs in seven days. Are not the two arguments exactly parallel? Or, to cite McArthur's dog before a locomotiv, of which I was thinking more than of Tucker, the series 10, 1, .1, .01, 001, etc., may continue to infinity. Therefore, 10, plus 1, plus .1, plus .01, plus .001, etc., equals infinity. Behold my familiar rule! Equal factors in the same problem may be multiplied by the same quantity without changing their relations! And now, when I hav been at pains to learn a new system of arithmetic, to be told by one of the inventors that it is an idiotic blunder, "dot was rough!" But anything suits an anti-Malthusian better than to admit that the freedom of woman must precede that of man. Yours smoothly, C. L JAMES.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., March 6, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The discussion between Robert G. Ingersoll, Coudert, and Woodford, truth and honor vs. bigotry and slavery of mind, was one-sided. The colonel had it all his own way, and nobly passed over the low, jealous thrusts of his opponents. The world says that truth shall triumph. Creation is truth and nature declares the fact. Man is the only creation that is trying to smother all that is good and noble to gratify his selfish ends.

Mr. Coudert is evidently jealous of the thought that Colonel Ingersoll's name should be placed upon the same pedestal with such grand names as Voltaire, Hugo, and Rousseau. He, a Catholic, dares to eulogize Voltaire, to the detriment of his own doctrin and church. "He built up," but forgets that he was also a destroyer. Rousseau was a noble madman, and Hugo will liv in the minds of the people when the history of the church will be a tradition.

Mr. Coudert charges Ingersoll with having done nothing to build up. The colonel was too modest to notice the charge. He has done much to build up Freethought, and the right to express it has been his watchword. He who makes those around him happier and the world better is building up. He is destroying the church and upon the ruins building up the love of family and humanity. He destroys the disease of superstition, and has been instrumental in extinguishing the fires of hell. He has helped in the cause of education, taught people to learn and think for themselvs.

Mr. Coudert says: "Unfortunately freedom of thought exists." He would to-day crush our civilization back to the priest-ridden ages of the dark centuries when it was death to say, "The earth moves."

Robert G. Ingersoll's name will be a bright star in the galaxy of noble American minds when that of Hon. Frederick R. Coudert will be forgotten. There is a niche in the hearts of the American people in which Bob's name will be enshrined to the end of time. To read his writings is to love the man and be a better person for the reading. An honest heart goes out to him with sympathy and love. He is hardly in the prime of his usefulness, and may he be spared many years to batter down the strongholds of superstition, and build up the doctrin of "love your family and make others happy." And when that career of usefulness is ended, where will rise the one with his eloquence to pronounce the eulogy of a mourning world? His epitaph will be the curse of superstition and the tears of grateful humanity.

WALLACE WESTWIN.

LEXINGTON, KY., Feb. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Coudert knows that our holiest thoughts come with a sudden, ardent burst of enthusiasm. Then repress not, in the name of justice, the words of the man or woman who thinks well for our country. The logic which represses honest thought, or the expression of it, runs backward and accomplishes no improvement. And who is fitted to check or criticise the opinions of his friends? Who is without some passionate prejudice, some darling theory, which says: "I am competent to chain you. My object is to save your poor soul, by force, if need be." Thus does the fiend, Supernaturalism, take a man by the collar, drag him out of himself, and cause him to be the basest of persecutors. Thus the purest hearts hav consented to the rack, the ghastly tribunal, the fagot, the flame.

There is no danger of the want of conservatism. It is always supplied by selfish considerations, love of gain, burning ambition. These will throttle your honest opinions, which are your life-breath. The man who throws contempt upon another's views, boycotts his business, tells you not to trade in his store, has about him the odor of an intolerant fiend just from the fires of the pit of woe.

Why force their inferior Christ upon us? Unholy ambition thirsts for his "heavenly kingdom—the sensual indolence which will not build one here." Moses had some idea of personal freedom, Christ had none. Does that betoken an advance in civilization? "The fate of humanity at no time depended on one man or one book," but bloody revolutions against church and state hav changed the moral status of society. ALHAZA.

PALMYRA, KY., Feb. 18, 289.

MR. EDITOR: The Christian churches combined constitute the most soulless and gigantic monopoly that was ever in existence. It is an outgrowth from heathen idolatry and foolish superstitions, and with its relentless grasp it robs the cradle and the grave; it robs and controls the intellect when developing in childhood, and robs the grave of its peaceful rest; it robs people of the time that should be used in studying something useful, instead of learning ghost stories from vulgar Bibles, or praying to imaginary gods. It tried to rob Thomas Paine of the honors of an American patriot; told falsehoods about his death-bed scenes, and in its grasping, selfish, and greedy embrace it presses to its putrid and rotten, bloated, old carcass, Girard College, and forces its foul breath inside its noble walls, so instead of its being an honor to our cause, as was intended by its noble founder, it is a blot and disgrace to civilization. Its frauds and methods of supporting itself in idleness and ignorance encompass the globe, and everything is grasped eagerly and adopted and woven in to prove its wondrous and untruthful creeds, and their polished teachers are all the while conniving in the i brain something new to hold the masses in their relentless grasp.

They are all the while searching, planning, adopting, and discarding to hold the slavish power of fear over their blind followers. Their priests and ministers hav to adopt everything they can to keep their business—and bread and butter—from slipping away from them, for their well drilled forces are surrendering to the truthful batteries of Freethought and mental liberty. Their cathedrals and creeds are crumbling to pieces, and they are in peril, and to save themselvs from total defeat they hav to adopt evolution now as a cornerstone for their theology to stand upon.

Here are a few words from the sermon of the Rev. Myron Adams, delivered at his church in Rochester, Dec. 9, 1888: "The march of evolution, from the foundation of the Christian religion, is a Niagara stream impossible to put a stop to, and it is a bad thing that Christian people should consent to be Infidels [to it]."

I do sincerely thank Mr. Adams for daring to use his reason, and for casting from the shoulders of Liberals that old disgraceful stigma of Infidelity and placing it where it belongs—on the back of Christians. Truly the intellectual sky is brightening, and to keep their religious societies anywhere near the army of progress they hav to reluctantly fall into line, or they will be left out in the cold. H. P. MARSH.

CHESANING, MICH., March 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A copy of your paper fell into my hands by way of a brother of mine, in answer to my inquiry as to what he thought of Senator Blair's Sunday Rest bill. That paper contained, among other things, the cartoon representing the union of church and state under the guidance of the Blair bill. We, with others, think it a forcible and correct illustration, though some church people do not see it in that light.

We read carefully the discussion by Robert G. Ingersoll and others in the same paper. We hav no knowledge of the avoirdupois of the gentleman, yet we will venture at our distance to whisper that we think his theory on thought is somewhat lame on one limb, at least.

He says that man is not responsible for his thoughts; that he (man) cannot help thinking, etc. Now, compare this with another teacher's statement, who lived over eighteen hundred years ago, a recognized author by many, if not by the colonel, at the present day. He says that whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery already in his heart. Mark, it is not the look, but lust or thought, that this teacher says breaks the Seventh Commandment! Is not here responsibility attached to man's thoughts?

Again, says Mr. Ingersoll, man cannot help thinking or stop his thoughts. We reply this time louder than a whisper that we know better. It is one thing to say, I cannot, but quite another to say, You cannot. Mr. Ingersoll may truthfully say he cannot stop his flow of thought, but when he says that another man cannot, he is stating something that he does not know or cannot prove; and this has ever been one of the strong pillars of Infidelity—to make assertions without proof. He may never hav learned how to stop his thoughts, or words, while others hav and can.

The writer has known others besides himself that hav learned and practiced this little, yet valuable, secret. Dr. Jackson, founder of the home at Dansville, N. Y., taught it to his patients. One of them gave us the key, and here it is: Simply, stop thinking. But, says Mr. Ingersoll, you cannot do it. Yes, I can; and hav many times, when I knew my mind or thinker needed rest, after hours of hard study, and the mind and thoughts all aglow with the intensity of the subject under consideration, dropped my thoughts, and in less than two minutes hav fallen into a sweet, restful, and thoughtless sleep. I did not even think of saddle or bridle either. It is simply the exercise of the will over the mind or thought, as expressed by the great teacher above noticed; and how much better if the great teachers of the nineteenth century were in harmony with the teachers of the first century!

I understand that the thought, as expressed by the great teacher, is the bud; the words issuing from the thought are the blossom; the act produced by both is the fruit. Is not the bud responsible for the fruit? If so, could not the tree (the man) hav killed the bud before it blossomed? Most certainly. Then there lies his responsibility.

It seems to me that Mr. Ingersoll and Company would do well to stop manufacturing that and similar buds from which we are reaping a wonderful harvest at the present day. It seems that in every age the main work of Infidelity is to tear down rather than to build up. We may stop to-day and patiently answer every question and every objection beyond a reasonable doubt, and shut their mouths by asking them to giv us something better than Christianity, and to-morrow they will come back and ask the same, with as much bravado and gusto as though they had never been answered.

Voltaire, Thomas Paine, and Company are a heavy firm, yet their scrip is worthless according to the detector. Do they ever offer us any better code of laws than the Ten Commandments? any better teachings than Christ taught in his Sermon on the Mount? any purer, holier, more elevating principles than were taught by him and his apostles? Hav they ever given us any evidence of their superior knowledge as to the rise, progress, and fall of notable men, nations, kingdoms, and governments?

How did Daniel know that the kingdom of Babylon, that in his day was at the hight of its glory, would be subdued by the Medes and Persians, and that the Persian line would take the lead in their kingdom? How did he know that the Medes and Persians would be overthrown by the Grecians under Alexander, their first king? How did he know that the Grecian kingdom would be divided into four parts, as it was after Alexander's death, by his four generals? How did he know that the Grecian kingdom would be subdued by the strongest nation that would ever exist upon the earth? How did he know that this kingdom or power would put Christ to death upon the cross, and then continue until it would be divided into ten parts, or kingdoms, which was done between 356 and 483 of the Christian era? And how did he know it would continue in this divided state until the final consummation of all earthly kingdoms? Are they not still in their divided state, and known in history as the ten kingdoms of the Roman empire?

How did Isaiah know Cyrus's name more than one hundred years before he was born, that he (Cyrus) would conquer Babylon, and name the peculiar manner in which he would do it? And how did he know that the city of Babylon after it was destroyed would be inhabited by doleful creatures, wild beasts, owls—that satyrs would dance there, and dragons cry in their pleasant houses, etc., and that the daring Arab could not be induced to pitch his tent there?

Let Infidels answer these questions satisfactorily, then we will giv them another batch. Let them try their hand at such predictions, and see if they will be as literally and completely fulfilled as are the prophecies of both the Old and New Testament writers. We wait to hear from them.

Respectfully yours, D. W. Milk.

Detroit, Mich., March 4, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Mr. C. L. James, in The Truth Seeker of March 2d, says that some remarks of mine cause him to rise and explain. I am very glad to hav done even so much as to cause one thinker to rise and explain. But I am sorry that, after rising, he forgot what he arose for. I hav, for many years past, been very well acquainted with many able men who advocated Socialism, Communism, and Anarchy, and nearly all of them are brave, honest people. But their theories hav never seemed either applicable or practicable; they hav a condition of affairs before their minds which pleases them and is desired by all other people, but no one has ever yet made known any practicable means of obtaining those conditions. The trouble with nearly all reforms is that we are all the victims of our educations. We hav been fed from our birth upon the superstition that we are free and liv under the tender protection of a free government. Now, no advance in any real reform will ever gain one step forward so long as this falsehood is believed. The superstition of the church is secondary to this by long odds. In The Truth Seeker of February 16th, on the first page, is a quotation from Secular Thought as follows: "Liberty, in the widest and best sense of the term, is little understood in this country. We boast that we are a free people, and we best illustrate this freedom by imposing all sorts of restrictions upon our people." Now, I think the writer of the above does not understand liberty in any sense, any more than other people, for liberty can hav no widest or narrowest sense, any more than the sun can hav a wide and a narrow sense of illumination. The declaration that every person born has an inalienable right to life, liberty, and to pursue happiness, has no widest and best sense. It is unqualified truth. To add to or take from it is simply hypocrisy. As light is the opposit of darkness, so liberty is the opposit of slavery. As the light is removed, an obscured darkness takes its place, so as liberty is taken from the people, slavery takes its place. People talk about feeling not very well and half sick, and they talk of wage-slavery and the slavery of capital, and all sorts of slavery, when, in fact, it is all slavery, and no person has ever yet known what a condition of liberty is. There are laws everywhere making suicide a crime, because they say life is inalienable. Yet our government has never hesitated one moment to alienate the life, liberty, and happiness of every man, woman, or child, since the Constitution gave it the power to tax the people, to raise revenues, declare war, and declare what constitutes treason.

We, the people, are either a free people living under a government formed for liberty, intended to protect the people in their inalienable rights to life, liberty, and happiness, and there has never been a person hanged or deprived of life, liberty, or happiness in the past one hundred years—or we are slaves and hav lived one hundred years under a government formed to enslave the people and to rob them of those inalienable rights, and hundreds hav been hanged and deprived of life, liberty, and happiness. There is an old saying that men do not gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles, and it applies here very well. Let people giv up the superstition that we are free, and all other fallacies will soon follow. People hav all their lives been talking of monarchical countries as enslaved, and of this country as having a free government. Yet no one can tell where the difference is, or show that ever one country had a government that was so different from all others as to make the condition of the people continue to be prosperous, happy, and contented. If such a thing had ever been known, other countries would hav been sure to copy after it. And if, as has been claimed for over a hundred years past, this country had so constructed its government and laws as to protect the people in the inalienable right to life, liberty, and happiness, the consequences would hav been that there would never hav been any poverty, slavery, war, crime, vice, or misery; no use for the gallows, the prison, workhouse, jail, or police station, and every country on earth would, long since, hav adopted the same kind of government, and the world would be free to-day instead of millions of the best men standing with arms ready to murder each other. But the money-lenders own the earth, and the people thereof, and to hav a free government destroys their occupation, for all slave-governments are formed for and by the money-lenders. Governments are only their tools. They tell the people that governments cannot make money, but they can and will license any number of bankers to lend their debts to the people as money, and then, as no people would ever borrow or use anyone's debts as money unless compelled to, the government levies a tax upon all and everything that the people hav or can raise or get or must hav, and thus compels the people to borrow bankers' debts to pay taxes with, and thus puts bankers' debts in circulation as money to rob the people by debt and interest. And no person can think of an evil or oppression that has not had its germ and root in this slavery to the money-lenders by taxation.

I had hoped to hav seen this noticed by more of the readers and writers in The Truth Seeker, as it is plain and simple and points straight to liberty by the only path that can ever lead there. One of the largest and best-informed papers in the city says that $1,000,000 a day in taxes are handed over to the banks for the general government, and about as much more for state governments. So that the people must borrow $2,000,000 a day of bankers' debts to pay taxes with, which is handed back to the banks to be borrowed again to-morrow.

Now, let all taxation cease. Let our government create and issue its own money a legal tender, and never authorize or recognize anything else as money, and with it pay all expenses of government, and all public works that are for the good of all. Ever yours for liberty, J. H. Wood.

New Cambria, Kan., Feb. 24, 1889.

Mr. Editor: The young men of the Young Men's Christian Association think they are the center of the universe, and everything, including this planet, revolves around them, or not to put it too strong, they think they are the center of attraction in every town and city where they hav an organization, and imagin when they walk the streets that everybody that passes them thinks to himself, There goes not only a very "goody-good" young man, but one who shapes the destinies and morals of all who happen to enter the place. The first thing you will notice on entering the depot is a notice that tells you where their headquarters are, where I will assure you that you will not find any literature that will cause such a sudden expansion of the cranium as to burst your head. In circulating the petition against the Blair bill I would come in contact with them once in a while, and they would snap and snarl at it worse than any little cur you ever saw. And if they held any official position, which some of them did, such as police, they prostituted their official position to try and intimidate a person that was exercising one among our first constitutional rights, that of petitioning Congress. There were no less than two of these official meddlers trying to intimidate me while I was circulating the above document, and so they followed up the idea that the Rev. E. P. Chittenden advanced through the Salina press, that if he were mayor he would giv me peremptory orders to leave the city. What traitors to their country! what traitors to liberty! what traitors to justice! what traitors to their oath of office! Is it not plain that, if history ever repeats itself, the first danger lies in municipal government? So it behooves every Liberal to know whom he is trusting with the government of his town or city. See to it that you are electing fair-minded men from mayor down to city police justice. Of course I would hav a tilt with these young men on the goose question, as it were, once in a while, and their arguments consisted in the threadbare lie that "Ingersoll does not believe what he advances," and "You will see when you come to die," and "I would hate to think that I was no better than a brute," and "I don't see how you can be happy in such a belief." I would retort: "Do you believe what you claim to? Now, then, if you can show me wherein Colonel Ingersoll should not be credited with truth and veracity, then there will be some ground for your assertion. I happen to take a paper that records the death of unbelievers daily, and not a single one of them changes his belief on his deathbed, nor is there an instance on record where any ever hav. So, judging by their experience, I never will. But there are on record instances where Christians hav—that of Jean Meslier, a Catholic priest, and Martin Luther. The latter said, 'It is all dark.' And if you were honest with yourself you would say the same thing. Now you believe or guess that when I die I will catch hell. I guess not. Is your guess any better than mine? 'You will see!' No, I won't, for I shall not hav any eyes to see with and if you and your sky-pilot make the same mistakes there as you hav made in regard to the circulation of this petition your guesses are not worth much here or hereafter, and I am inclined to think I shall find it altogether different from what you guess. And as for your claiming that I think I am no better than a brute, you assume too much. While I don't know very much, I try to do justice as far as I know how, and as far as the brute is concerned it is not accountable if it should happen to eat another up, but your God is. Now, in circulating this petition I hav learned by sad experience that those of your way of thinking will stoop to any injustice or unfairness to gain your point over an opponent. Now, which is the most like the brute, you or I? Perhaps you feel as I do about the brute, that if you do a fellow-man a wrong your God will forgiv you for it. Don't you see you place yourself on the same level with the brute? And I look upon you with this difference, that you ought to be accountable to your fellow-man, while the brute ought not to be to his fellow-brute. And when you do a person an injustice when he differs with you, or when you use a club or the law to prevent him, you use brute force, and place yourself on the same level with the brute—only worse. The brute is excusable because he doesn't know any better; you are not because you ought to. Now, I want to show you some of the injustice I hav received at your hands—that is, by your side of the house. When I went up to get a reply in the Republican to the attack made on me through its columns by the Rev. Mr. Chittenden, I was accused of trying to get my name in print, thus adding insult to injury. One morning when I was taking the train at New Cambria for Salina I called the agent's attention to the Blair bill. After asking me some questions, which I answered, he said he did not want such talk before his children, and if I were not careful I would find the door. He lived in the station, and the children were asleep, and if they were not, who was to blame, as he asked the question? I wrote to the manager of the road to know if it was a public building. I was fired from Mrs. J. A. Shout's boarding-house because I was not able to believe in the novelties that the rest of the boarders did. They had the Bible and an immense stock of other novels, in paper covers, for a library. Now, I don't hav the advantage of any such library, and yet I 'had to go,' as one policeman put it about my leaving the city, so you see there is no forgivness of sin on account of ignorance with you fellows. You see, I was not educated in the same branches of knowledge with that household. Methinks I hear you say, 'You ought to hav been, and so it is your fault and not theirs, and that settles it.' Let us be honest. I bunked with one of these young men a week and found him a perfect gentleman, but I must say he was a grand exception to the rule. I hav gone to all this trouble to relate my charges instead of asking you to believe in my assertions, as some of your number did in scanning my petition. Some said we were Nihilists, some one thing and some another, and when called upon to show wherein we were not law-abiding citizens, or violated one right, that settled it, they did not giv an instance. So I am in the habit, whenever any person makes a charge against another, to hav him tell me all about it. Ecclesiastes says: 'Man has no preëminence above a beast; all hav one breath; all go unto one place; all are of the dust, and return to the dust again.' All of the above is true except where it says that we are 'all of the dust.' This is, too, but, I want it distinctly understood, not in the sense that 'Adam was made out of dust and stood up against the fence to dry.' Now, you want to look out if you deny this passage of scripture I hav just quoted; according to your belief you will catch what you think your God has in store for me. The best way I hav of getting you to understand whether I am happy in my belief is to ask you, Are you happy in yours? Echo answers the same for me. And when you had a little more power than you hav now, did not some of your way of thinking torture a few hundred thousands of persons of our way of thinking? When they suffered death for their belief, will you doubt that it was a source of great comfort and happiness to them? How much more so to me, when I hav no fear of death from the same cause, knowing that you who are so dreadfully opposed to boycotting will only try to hurt me by slander and abuse, and every other conceivable plan that an ill-disposed person can bring to bear upon me?" Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Giv Me A Frosty Morning.

Giv me a frosty morning,
When everything is clad
In garments white adorning,
To make this old world glad.
Giv me the crystal luster
Of clinging, trailing vines,
Where in profusion cluster
A thousand odd designs.
Giv me the river flowing
In ripples of delight,
All lined with trees a-glowing
In liveries of white.

Giv me a frosty morning,
Just as the sun's bright rays
A crystal beauty are forming
To meet our fervent gaze.
Giv me a hut all sprinkled
With dots of hoary frost,
Where vines, all crooked and crinkled,
Climb up, along, across.
Giv me this scene of splendor,
This earthly paradise,
Where fall the gems so tender,
Like meteors from the skies.

Giv me a frosty morning
Amidst the gilded boughs,
Where trumpet sound givs warning,
And every thought endows.
Giv me this scene all laden
With drops of frozen dew,
Just like a jeweled maiden,
All robed in pearly hue.
Giv me this lustrous vision
'Tis nature's wedding-gown,
All draped in neat precision,
Replete with beauty's crown.

A Dutch Lullaby.

Wynken, Blynken, and Nod one night
Sailed off in a wooden shoe—
Sailed into a river of misty night,
Into a sea of dew.
"Where are you going and what do you wish?"
The old moon asked the three.
"We hav come to fish for the herring-fish
That liv in this beautiful sea;
Nets of silver and gold hav we,"
Said Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

The old moon laughed and sung a song
As they rocked in the wooden shoe.
And the wind that sped them all night long
Ruffled the waves of dew;
The little stars were the herring-fish
That lived in the beautiful sea,
"Now cast your nets wherever you wish,
But never afeared are we"—
So cried the stars to the fishermen three,
Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

All night long their nets they threw
For the fish in the twinkling foam;
Then down from the sky came the wooden shoe,
Bringing the fishermen home.
'Twas all so pretty a sail, it seemed
As if it could not be;
And some folks thought 'twas a dream they dreamed
Of sailing that beautiful sea;
But I shall name you the fishermen three:
Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

Wynken and Blynken are two little eyes,
And Nod is a little head,
And the wooden shoe that sailed the skies
Is a wee one's trundle-bed;
So shut your eyes while mother sings
Of wonderful sights that be,
And you shall see the beautiful things
As you rock on the misty sea
Where the old shoe rocked the fishermen three—Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

Why Freethought is the Best Thought.

Each one can do his own thinking. Freethought has no ruler. Each person has a right to think for himself or herself. The church has a ruler that tries to rule Freethought; it will not think for itself, but will hav others think for it. We are free to think for ourselvs now, more than what people used to be, and for that reason better thoughts are penned every day. These are the reasons why I think Freethought is the best thought. What the Little Ones Are Saying.

A boy of six took to reading the Bible, commencing at the beginning. He soon found something that interested him, and he submitted the matter to his aunt. She asked him what he had found, when he read: "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam . . . and he took one of his ribs and . . . made he a woman," etc. Then as he looked his aunt in the eye, she asked him what he thought of that. He said: "I think it is a pretty large story." That boy is now a man of family, but is still an Infidel.

A small boy had heard of hell, and he asked his sister, who was older than himself, what kind of a place it was. She answered him, conveying the idea that it was a pretty hot place that the wicked were cast into, etc. Says he: "By mighties! I couldn't stand that two minutes." He is now a man, and has no fear of such a place, as he is an Infidel.

A boy of five, whose father was something of a sporting man, asked his mother who God was. She answered him to the best of her knowledge and belief, giving him the idea that God was something pretty large. Says he: "Do you suppose he can throw Lyge?" (the hired man). She answered him good-naturedly that she thought he could. Says he: "I'll bet you a dollar that Lyge can throw him higher than a kite." Lyge was evidently his god. That boy died young.

Queer happenings occur on the occasion of little people's first "outings" at church, all of them suggestiv of the startling innocence of childhood and its bewitching talent for "hitting the nail on the head." A minister's little daughter was attending her first church service, at which her father presided. She had never seen him in pulpit before, and on his entrance therein her presence of mind forsook her, and she piped up, in a voice expressiv of joyful recognition, "Why, t-h-e-r-e's papa, up in that box!" Avenging propriety swept down upon the little maiden, and for a season there was a great calm. But the services were grievously long to such a wee worshiper, and she became very restless, walking up and down the pew and sighing audibly. Mamma whispered, comfortingly, "Papa's most through, dear," whereupon ensued another brief period of quiet; but it was not to last. Tired baby nature had reached its utmost limit of endurance, and by and by over the quiet listeners arose a little voice, clear and plaintiv and coaxing, "Isn't you you most froo, papa?"

BELOIT, O., Feb. 25, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am twelve years old. I am staying at my grandpa's, and am going to school. We hav a graded school, and I am in the upper room and the little ones in the lower room. We hav good teachers and good schools.

I am studying arithmetic, reading, spelling, geography, and physiology.

I hav three brothers and two sisters. Grandpa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has taken it ever since it has been published. I like to read the Children's Corner, and look at the pictures This is my first letter to the Children's Corner.

Your Freethinker friend,
CARRIE GROVE.

O BROTHER man, fold to thy heart thy brother!
Where pity dwells, a heavenly peace is there;
To worship rightly is to love each other,
Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer.

Follow with reverent steps each great example
Of all whose holy work was doing good;
So shall the wide earth seems a sacred temple,
Each loving life a psalm of gratitude.

Matter.

Many learned men hav written on the subject of matter, and they hav told much of its varied and wonderful qualities. I will tell about a few of the principal of these qualities for the benefit of the Corner.

The word "matter" is a term used to denote all those substances that affect our senses. This term includes an infinit variety of forms—in fact, it includes everything that occupies space, everything that has length, breadth, or thickness.

All matter is divisible. This is plain to everyone. When we walk through the parks, the fields, or our gardens, and the scent of flowers comes to our nostrils, we hav a specimen—and one that is very sweet, too—of the divisibility of matter. We hav learned that the fragrance of which we are then conscious is composed of particles that were separated from the flower.

We may divide matter—a body may be separated into smaller and still smaller particles without limit—but we cannot destroy it. Suppose we crush a grain of sand; we may grind it all we please, but it will not be destroyed. The particles of which it was composed will still exist. We may burn a piece of wood, but we shall not hav destroyed it. We simply shall hav divided it. By that process the parts that went to make up the stick will hav changed their form—some of them will hav gone off into the atmosphere as smoke, and some will remain in the form of ashes—but none of them will be annihilated. They will not cease to be. There will not be a single particle of matter less or more after than there was before the stick was consumed. There is exactly the same number of the particles of matter or atoms in existence now that there was ages ago. Matter has always been the same in quantity and will be for all eternity. Therefore it is obvious that things may be changed but not destroyed.

By magnitude or extension, a second quality of matter, we mean its property of occupying space. It is by the observation of this quality that we know the shape in which a body exists—that is, whether it is large or small, long or short, wide or narrow, thin or thick, of what form or figure. This quality is manifest. We can see it in the trees, the rivers, the fields, the sun and the moon—in fact, in everything that occupies space.

A third quality of matter is impenetrability—that is, everything fills a certain space, a space that no other body can fill. As an illustration: We take a glass. It is full of air. When we pour water into it, the water displaces the air, but the air still occupies a space. If we move, we displace the air around us, but both our bodies and the air occupy the same space as before. There are some instances in which matter may apparently be penetrated, but it has been proved that it can never be done. If a nail should be driven into a piece of wood, the particles of wood would not be penetrated; they would be merely displaced. So it is to be observed that every substance must hav a place.

Inertia is a fourth quality of matter. This means the total inability of a body to change its position or state. A ball cannot put itself in motion, nor can it, when put in motion, stop itself. Suppose we start a ball rolling on a smooth pavement. It soon stops, but it does not stop itself. It is the resistance of the air, the friction, and various other causes that make it stop.

A fifth quality of matter is attraction. Of this there are two kinds. The first is the attraction of cohesion, without which everything about us would crumble to pieces. We break a stick of candy; by this act we hav destroyed the attraction of cohesion which held the candy together in the place where it is broken. When we melt lead we destroy by fire the cohesion of the particles of metal. The second kind of attraction is the attraction of gravitation, which means the tendency of all bodies to approach each other. This is witnessed when anything falls to the ground. Newton, it is said, first conceived the idea of universal attraction from the simple incident of an apple falling to the ground from a tree in his garden. It is because of this quality of matter that things stand firmly on the earth on every part of the globe.

So much is to be said about the quality of attraction, that I will tell the children of it at another time. But before closing I wish I could impress upon the minds of our young friends the fact that the more we study and observe the laws of nature, the more refined and elevating become our thoughts. A knowledge of the principles of science will render us happier as we journey through the world by making us better fitted to use the advantages that come in our way. We shall never know too much. JOHN T. REED.

QUESTIONS.—What does the word "matter" denote? What quality of matter is first mentioned? Giv a specimen of the divisibility of matter. Can we destroy matter? If we crush a grain of sand, hav we destroyed it? If we burn a piece of wood, hav we destroyed it? If not, what hav we done? If not destroyed, where is it? Are there any more or fewer particles of matter now than there were ages ago? What do we mean by magnitude or extension? Where can we see this quality? What is meant by impenetrability? Mention the first illustration. Does matter ever appear to be penetrated? Is it penetrated? What is inertia? Does a ball when put in motion stop itself? What causes it to stop? What is attraction? Of how many kinds is attraction? What are they? What is cohesion? What is gravitation? What is the result of study? How will a knowledge of science benefit us?

DISCUSSION.

FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

—o—

Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Dr. Field is one of the exceedingly few Christians who hav opposed Colonel Ingersoll kindly and courteously, and the Great Agnostic has used him accordingly. Dr. Field's arguments, however, are broken in pieces.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

Poetry.

The Man Who Brings Up the Tail End.

Folks watch the drum major and say, "See him come!"
And the fellow who plays on the fife,
And the rub-a-dub man who beats the big drum,
And the bugler who blows for dear life.
They go with the music; they march with the noise;
For the chief in the van they all hunt.
There is smiling of maidens and shouting of boys,
And cheering of men—in the front.
But there's never a cheer that gladdens the ear,
Nor the shout of a brother or friend,
For the mud-spattered man who has dropped from the van,
For the man who brings up the tail end.
Not a bravo is heard, not a word, not a word,
As they see him stub on round the bend;
Not a cheer from the churls, not a smile from the girls,
For the man who brings up the tail end!

There are shouts for the victor whose name, like a star,
Rose red from the hot clouds of flame,
Through the battle smoke of a lurid war,
To climb up the heaven of fame.
And his ears are beset with a tumult of tongues,
That prate of the danger he braved,
With a chorus of praise from the lusty lungs
Of the men of the land he has saved.
But I sing of the man who has dropped from the van,
From the front he could never defend,
Who could never awe it the harsh volley of fate—
The man who brings up the tail end!
Then a good strong shout in the rear of the rout,
And the brotherly cheer of a friend;
A cheer that shall start from the core of the heart,
For the man who brings up the tail end!

And who are the men who bring up the tail end?
The laggards too weak to be great?
Time's water-logged timber too rotten to mend?
Abortions and weaklings of fate?
Not so: There are poets whose songs are unsung,
And singers of wonderful tone,
Reformers whose thunderous words might hav stung
To the roots of a tottering throne!
Then shout your huzzas and your loudest hurrahs,
Until the loud welkin shall rend;
Let your loud plaudits grace the world-weary face
Of the man who brings up the tail end!
Then shout without fear for the man in the rear,
Let your heaven-scaling plaudits ascend!
Cry aloud! cry aloud! you men there in the crowd!
For the man who brings up the tail end.

There are plebeian souls who sit on a throne,
And kings who wear never a crown;
There are long-gowned priests who are devils unknown,
And saints in the frock of the clown;
There are hearts that are black 'neath the king's purple vest,
And white 'neath the swain's drilling frock;
And the laborer's coat may be armor the best
For meeting adversity's shock.
Then a cheer and a roar, and three cheers more,
For the man most in need of a friend;
Good cheer for the man who has dropped from the van,
The man who brings up the tail end!
Then shout your cheer right into his ear,
Let your voices in unity blend;
One loud, long shout in the rear of the rout,
For the man who brings up the tail end!

Consolation.

When Molly came home from the party to-night—
The party was out at nine—
There were traces of tears in her bright blue eyes
That looked mournfully up to mine,

For some one had said, she whispered to me,
With her face on my shoulder hid,
Some one had said (there were sobs in her voice)
That they didn't like something she did.

So I took my little girl up on my knee—
I am old and exceedingly wise—
And I said: "My dear, now listen to me;
Just listen, and dry your eyes.

"This world is a difficult world, indeed,
And people are hard to suit,
And the man who plays on the violin
Is a bore to the man with the flute.

"And I myself hav often thought,
How very much better 'twould be
If every one of the folks that I know
Would only agree with me.

"But since they will not, the very best way
To make this world look bright
Is, never to mind what people say,
But to do what you think is right."

—Walter Learned, in St. Nicholas for March.

Fighting Over "Holy" Places.

From the Levant Herald and Eastern Express.

The greater part of the Jews in Jerusalem are those who hav been expelled from Russia by that delightful government which Mr. Robert Lowe (before he became a lord and learned occasionally to hold his tongue) called the "father of the fatherless and the defender of the oppressed." Knouted, imprisoned, and murdered, and the remnant thrust across the Russian frontier, the poor creatures hav come in hundreds to Jerusalem only to find themselvs worse off than ever. And the joke of it is that the very Russian government which created their banishment is now daily using them as a convenient pretext for fastening grievances on the Turkish authorities. Holy Russia first expels her Jews and then protects them. It is ingenious and characteristic.

If the Jews do not appear to advantage in Jerusalem, neither do the Christians. Palestine is the rendezvous of all the Christian sects, and the Holy City with its holy places is the point to which they all converge with the greatest perseverance, and where their deadly hatred of each other is most apparent. They each hav a share in the holy places—that is to say, in the places which are held to be holy because they are identified with some notable event in Christian history—which the Turkish government has allowed them to divide between them. Each sect magnifies the holiness of its own particular holy places, and decries those of all other sects. Thus the Latin church attaches much importance to the fourteen "stations of the cross" extending along the Via Dolorosa, through which our savior carried his cross to Golgotha. They hav accordingly marked each station by a stone in the wall, with an inscription thereon. The Greeks, however, think nothing of these stations, and, having become the owners of a house in which the ninth station is marked, they hav proceeded at once joyfully and triumphantly to efface the Latin inscription. The Latins, however, hav got even with them in another place. The Greeks hav made a saint of Longinus, the Roman soldier who is reputed to hav pierced our savior's side and then to hav repented and become a Christian, and they hav set up a chapel to him. But the Latins declare him to hav been no saint at all, assert that he was never heard of till the fifth century, and when they hav their processions they contemptuously pass the chapel of St. Longinus without even paying him the compliment of stopping before it as they do before all places of reputed sanctity.

The struggle over these holy places is very bitter. There are even opposition holy places. Thus the Latins possess what they hold to be the garden of Gethsemane, which they hav fenced and planted, and the very oliv-stones, whereof they sell at a great price to the faithful to make rosaries withal. But the Greeks hav set up another garden of Gethsemane of their own hard by, and Latins and Greeks each denounce the garden of the others as a swindle and imposture. As to the more important holy places, which are agreed upon as genuin by all the sects—such as the place of the holy sepulcher—these are occupied in common. In the chapel of the holy sepulcher itself for instance—a narrow place in which there is barely room for three people to stand—there burn forty-three silver lamps. Of these, thirteen belong to the Latins, thirteen to the Greeks, thirteen to the Armenians, and four to the Coptic Christians. Even here the sects would fight but for the Turkish authorities—indeed, they do fight; and the most edifying of all the sights that the church of the holy sepulcher has to afford is that of the stolid armed Turkish guard, seated smoking inside the porch to prevent the Christians from cutting each other's throats over their differences.

These quarrels are not occasional, they are perpetual, and take place over the most ridiculous trifles, so that the Turkestan government (now represented by Reouf Pasha, the most popular governor Jerusalem has had for many years) is daily driven to its wit's end to understand and to compose the most childish disputes. One of these squabbles has recently raged with great virulence. At Bethlehem, over the spot reputed to be the birthplace of our savior, there stands a church. Formerly it belonged to the Greek Christians alone, but some years ago the Armenians and Latins were admitted to a joint proprietorship, which they still enjoy. Now, in this church there is a place covered by a straw mat and over this straw mat a terrible battle has been waged. The Latins, so far as I can gather, complain that in some manner their right of way is interfered with by the mat to an extent which on inquiry proved to be eighteen inches. The Armenians declare that they will rather perish than move the mat or hav it touched. Both parties here appealed to the pasha. The pasha's common sense suggestion that eighteen inches shall be cut off the mat has been treated with derision by both sides, and the dispute seems likely to continue forever, and to add to the stock of grievances which one sect is here always storing up against the other. Meantime the Turkish soldiers hav to be posted in the church with fixed bayonets to keep the peace between the Christians.

The most remarkable feature about all this is that the disputes are waged over precedency in or possession of holy places all of which are of doubtful authenticity, while some of them are undoubtedly spurious. The holy sepulcher itself is, as recent researches made by pious men hav shown, in all probability not that tomb outside of the city "wherein was never man yet laid," which it professes to be. The late General Gordon, who lived here long in order to investigate these very matters, was convinced that the real Golgotha and the real sepulcher lie outside the present wall, near to Damascus gate. And, to crown all, it is most doubtful whether the spot now covered over with the split marble slab which all pilgrims devoutly kiss, contains any hewn sepulcher at all. The same doubt covers almost every one of the holy places. But it is of no consequence at all. The melancholy truth is that all these holy places are a matter of commerce. Each one of them is an annuity to the sect to which it belongs, besides bringing to it an increase of importance and dignity. Therefore, holy places are multiplied and will continue to be multiplied so long as the faithful continue their respect for and their offerings to them.

The Protestants are, I am glad to say, the least quarrelsome among the Christian sects represented here. That is partly, perhaps, because they are least numerous, but largely because they hav no special holy place of their own and no pilgrims. They are troublesome, however, in another way. A number of well-meaning, foolish people subscribe money in England for missions. The missionaries—excellent men in some ways, but bigoted and foolish—being thus provided with considerable funds, feel that they must do or try to do something for the money. So they try to make converts from among the Jews and Mohammedans to Protestantism. They never succeed. They hav been over thirty years at work here, and they cost, as I am credibly informed, not less than £14,000 a year. I will undertake to say that in return for the £400,000 thus sunk they cannot show five grown-up bona fide honest converts. They may think this sufficient; but £80,000 per convert seems to me to be dear. They do, indeed, get hold occasionally of a child and train it up to call itself Protestant; and they are so very zealous and endowed with so little discretion and good manners as to thrust themselvs and their dogmas upon the Mussulman population in a pushing, persistent way that is always impertinent and often insolent. One of these days, I fear, some Moslem will resent their pushing intrusions as any one of us would resent the intrusion into our house in England of a Moslem who had come from Syria to convert us to Islam. Then there will be a "question" and troubles of all kinds. I declare that an Englishman can do nothing more mischievous to humanity, and to his own country in particular, than to subscribe money to a missionary society.

There is, indeed, one undoubtedly authentic holy place in Jerusalem. It is the "Es-Sakhra," that stone which has been held sacred from time immemorial, the rock on which was written the great and unspeakable name of God, on which Melchizedek and Abraham sacrificed, and which is revered as much by Moslem as by Jew and Christian. This is in the Haram esh Sherif, a large open plateau, which contains the mosque of Omar and the dome of the Rock. It also does undoubtedly include the spot on which Solomon's temple stood; but as to which part of the plateau that temple occupied no two authorities are agreed. The mosque is a splendid structure, as simple in design as it is rich in ornamentation, and tremendous substructures in the rock beneath the plateau show beyond a doubt that here were once grand and vast buildings.

Altogether Jerusalem is a melancholy monument of the departed greatness, not only of the Jewish, but also of the Christian faith.

Obituary.

From the Northwest News, Hay Springs, Neb.

Died at the residence of T. S. Tripp, March 16, 1889, Mabel Olive, daughter of T. S. and Hattie Tripp, aged 4 months and 19 days.

The funeral took place Sunday afternoon and was conducted by the Liberals.

The following service was read by Mrs. H. W. Mattley at the grave:

MY FRIENDS: The mother has claims upon the child of her bosom, but nature has an initial and final, a higher and lower claim, and she will be heeded, and the memory of this blossoming life is blossoming for eternal remembrance.

The stem is broken ere the lily has fully bloomed. We catch a glimpse of its beauty and a taste of its fragrance ere it passes away.

Life, strength, and maturity are given only upon conditions, and the conditions hav not all been complied with.

The way up the hill summit of manhood is paved with human bones, and each a lesson to those who follow.

But we consign no soul to torments; we hav no fears of an angry God or a gaping pit; no walled-up heaven with gate-keepers at the narrow portal; no flaming sword or cherubim in our garden to keep from the tree of life. We fear the jaws of no roaring lion seeking whom he may devour, unless it be death, and no fearful looking for the day of judgment in the future.

And now, by the care of that fatherly spirit of universal life which

Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
Spreads undivided, and operates unspent,

we leave our dead.

To the keeping of the life which buds in the vegetable, blooms in the animal, and fruits in the human, which livs through time and eternity, we consign our gentle little lily-bud in the repose of the tomb.

Let the birds sing above her, the flowers bloom over her head, and the sighing winds gather their fragrance over our loved and lost, and now farewell.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury: statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

A QUESTION FOR CHRISTIANS TO CONSIDER.

Gems of Thought.

"THE just" are those of the Christians who enjoy the advantage of being agreeable in the eyes of God. The earth is theirs by right, and they may possess it if they are in number sufficient to do so.—Voltaire's Pocket Theology.

IN all the factions and sects which for many years hav distracted Christianity, the best argument has always been that of the strongest party; the arms and will of princes hav alone decided which doctrin is most conduciv to the happiness of nations —D'Holbach.

IT is true that in the most civilized countries the Bible is read, but it is also true that they are all in the temperate zone, and that their inhabitants are mainly of the so-called Caucasian race. Christianity cannot be the essential cause of progress, for observation shows that social advance is coincident with the decline of "faith."—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

THE western provinces of the Roman empire were broken into by barbarians; amongst whom, however, Christianity had generally been taught. The most rude portions of that empire hav now become the most civilized, as Gaul (France), Germany, Britain, etc, yet the high civilization to which these nations hav attained cannot be charged to the influence of Christianity, for at every step the Christian priest and power was arresting the progress of knowledge and persecuting the philosophers of the age; neither is this civilization uniform and where there has been most of religion (Christian) there has been the least progress in the arts and sciences. As Christianity spread the Dark Ages advanced, and the civilization, the arts and sciences, of the Greeks and Romans disappeared, and this in a visible connection with the church.—Gilbert Vale.

WHEN any ordinary mortal writes a book he takes some pains to giv all the world an opportunity of reading it. When a God writes a book it is far otherwise. The Lord commanded his book to be put inside the ark, and ordered that the ark be kept in the most holy inner recess of the tabernacle or temple—a recess to which the high priest alone had access. Moreover, the place was too sacred for even the high priest to visit it whenever it might enter his head to do so; for Aaron was cautioned not to come "at all times into the holy place within the veil before the mercy-seat which is upon the ark, that he die not." From this it is obvious that, if the Lord had peculiar notions as to how to write a book, he had even more curious notions as to how to publish one. His mode of publishing was to put his MS. into a closed box, place the box in a recess where only one person was permitted to visit it, and that very cautiously and at stated times, under peril of being struck dead on the spot. The men of Beth-shemesh were of an inquiring turn of mind, and one or two of them, on one occasion, ventured a peep into the box or ark in which the Lord kept his book. But the Lord, whose son said, "Search the scriptures," did not approve of his book and his box being peeped at, so he "smote the men of Beth-shemesh because they had looked into the ark of the Lord, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and three score and ten men" (1 Sam. vi, 19). It is evident Jehovah had attached some importance to his book, since he slew 50 070 men because one or two out of that number had craned their necks to look into his book box. I repeat, Jehovah's ideas of publishing are just a trifle peculiar.—Saladin's God and His Book.

IN those days there was an almost infinit difference between the educated and ignorant. The people were controled almost entirely by signs and wonders. By the lever of fear, priests moved the world. The sacred records were made and kept, and altered by them. The people could not read, and looked upon one who could as almost a god. In our day it is hard to conceive of the influence of an educated class in a barbarous age. It was only necessary to produce the "sacred record," and ignorance fell upon its face.—Ingersoll.

THE element of uncertainty will, in a great measure, be removed from the domain of the future, and man, gathering courage from a succession of victories over the obstructions of nature, will attain a serene grandeur unknown to the disciples of any superstition. The plans of mankind will no longer be interfered with by the finger of a supposed omnipotence, and no one will believe that nations or individuals are protected or destroyed by any deity whatever. Science, freed from the chains of pious custom and evangelical prejudice, will, within her sphere, be supreme. The mind will investigate without reverence, and publish its conclusions without fear. Agassiz will no longer hesitate to declare the Mosaic cosmogony utterly inconsistent with the demonstrated truths of geology, and will cease pretending any reverence for the Jewish scriptures. The moment science succeeds in rendering the church powerless for evil, the real thinkers will be outspoken.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

MRS. ONTWIT (reading paper): "There, now! Dr. Howard Crosby says if there were only men on the stage, men would not go to the theater." Mr. Ontwit: "Well, perhaps if there were only women in the pulpit, women would not go to church."

PROFESSOR MARBLE (examining the work of a pupil in the modeling class): "Very good, Mr. Clay, especially the foot and ankle. Hav you devoted much attention to modeling?" Mr. Clay: "No, sir; I was formerly a conductor on a two-story Fifth avenue stage."

EONS AGO.

(A sesquipedalian retrospectiv reverie by a Boston maiden.)

Oh! I oft cogitate on the mystical past,
  Eons of ages ago,
When cohesion of molecules first began
  In terrestrial caverns below.
Yes, I oft speculate how the heulandite grew,
  In its tetrahexahedronical way,
Inclosed in its amygdaloidalic nome,
  In that antediluvian day.

Oh! the great pachydermatous Dinotheriums roamed,
  Though hypostatically unknown to me,
In those hyperborean regions of cold,
  By the paleocrystic sea,
But by some sudden glacial cataclysmatic change,
  Oh! the whole Brobdignagian troop
Were irrevocably buried in Cenozoic drift,
  And irretrievably lost "in the soup."

SUNDAY SCHOOL teacher: "Now, children, we left off last week where Abraham was begging the Lord to spare the two wickedest cities in the world from destruction. Who remembers their names?" No answer. "What! No one remembers what those awful wicked cities which the Lord intended to destroy were called?" No answer. "Well, can anyone tell me the name of one of them?" Small boy in the back: "Chicago."

IN the spring, when the green gits back in the trees,
  And the sun comes out and stays,
And yer boots pull on with a good tight squeeze,
  And you think of yer barefoot days;
When you ort to work and you want to not,
  And you and yer wife agrees,
It's time to spade up the garden lot—
  When the green gits back in the trees;
  Well, work is the least of my idees
  When the green, you know, gits back in the trees.

When the green gits back in the trees, and bees
  Is a buzzin' aroun' agin,
In that kind of a lazy "go-as-you-please"
  Old gait they hum roun' in;
When the ground's all bald where the hay-rick stood,
  And the crick's riz, and the breeze
Coaxes the bloom in the old dogwood,
  And the green gits back in the trees—
  I like, as I say, in sich scenes as these,
  The time when the green gits back in the trees.

When the whole tail feathers o' winter time
  Is all pulled out and gone,
And the sap it thaws and begins to climb,
  And the sweat it starts out on
A feller's forrerd, a gittin' down
  At the old spring on his knees—
I kind o' like jes' a loaferin' roun'
  When the green gits back in the trees,
  Jes' a potterin' roun' as I—durn—please
  When the green, you know, gits back in the trees. —James Whitcomb Riley.

GREAT statesman: "I am glad to hear that you hav not decided on a man for the English mission." Harrison: "It seems to be a very difficult place to fill. Nearly every English minister we hav had has got himself disliked in this country, and become a butt for the American press." Great statesman: "Giv me a chance, and I know I'll be popular. I am learning to talk with a brogue, and I hav chosen the shamrock for my coat of arms; besides that, I believe I could knock out the prince of Wales in a fair fight, and if it's true that Victoria has red hair, I'll yell: 'White horse!' every time she passes. Oh, don't you worry, I'll be the pet of the American press inside of three weeks!"

A STUDY IN POTTER'S CLAY.

[The following more or less odious comparison between the standing of the church and that of the drama, was suggested by a private view of Bishop Potter, in full regimentals—apron, knee-breeches, black stockings, etc.]

There's grace divine in Potter's legs.
"What, those of Egypt's queen?"
Pshaw! Hers may be but clothes-line pegs,
  His grace's legs, I mean.

There's quite a charm about the hose
  In which those legs are seen—
Not that which goes with Cora's clothes,
  His grace's hose, I mean.

There's nothing wrong about the skirt,
  It only comes as low
As where the calves begin to spurt—
  His grace's calves, you know.

If accident that gown should raise,
  Or Boreas make too free,
You'd hav a chance to see and praise
  His grace's shapely knee.

You'll find no stems of brooms or mops
  Beneath his grace's frock,
But on his manly, sturdy props,
  The church stands as a rock.

Were Cora Potter's skirts as short
  As Cleopatra's nose,
You'd see upon what slim support
  The tottering drama goes.

Were he but she, and she but he,
  We'd hav the thing to rights;
For he could wear long gowns, and she
  Could wear the bishop's tights.

A NEW RENDERING OF AN OLD RHYME.

Notes and Clippings.

ARCHDEACON COLLEY, preaching on Satan recently at St. James's church, Marylebone, London, replying to an imaginary remonstrance from those who believe in giving the devil his due, exclaimed: "Ah, my friends, if we gave the devil his due many of us would be missing." The congregation smiled.

JIM BUCKLEY, of the Advocate, continuing his letters from Spain, says: "Bribery is general in Spain. Almost anything can be done with a fee. Not more than forty per cent of the taxes levied by the government can be collected. Mayors of cities get rich in a year. One at least of the most important cities is destitute of credit. No one will lend it any money. Spaniards so distrust each other that money is not forthcoming for great public works. The English manage the waterworks, the street-cars, and almost everything else."

REV. MR. SAVAGE in the North American Review singularly combats Bradlaugh's unbelief by telling him that "free-minded, well-informed people no longer believe in any fall of man." The Bradlaughs and Ingersolls, retorts the Galveston News, will say thanks for this kind of defense of Christianity, and will come back with the query that if it had not been for Voltaire, Paine, Huxley, and themselvs, would not the "free-minded," etc., hav been now believing in the fall of man as of old? Some people can hav the hardihood to set up as defenders, when they don't themselvs believe, but only cling to a name and a profession that enable them to maintain a certain position.

THE death of King John of Abyssinia removes from earth the last of a noted line—if the late King John told the truth. He claimed to be a direct descendant of King Solomon and the vivacious queen of Sheba. Owing to the death of his son by poison, King John left no issue. The extinction of a line going back to a period long before the late civil war, says the World, will awaken regret among the four hundred of New York. A man like King John, who could claim a descent from so antique a leader as Solomon, is a loss to society, in spite of the fact that he was a cold-blooded wretch.

AT the dedication of a Catholic parochial school building in Pittsburgh, Pa., last month, Bishop Kane, of Wheeling, delivered an address in which he severely denounced the public school system of America. In the course of his remarks he said the public school system was a divorce from moral and religious training. He denied that the Catholic church was opposed to education and said: "The great problem that confronts us to-day is the same as that which confronted the people in apostolic times. There were schools then, but they were pagan schools and the only way to counteract their effect was to establish Christian schools. That is what the Catholic church is trying to do in America now."

WHEN the Rev. Dr. Talmage visited the Missouri legislature the other day he was the recipient of special honors, and upon being introduced to the learned gentlemen who make laws for Missouri he delivered a very delightful optimistic address, devoted largely to the grandeur of the republic. In closing he said: "The world started with a garden and it is going to close with a garden. England for manufactories, France for manners, Germany for scholarship, Italy for pictures, but the United States for God." By "God" Mr. Talmage means the ministers. Always when the great ones of the churches tell us what God desires, it is found that his wishes are identical with those of the interpreters.

THE celebrated "Poughkeepsie plan" of public education has its practical drawbacks, as well as being an actual injustice to the taxpayers and thoroughly un-American and injurious. A dispatch dated April 4th says: "Some of the public schools in this city are owned by Catholic churches, but supported and supplied with teachers by the municipality. Much excitement has been caused during the past few days by the sudden appearance on walls and bill-boards of enormous posters bearing in big blue and red letters words such as follows: 'Who shall rule our public schools and our country, Americans or Jesuits?' The feeling among the Catholics is intense. They assert that the recent organization of a society antagonistic to the Roman Catholic church is for the purpose of creating dissension in the board of education."

AT the village of Reinberg in Austria recently a very religious family became possessed with the idea that they had been bewitched by an old crone in the village, and the man, with his three daughters and son and a young girl, who was in their house at the time, locked themselvs in, and began to pray and sing. They remained without food or drink for several days, and fired at neighbors who attempted to come near the house. They threatened to kill the girl when she wanted to go away. Their cattle were left to starve in the barn. At last the neighbors secured warrants against them as insane, and a force of asylum officers, assisted by the peasants, stormed the place, captured it, and took the family prisoners after a hard fight. One doctor's neck was grazed by a bullet, but there were no other casualties. The girl was released, and the others incarcerated in an asylum. Religion, when the patient has it bad, is a terrible disease.

THE Washington correspondent of the New York Sun sends home this interesting item: "A reverend gentleman by the name of Dennis, from Dayton, O., has been a persistent applicant for the post of consul to Jerusalem, and had his papers indorsed by a number of leading Ohio politicians. The point was urged in the Rev. Mr. Dennis's behalf that inasmuch as he was a converted Hebrew it was particularly desirable that he should be sent to the Holy Land to convert other Jews. Mr. Blaine sent for the papers yesterday, and, after an examination of their contents, turned Mr. Dennis down with the indorsement: 'As the state department is not an evangelical institution, the points herein made why this appointment should be made are not well taken.' Mr. Dennis will probably now seek the influence of Postmaster-General Wanamaker, who has secured the retention of Mr. Straus as minister to Turkey, against the urgent protest of Mr. Blaine, as a reward for his evangelical services in furthering the interests of Presbyterian missionaries in the East, and Mr. Blaine's caustic indorsement of Mr. Dennis's papers is supposed to hav been inspired by the Straus incident." It's refreshing to find in this administration of piety one cabinet officer who will not run his department in the interest of his church.

Professor Huxley and Agnosticism.

From the North American Review.

In the February number of the Nineteenth Century is an article by Professor Huxley entitled, "Agnosticism." It seems that a church congress was held at Manchester in October, 1888, and that the principal of King's College brought the topic of Agnosticism before the assembly and made the following statement:

> But if this be so, for a man to urge as an escape from this article of belief that he has no means of a scientific knowledge of an unseen world, or of the future, is irrelevant. His difference from Christians lies, not in the fact that he has no knowledge of these things, but that he does not believe the authority on which they are stated. He may prefer to call himself an Agnostic, but his real name is an older one—he is an Infidel; that is to say, an unbeliever. The word Infidel, perhaps, carries an unpleasant significauce. Perhaps it is right that it should. It is, and it ought to be, an unpleasant thing for a man to hav to say plainly that he does not believe in Jesus Christ.

Let us examin this statement, putting it in language that is easily understood; and for that purpose we will divide it into several paragraphs.

First.—"For a man to urge that he has no means of a scientific knowledge of the unseen world, or of the future, is irrelevant."

Is there any other knowledge than a scientific knowledge? Are there several kinds of knowing? Is there such a thing as scientific ignorance? If a man says, "I know nothing of the unseen world because I hav no knowledge upon that subject," is the fact that he has no knowledge absolutely irrelevant? Will the principal of King's College say that having no knowledge is the reason he knows? When asked to giv your opinion upon any subject, can it be said that your ignorance of that subject is irrelevant? If this be true, then your knowledge of the subject is also irrelevant.

Is it possible to put in ordinary English a more perfect absurdity? How can a man obtain any knowledge of the unseen world? He certainly can not obtain it through the medium of the senses. It is not a world that he can visit. He cannot stand upon its shores, nor can he view them from the ocean of imagination. The principal of King's College, however, insists that these impossibilities are irrelevant.

No person has come back from the unseen world. No authentic message has been delivered. Through all the centuries, not one whisper has broken the silence that lies beyond the grave. Countless millions hav sought for some evidence, hav listened in vain for some word.

It is most cheerfully admitted that all this does not prove the non-existence of another world—all this does not demonstrate that death ends all. But it is the justification of the Agnostic, who candidly says, "I do not know."

Second.—The principal of King's College states that the difference between an Agnostic and a Christian "lies, not in the fact that he has no knowledge of these things, but that he does not believe the authority on which they are stated."

Is this a difference in knowledge, or a difference in belief—that is to say, a difference in credulity?

The Christian believes the Mosaic account. He reverently hears and admits the truth of all that he finds within the scriptures. Is this knowledge? How is it possible to know whether the reputed authors of the books of the Old Testament were the real ones? The witnesses are dead. The lips that could testify are dust. Between these shores roll the waves of many centuries. Who knows whether such a man as Moses existed or not? Who knows the author of Kings and Chronicles? By what testimony can we substantiate the authenticity of the prophets, or of the prophecies, or of the fulfilments? Is there any difference between the knowledge of the Christian and of the Agnostic? Does the principal of King's College know any more as to the truth of the Old Testament than the man who modestly calls for evidence? Has not a mistake been made? Is not the difference one of belief instead of knowledge? And is not this difference founded on the difference in credulity? Would not an infinitly wise and good being—where belief is a condition to salvation—supply the evidence? Certainly the creator of man—if such exists—knows the exact nature of the human mind—knows the evidence necessary to convince; and, consequently, such a being would act in accordance with such conditions.

There is a relation between evidence and belief. The mind is so constituted that certain things, being in accordance with its nature, are regarded as reasonable, as probable.

There is also this fact that must not be overlooked: that is, that just in the proportion that the brain is developed it requires more evidence, and becomes less and less credulous. Ignorance and credulity go hand in hand. Intelligence understands something of the law of average, has an idea of probability. It is not swayed by prejudice, neither is it driven to extremes by suspicion. It takes into consideration personal motivs. It examins the character of the witnesses, makes allowance for the ignorance of the time—for enthusiasm, for fear—and comes to its conclusion without fear and without passion.

What knowledge has the Christian of another world? The senses of the Christian are the same as those of the Agnostic. He hears, sees, and feels substantially the same. His vision is limited. He sees no other shore and hears nothing from another world.

Knowledge is something that can be imparted. It has a foundation in fact. It comes within the domain of the senses. It can be told, described, analyzed, and, in addition to all this, it can be classified. Whenever a fact becomes the property of one mind, it can become the property of the intellectual world. There are words in which the knowledge can be conveyed.

The Christian is not a supernatural person, filled with supernatural truths. He is a natural person, and all that he knows of value can be naturally imparted. It is within his power to giv all that he has to the Agnostic.

The principal of King's College is mistaken when he says that the difference between the Agnostic and the Christian does not lie in the fact that the Agnostic has no knowledge, "but that he does not believe the authority on which these things are stated."

The real difference is this: the Christian says that he has knowledge; the Agnostic admits that he has none; and yet the Christian accuses the Agnostic of arrogance, and asks him how he has the impudence to admit the limitations of his mind. To the Agnostic every fact is a torch, and by this light, and this light only, he walks.

It is also true that the Agnostic does not believe the authority relied on by the Christian. What is the authority of the Christian? Thousands of years ago it is supposed that certain men, or, rather, uncertain men, wrote certain things. It is alleged by the Christian that these men were divinely inspired, and that the words of these men are to be taken as absolutely true, no matter whether or not they are verified by modern discovery and demonstration.

How can we know that any human being was divinely inspired? There has been no personal revelation to us to the effect that certain people were inspired—it is only claimed that the revelation was to them. For this we hav only their word, and about that there is this difficulty: we know nothing of them, and, consequently, cannot, if we desire, rely upon their character for truth. This evidence is not simply hearsay—it is far weaker than that. We hav only been told that they said these things; we do not know whether the persons claiming to be inspired wrote these things or not; neither are we certain that such persons ever existed. We know now that the greatest men with whom we are acquainted are often mistaken about the simplest matters. We also know that men saying something like the same things, in other countries and in ancient days, must hav been impostors. The Christian has no confidence in the words of Mohammed; the Mohammedan cares nothing about the declarations of Buddha; and the Agnostic givs to the words of the Christian the value only of the truth that is in them. He knows that these sayings get neither truth nor worth from the person who uttered them. He knows that the sayings themselvs get their entire value from the truth they express. So that the real difference between the Christian and the Agnostic does not lie in their knowledge—for neither of them has any knowledge on this subject—but the difference does lie in credulity, and in nothing else. The Agnostic does not rely on the authority of Moses and the prophets. He finds that they were mistaken in most matters capable of demonstration. He finds that their mistakes multiply in the proportion that human knowledge increases. He is satisfied that the religion of the ancient Jews is, in most things, as ignorant and cruel as other religions of the ancient world. He concludes that the efforts, in all ages, to answer the questions of origin and destiny, and to account for the phenomena of life, hav all been substantial failures.

In the presence of demonstration there is no opportunity for the exercise of faith. Truth does not appeal to credulity—it appeals to evidence, to established facts, to the constitution of the mind. It endeavors to harmonize the new fact with all that we know, and to bring it within the circumference of human experience.

The church has never cultivated investigation. It has never said: Let him who has a mind to think, think; but its cry from the first until now has been: Let him who has ears to hear, hear.

The pulpit does not appeal to the reason of the pew; it speaks by authority and it commands the pew to believe, and it not only commands, but it threatens.

The Agnostic knows that the testimony of man is not sufficient to establish what is known as the miraculous. We would not believe to-day the testimony of millions to the effect that the dead had been raised. The church itself would be the first to attack such testimony. If we cannot believe those whom we know, why should we believe witnesses who hav been dead thousands of years, and about whom we know nothing?

Third.—The principal of King's College, growing somewhat severe, declares that "he may prefer to call himself an Agnostic, but his real name is an older one—he is an Infidel; that is to say, an unbeliever."

This is spoken in a kind of holy scorn. According to this gentleman, an unbeliever is, to a certain extent, a disreputable person.

In this sense, what is an unbeliever? He is one whose mind is so constituted that what the Christian calls evidence is not satisfactory to him. Is a person accountable for the constitution of his mind, for the formation of his brain? Is any human being responsible for the weight that evidence has upon him? Can he believe without evidence? Is the weight of evidence a question of choice? Is there such a thing as honestly weighing testimony? Is the result of such weighing necessary? Does it involve moral responsibility? If the Mosaic account does not convince a man that it is true, is he a wretch because he is candid enough to tell the truth? Can he preserve his manhood only by making a false statement?

The Mohammedan would call the principal of King's College an unbeliever—so would the tribes of Central Africa—and he would return the compliment, and all would be equally justified. Has the principal of King's College any knowledge that he keeps from the rest of the world? Has he the confidence of the infinit? Is there anything praiseworthy in believing where the evidence is sufficient, or is one to be praised for believing only where the evidence is insufficient? Is a man to be blamed for not agreeing with his fellow-citizen? Were the unbelievers in the pagan world better or worse than their neighbors? It is probably true that some of the greatest Greeks believed in the gods of that nation, and it is equally true that some of the greatest denied their existence. If credulity is a virtue now, it must hav been in the days of Athens. If to believe without evidence entitles one to eternal reward in this century, certainly the same must hav been true in the days of the Pharaohs.

An Infidel is one who does not believe in the prevailing religion. We now admit that the Infidels of Greece and Rome were right. The gods that they refused to believe in are dead. Their thrones are empty, and long ago the scepters dropped from their nerveless hands. To-day the world honors the men who denied and derided these gods.

Fourth.—The principal of King's College ventures to suggest that "the word Infidel, perhaps, carries an unpleasant significance; perhaps it is right that it should."

A few years ago the word Infidel did carry "an unpleasant significance." A few years ago its significance was so unpleasant that the man to whom the word was applied found himself in prison or at the stake. In particularly kind communities he was put in the stocks, pelted with offal, derided by hypocrits, scorned by ignorance, jeered by cowardice, and all the priests passed by on the other side.

There was a time when Episcopalians were regarded as Infidels; when a true Catholic looked upon a follower of Henry VIII. as an Infidel, as an unbeliever; when a true Catholic held in detestation the man who preferred a murderer and adulterer—a man who swapped religions for the sake of exchanging wives—to the pope, the head of the universal church.

It is easy enough to conceive of an honest man denying the claims of a church based on the caprice of an English king. The word Infidel "carries an unpleasant significance" only where the Christians are exceedingly ignorant, intolerant, bigoted, cruel, and unmannerly.

The real gentleman givs to others the rights that he claims for himself. The civilized man rises far above the bigotry of one who has been "born again." Good breeding is far gentler than "universal love."

It is natural for the church to hate an unbeliever—natural for the pulpit to despise one who refuses to subscribe, who refuses to giv. It is a question of revenue instead of religion. The Episcopal church has the instinct of self-preservation. It uses its power, its influence, to compel contribution. It forgivs the giver.

Fifth.—The principal of King's College insists that "it is, and it ought to be, an unpleasant thing for a man to hav to say plainly that he does not believe in Jesus Christ."

Should it be an unpleasant thing for a man to say plainly what he believes? Can this be unpleasant except in an uncivilized community—a community in which an uncivilized church has authority?

Why should not a man be as free to say that he does not believe as to say that he does believe? Perhaps the real question is whether all men hav an equal right to express their opinions. Is it the duty of the minority to keep silent? Are majorities always right? If the minority had never spoken, what to-day would hav been the condition of this world? Are the majority the pioneers of progress, or does the pioneer, as a rule, walk alone? Is it his duty to close his lips? Must the inventor allow his inventions to die in the brain? Must the discoverer of new truths make of his mind a tomb? Is man under any obligation to his fellows? Was the Episcopal religion always in the majority? Was it at any time in the history of the world an unpleasant thing to be called a Protestant? Did the word Protestant "carry an unpleasant significance?" Was it, "perhaps, right that it should?" Was Luther a misfortune to the human race?

If a community is thoroughly civilized, why should it be an unpleasant thing for a man to express his belief in respectful language? If the argument is against him, it might be unpleasant; but why should simple numbers be the foundation of unpleasantness? If the majority hav the facts—if they hav the argument—why should they fear the mistakes of the minority? Does any theologian hate the man he can answer?

It is claimed by the Episcopal church that Christ was in fact God; and it is further claimed that the New Testament is an inspired account of what that being and his disciples did and said. Is there any obligation resting on any human being to believe this account? Is it within the power of man to determin the influence that testimony shall hav upon his mind?

If one denies the existence of devils, does he, for that reason, cease to believe in Jesus Christ? Is it not possible to imagin that a great and tender soul living in Palestine nearly twenty centuries ago was misunderstood? Is it not within the realm of the possible that his words hav been inaccurately reported? Is it not within the range of the probable that legend and rumor and ignorance and zeal hav deformed his life and belittled his character?

If the man Christ lived and taught and suffered, if he was, in reality, great and noble, who is his friend—the one who attributes to him feats of jugglery, or he who maintains that these stories were invented by zealous ignorance and believed by enthusiastic credulity?

If he claimed to hav wrought miracles, he must hav been either dishonest or insane; consequently, he who denies miracles does what little he can to rescue the reputation of a great and splendid man.

The Agnostic accepts the good he did, the truth he said, and rejects only that which, according to his judgment, is inconsistent with truth and goodness.

The principal of King's College evidently believes in the necessity of belief. He puts conviction or creed or credulity in place of character. According to his idea, it is impossible to win the approbation of God by intelligent investigation and by the expression of honest conclusions. He imagins that the infinit is delighted with credulity, with belief without evidence, faith without question.

Man has but little reason, at best; but this little should be used. No matter how small the taper is, how feeble the ray of light it casts, it is better than darkness, and no man should be rewarded for extinguishing the light he has.

We know now, if we know anything, that man in this, the nineteenth century, is better capable of judging as to the happening of any event than he ever was before. We know that the standard is higher to-day—we know that the intellectual light is greater—we know that the human mind is better equipped to deal with all questions of human interest than at any other time within the known history of the human race.

It will not do to say that "our Lord and his apostles must at least be regarded as honest men." Let this be admitted, and what does it prove? Honesty is not enough. Intelligence and honesty must go hand in hand. We may admit now that "our Lord and his apostles" were perfectly honest men; yet it does not follow that we hav a truthful account of what they said and of what they did. It is not pretended that "our Lord" wrote anything, and it is not known that one of the apostles ever wrote a word. Consequently, the most that we can say is that somebody has written something about "our Lord and his apostles." Whether that somebody knew or did not know is unknown to us. As to whether what is written is true or false, we must judge by that which is written.

First of all, is it probable? is it within the experience of mankind? We should judge of the gospels as we judge of other histories, of other biographies. We know that many biographies written by perfectly honest men are not correct. We know, if we know anything, that honest men can be mistaken, and it is not necessary to believe everything that a man writes because we believe he was honest. Dishonest men may write the truth.

At last the standard or criterion is for each man to judge according to what he believes to be human experience. We are satisfied that nothing more wonderful has happened than is now happening. We believe that the present is as wonderful as the past, and just as miraculous as the future. If we are to believe in the truth of the Old Testament, the word evidence loses its meaning; there ceases to be any standard of probability, and the mind simply accepts or denies without reason.

We are told that certain miracles were performed for the purpose of attesting the mission and character of Christ. How can these miracles be verified? The miracles of the Middle Ages rest upon substantially the same evidence. The same may be said of the wonders of all countries and of all ages. How is it a virtue to deny the miracles of Mohammed and to believe those attributed to Christ?

You may say of St. Augustine that what he said was true or false. We know that much of it was false, and yet we are not justified in saying that he was dishonest. Thousands of errors hav been propagated by honest men. As a rule, mistakes get their wings from honest people. The testimony of a witness to the happening of the impossible gets no weight from the honesty of the witness. The fact that falsehoods are in the New Testament does not tend to prove that the writers were knowingly untruthful. No man can be honest enough to substantiate, to the satisfaction of reasonable men, the happening of a miracle.

For this reason it makes not the slightest difference whether the writers of the New Testament were honest or not. Their character is not involved. Whenever a man rises above his contemporaries, whenever he excites the wonder of his fellows, his biographers always endeavor to bridge over the chasm between the people and this man, and for that purpose attribute to him the qualities which in the eyes of the multitude are desirable.

Miracles are demanded by savages, and, consequently, the savage biographer attributes miracles to his hero. What would we think now of a man who, in writing the life of Charles Darwin, should attribute to him supernatural powers? What would we say of an admirer of Humboldt who should claim that the great German could cast out devils? We would feel that Darwin and Humboldt had been belittled; that the biographies were written for children, and by men who had not outgrown the nursery.

If the reputation of "our Lord" is to be preserved—if he is to stand with the great and splendid of the earth—if he is to continue a constellation in the intellectual heavens, all claim to the miraculous, to the supernatural, must be abandoned.

No one can overestimate the evils that hav been endured by the human race by reason of a departure from the standard of the natural. The world has been governed by jugglery, by sleight-of-hand. Miracles, wonders, tricks hav been regarded as of far greater importance than the steady, the sublime and unbroken, march of cause and effect. The improbable has been established by the impossible. Falsehood has furnished the foundation for faith.

Is the human body at present the residence of evil spirits, or hav these imps of darkness perished from the world? Where are they? If the New Testament establishes anything, it is the existence of innumerable devils, and that these satanic beings absolutely took possesion of the human mind. Is this true? Can anything be more absurd? Does any intellectual man who has examined the question believe that depraved demons liv in the bodies of men? Do they occupy space? Do they liv upon some kind of food? Of what shape are they? Could they be classified by a naturalist? Do they run, or float, or fly? If to deny the existence of these supposed beings is to be an Infidel, how can the word Infidel "carry an unpleasant significance?"

Of course it is the business of the principals of most colleges, as well as of bishops, cardinals, popes, priests, and clergymen, to insist upon the existence of evil spirits. All these gentlemen are employed to counteract the influence of these supposed demons. Why should they take the bread out of their own mouths? Is it to be expected that they will unfrock themselvs?

The church, like any other corporation, has the instinct of self-preservation. It will defend itself; it will fight as long as it has the power to change a hand into a fist.

The Agnostic takes the ground that human experience is the basis of morality. Consequently, it is of no importance who wrote the gospels, or who vouched or vouches for the genuinness of the miracles. In his scheme of life these things are utterly unimportant. He is satisfied that "the miraculous" is the impossible. He knows that the witnesses were wholly incapable of examining the questions involved, that credulity had possession of their minds, that "the miraculous" was expected, that it was their daily food.

All this is very clearly and delightfully stated by Professor Huxley, and it hardly seems possible that any intelligent man can read what he says without feeling that the foundation of all superstition has been weakened. The article is as remarkable for its candor as for its clearness. Nothing is avoided—everything is met. No excuses are given. He has left all apologies for the other side. When you hav finished what Professor Huxley has written, you feel that your mind has been in actual contact with the mind of another, that nothing has been concealed; and not only so, but you feel that this mind is not only willing, but anxious, to know the actual truth.

To me, the highest uses of philosophy are, first, to free the mind of fear, and, second, to avert all the evil that can be averted, through intelligence—that is to say, through a knowledge of the conditions of well-being.

We are satisfied that the absolute is beyond our vision, beneath our touch, above our reach. We are now convinced that we can deal only with phenomena, with relations, with appearances, with things that impress the senses, that can be reached by reason, by the exercise of our faculties. We are satisfied that the reasonable road is "the straight road," the only "sacred way."

Of course there is faith in the world—faith in this world—and always will be, unless superstition succeeds in every land. But the faith of the wise man is based upon facts. His faith is a reasonable conclusion drawn from the known. He has faith in the progress of the race, in the triumph of intelligence, in the coming sovereignty of science. He has faith in the development of the brain, in the gradual enlightenment of the mind. And so he works for the accomplishment of great ends, having faith in the final victory of the race.

He has honesty enough to say that he does not know. He perceives and admits that the mind has limitations. He doubts the so-called wisdom of the past. He looks for evidence, and he endeavors to keep his mind free from prejudice. He believes in the manly virtues, in the judicial spirit, and in his obligation to tell his honest thoughts.

It is useless to talk about a destruction of consolations. That which is suspected to be untrue loses its power to console. A man should be brave enough to bear the truth.

Professor Huxley has stated with great clearness the attitude of the Agnostic. It seems that he is somewhat severe on the Positiv Philosophy. While it is hard to see the propriety of worshiping Humanity as a being, it is easy to understand the splendid dream of Auguste Comte. Is the human race worthy to be worshiped by itself—that is to say, should the individual worship himself? Certainly the Religion of Humanity is better than the religion of the inhuman. The Positiv Philosophy is better far than Catholicism. It does not fill the heavens with monsters, nor the future with pain.

It may be said that Luther and Comte endeavored to reform the Catholic church. Both were mistaken, because the only reformation of which the church is capable is destruction. It is a mass of superstition.

The mission of Positivism is, in the language of its founder, "to generalize science and to systematize sociality." It seems to me that Comte stated with great force and absolute truth the three phases of intellectual evolution or progress.

First—"In the supernatural phase the mind seeks causes—aspires to know the essence of things, and the how and why of their operation. In this phase, all facts are regarded as the productions of supernatural agents, and unusual phenomena are interpreted as the signs of the pleasure or displeasure of some god."

Here at this point is the orthodox world of to-day. The church still imagins that phenomena should be interpreted as the signs of the pleasure or displeasure of God. Nearly every history is deformed with this childish and barbaric view.

Second.—The next phase or modification, according to Comte, is the metaphysical. "The supernatural agents are dispensed with, and in their places we find abstract forces or entities supposed to inhere in substances and capable of engendering phenomena."

In this phase people talk about laws and principles as though laws and principles were forces capable of producing phenomena.

Third.—"The last stage is the Positiv. The mind, convinced of the futility of all inquiry into causes and essences, restricts itself to the observation and classification of phenomena, and to the discovery of the invariable relations of succession and similitude—in a word, to the discovery of the relations of phenomena."

Why is not the Positiv stage the point reached by the Agnostic? He has ceased to inquire into the origin of things. He has perceived the limitations of the mind. He is thoroughly convinced of the uselessness, and futility, and absurdity of theological methods, and restricts himself to the examination of phenomena, to their relations, to their effects, and endeavors to find in the complexity of things the true conditions of human happiness.

Although I am not a believer in the philosophy of Auguste Comte, I cannot shut my eyes to the value of his thought; neither is it possible for me not to applaud his candor, his intelligence, and the courage it required even to attempt to lay the foundation of the Positiv Philosophy.

Professor Huxley and Frederic Harrison are splendid soldiers in the army of progress. They hav attacked with signal success the sacred and solemn stupidities of superstition. Both hav appealed to that which is highest and noblest in man. Both hav been the destroyers of prejudice. Both hav shed light, and both hav won great victories on the fields of intellectual conflict. They cannot afford to waste time in attacking each other.

After all, the Agnostic and the Positivist hav the same end in view—both believe in living for this world.

The theologians, finding themselvs unable to answer the arguments that hav been urged, resort to the old subterfuge—to the old cry that Agnosticism takes something of value from the life of man. Does the Agnostic take any consolation from the world? Does he blot out, or dim, one star in the heaven of hope? Can there be anything more consoling than to feel, to know, that Jehovah is not God—that the message of the Old Testament is not from the Infinit?

Is it not enough to fill the brain with a happiness unspeakable to know that the words, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire," will never be spoken to one of the children of men?

Is it a small thing to lift from the shoulders of industry the burdens of superstition? Is it a little thing to drive the monster of fear from the hearts of men? ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

We fully appreciate the fact, and hope it will be recognized by members of the American Secular Union, that our "Roll of Honor" is not merely a high-sounding phrase of no sterling significance, but that it is an honor of which they should be proud, to be identified as promoters of one of the grandest movements of the nineteenth century for mental emancipation. and whose activity is curtailed for lack of funds. Liberals who generously sustain the Union are not prompted by a desire to see their names in print, but are sufficiently intelligent to realize the dangers which threaten and the only means by which they can be averted. Some appear in the "Roll of Honor," I presume, not only for the good the funds may do but to inspire others to go and do likewise. Certainly that must be the purpose of the venerable publisher of the Boston Investigator, Josiah P. Mendum, a gentleman of exceptional ability and broadest culture, whose munificent gift of $60 worth of books, accompanied by the following letter of encouragement, was one of the most pleasurable experiences of our life:

BOSTON, MASS., March 4, 1889.

MR E. A. STEVENS, Dear Sir: In due appreciation of your services to the cause of Liberalism, as evidenced by the warfare you are waging against the Catholic hierarchy in the courts of Chicago, I beg you to accept the accompanying bill of books, which I trust you will be able to dispose of among your associates to your pecuniary advantage. Mr. Washburn has collected quite a little sum among the Liberals of this city, to which I would hav contributed did I not think that, by this method—a consignment of books—you could net more than my cash contribution would hav amounted to.

Hoping you will be able to realize a good return from the books, which are expressed to you to-day, prepaid, and wishing you every success in your struggle with the church, I remain, Very truly yours, J. P. MENDUM.

We assure friend Mendum that these valuable works will be appreciated by the Liberals, as they are by the secretary, with the warmest thanks and deepest gratitude, and we hope that there will be lively competition among our well-wishers to buy these books, and thus put the cash in the treasury. We are pleased to learn that Brother Mendum's intellect is still undimmed, his analytical powers as keen and judgment as sound as in the days of youth. As the poet says:

E'en in our ashes liv their wonted fires.

We extend a hearty fraternal greeting and hope that many years of activ service are yet in store for him. Long liv the founder of Paine Hall and the proprietor of the grand old Investigator!

Our famous champion and eloquent advocate, Vice-President L K. Washburn, is still in the van. He is a heroic soul. The old Bay state has reason to be proud of her gifted son. May he long be spared to the great cause to which he has devoted himself, for his name will ever be a beacon to guide man from the perilous coasts of error to the clear haven of secular truth. From him we hav received this all-too flattering heading with the names and sums which are given above:

Recognizing the great work which E. A. Stevens, as secretary of the American Secular Union, has done and is doing, for the cause of political and religious freedom in this country, and desiring to testify our appreciation and approbation of such work, we, the undersigned, subscribe the respectiv sums affixed to our names to be used by him, as secretary of the American Secular Union, as he may deem best to promote the cause of Secularism in the United States.

The Modern Athens justifies in the cause of Secularism the prestige she has so justly won in other fields.

Again, just like him, Photius Fisk heads the list, for this earth was never blessed with a more devoted and generous soul. Laden with labors of love for his fellow-men, even though bent with years and, I believe, seldom free from ailment, he still thinks and acts in a manner which speaks louder than words for the benefit of the race. He espoused the Abolition movement when his fellow-ministers regarded him as a dangerous fanatic. But by persisting in bravely defending his position he became the friend of John Quincy Adams, Gerrit Smith, and Joshua R. Giddings. When living in his nativ Greece news reached him of the great Chicago fire, and he cabled his friend, Wendell Phillips, "Use my money for the suffering as though your own." He has the most generous impulses ever implanted in man, and a heart as large as human needs.

Jonathan Stone gladdens our heart and replenishes the treasury at the same time, thus killing two birds with one stone, as it were. Mr. Stone is a zealous upholder of the Nine Demands, as is also Russell Marston, who nobly responds to the appeal. To those generous friends Ernst Mendum, Mr. O'Connor, Palmer, Fairbanks, Foster, Rush, and the Mesdames Kendall and Harris, the former of whom we hav had the honor of hearing from in the same manner—to all this noble band of exemplars, each and every one, we extend, in fancy, the right hand of fellowship, regretting that our space is limited, and it would be impossible to greet each individually as we would wish.

Our old friend and stanch ally of the Pacific coast writes us a most inspiring letter, and, as our readers may see, by no means an empty one. Brother Parsons believes, in the language of scripture, that "faith without works is dead," so, notwithstanding his advanced age and the indifference and lukewarmness of many professed Liberals by whom he is surrounded, he is constantly exerting himself to the utmost to spread our principles and combat organized error. Within a very short time he has contributed in various ways nearly $50 to Liberalism—a record that ought to inspire others with the spirit of emulation.

Many of those who respond most promptly and generously to our appeals or their pledges, are those who, from a pecuniary standpoint. can ill afford to do so, and whose contributions necessitate considerable self sacrifice. To this class of contributors the Liberal lecturers must surely belong, and Brother J. H. Burnham, as well as Mr. Washburn, doubly deserve our thanks and esteem. As Courtlandt Palmer said, "No man in the Liberal ranks has made greater sacrifices than Brother Burnham." It is doubtful if as great. From the pastor of a popular church built especially for him, he steps down and out, fully aware of the rugged path he would hav to travel, and in face of all difficulties defends our cause with an ardor, courage, and enthusiasm which cannot but inspire the weak and wavering souls. He has just returned from a six weeks' lecture engagement in Toronto, where, I am informed, he met with unusual success. Brother Burnham's sterling honesty, patient effort, oratory, and genial manners hav endeared him to all Secularists. He has few equals and no rivals. Success to him.

Vice-President Willis communicates, and in him we recognize a kindred spirit. His letters are always full of practical suggestions. His letter-heads are Radical tracts, appealing for "justice, liberty, and equal rights." He is one who having "put his hand to the plow" will not "look back." Dr. Willis will not grow weary in the battle for freedom. He also expresses a desire to follow up his generous contributions by an encore during the year. For the sake of the cause, and not because we attach any undue importance to money per se, we trust his desire may be abundantly realized.

We take pleasure in acknowledging an interesting letter from one of our noble women co-workers, Charlotte Palm, who, though contending with chronic ill health and the disadvantage of an exclusiv. orthodox community, still holds aloft the torch of Liberalism, and cheerfully contributes to the work of Secular propaganda. We trust that ere long circumstances will deal more kindly with our friend, and that with congenial surroundings and restored health she may triumphantly carry the "palm" of victory in the front files of the Secular cohorts.

A few earnest, welcome words of encouragement from F. Portugal accompany his contribution, and assurance that he will endeavor to assist still further in the near future. This is the proper spirit. We trust our friend's determination will be shared by all those who hav not enjoyed seeing their names among the donors. Nothing succeeds like success.

Thomas Burk's efforts in the cause of Secularism are too widely known to need comment. He is always full of practical, matter-of-fact ideas. He has been letting "his light shine" with good results. We are proud of them and him also—both of whom we hold in grateful remembrance. Mr. Burk informs us he will not be able to "look after our cause" till next winter. We regret this, as so valiant a soldier can scarcely be granted so long a furlough. He and the donors hav our sincere thanks and best wishes.

Cheering words come from the venerable P. F. Spencer. who has more than filled out the allotted span. He reads THE TRUTH SEEKER and declares he intends to keep on as long as he can read. He contributes $1 to the Bruno monument, and $1 to the American Secular Union. We trust he may celebrate his one-hundredth birthday.

Friend Cochran sent us $1 with which to scatter Judge Waite's pamphlet on the Blair bills at our discretion. Many thanks. That is the way to create public opinion.

Wm. Smith, of Geneva, N. Y., sent for $5 worth of pamphlets. He is bound to go into the matter wholesale. A few more such Secular soldiers would rout an army of bigots like Blair. We can count on the opposition of Geneva to the puritanical Sunday law.

ST. LOUIS FREIE GEMEINDE.

By invitation of this splendid, progressiv German organization, founded in 1850, the oldest in the United States, and for many long years a Liberal oasis in an almost impenetrable desert of conservatism, I spoke Sunday afternoon and evening, March 31st, on the Blair conspiracy against the republic and the work of the American Secular Union.

The social and religious status of St. Louis life would form an interesting study, even if not remarkably encouraging. Founded under Spanish domination that left an impress of Romanism which is readily recognized, followed by the old French period still more strongly implanting conservativ characteristics, it is little wonder that during ante bellum days it and its state were nearly secured by the the boastful slaveocrats to the "lost cause." Paying a visit to the Planters' House, I readily recalled the bloody "affairs of honor" and assassinations said to hav disgraced this now quiet, but eminently conservativ, hostelry, stripped as it now is of its ancient glory as chief resort of the Southern slaveholding grandees.

The proprietor reluctantly submits to change, and a great painting of a Romish cathedral hangs defiantly as the principal picture in his reception room, in proof, as it were, that a good Catholic must, as a matter of course, hate the modern heresy of social and political equality. The shadows of slave days are falling off by degrees in the new order of things, and the principal factor in this metamorphosis was the infusion of Teutonic love of liberty and intelligence, for the Germans are certainly the schoolmasters of the world. They planted themselves here, grew gigantically, and saved Missouri to the Union, and possibly the Union itself, for who can estimate the result had this state sided with the Confederacy? This patriotic work can largely be ascribed to German Freethought, and as the St. Louis Freie Gemeinde holds the proud distinction of founder of this class of organizations, its record of nearly forty years is filled with honorable efforts to maintain and extend the principle of liberty—political, civil, and religious. As a school for moral and physical training it is unsurpassed, and it takes the initiativ on Freethought matters in St. Louis. Wm. Peterson, a fine, typical German gentleman, holds the honored post of president, and is deservedly popular. The institution's intellectual life is well attended to by Treasurer Aug. Hoffmann—whose father served as its secretary till his death—who received his superior education within its walls, and is just the sort of worthy son such a noble Freethought society would naturally produce. It numbers among its members some of St. Louis's best citizens. Owing to election excitement, rain, and distance from central portion of the city, the lectures were not well attended, although they had been largely advertised. Apathy and indifference is unfortunately to a large degree characteristic of those who should sustain our cause in St. Louis. Those who failed to attend their spacious hall, which will seat two thousand people, missed a rare musical treat Sunday night. Professors Schilling—father and son—each rendered a solo, one on the violin, the other on the flute, with piano accompaniment, and all the mellifluous melody I ever heard on the flute, the elder Schilling certainly eclipsed by his performance. Their well trained mannenchor of about twenty five voices, under the leadership of Professor Schilling the younger, made the rafters resound with glorious songs of freedom. An acute attack of bronchitis made it difficult for me to speak, and doubtless distressing to my audience, but an array of important facts were presented, and reorganization attempted, the former society having only an abortiv existence. My anticipations were largely founded on the fact that one of the most learned and talented Liberals, Dr. Gray, now resides at 1454 Wright street—one whose classic poems and admirable philosophical articles hav charmed and instructed thousands of Freethinkers under the sobriquet of "Zoa Topsis." With his talents, judgment, and enthusiasm, I feel more hopeful of the future of Secularism in St. Louis. Mr. Sidney A. Rendl, a teacher of "fonetics," and who spells his name in that way; the Stender brothers, Miss Stella Campbell, Mr. Barihar am, and others will form an important guard to the Nine Demands. C. L. Haskell, the well-known contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER and lecturer, is now in St. Louis, and will doubtless devote his talents to the upbuilding of the organization.

Our friend Hoffman, who is a near neighbor of Dr. Gray, has promised that the Freie Gemeinde will aid the organization in every way, and it can call on them for any assistance, and under their fostering care its success should be assured. We expect that "Zoa Topsis" will be as great a success in the practical work as he has been in the theoretical and literary field, and raise a good crop of Secularists in this heretofore unpromising field.

Among those I met in the Mound city was Chas. W. Caines, of Manchester, Mo., a TRUTH SEEKER reader, a cultivated gentleman, and a member of the Ethical society.

Professor and Mrs. Barricelli, editors of Progress, are people of unusual capacity—the lady a fine conversationalist and acute thinker; the professor an Italian poet of importance, and conversant with most European languages. Strange to see an Italian correcting the English of his American contributors.

My old friend and associate on one of the Rochester, N. Y., dailies, is Edward A. Clifton, now editing the new industrial daily, the New Order, which to some extent is the successor of a paper your secretary edited in St. Louis ten years ago. "Cliff" is a bright, brilliant, versatil newspaper man and a hustler. May he liv long and prosper.

Another chum and worker in the labor cause was Fred. Swaine. Fred has got a handle to his name now, "Hon." Hope he will break into Congress soon.

Had a pleasant visit with a lady of considerable intelligence, Mrs. Pike, whose daughter, our accomplished Mrs. Gruber, proves the influence of heredity.

St. Louis is branching out in metropolitan grandeur, and few cities hav made greater architectural progress in a single decade. The central portion of the city is blessed with granit pavement and the detestable limestone is being rapidly replaced, and when the city gets through with the election, and over its "pigs in clover puzzle," it can probably settle down to mundane matters. As an instance of perverted influences, we find that it still glories in the health-giving qualities of its muddy water.

E. A. STEVENS. Sec. A. S. U.

Our London Letter.

Thanks to the pertinacity of Mrs. Besant, who was well supported by other Liberal-minded members of the London school board, the prohibition to lecture and write on Freethought has at last been removed, and Mr. A. B. Moss is now at liberty to labor publicly in the cause he holds dear. This will be a decided gain to the party, as he is an activ and energetic laborer in the vineyard. Beyond this particular advantage, it givs a good indication of the advance being made in the extension of Liberal ideas. It must hav been a bitter pill for the chairman, Rev. J. Diggle, to swallow, as he was chairman of the board who passed the veto, and is greatly shocked at the name of Secularism. At the next election it is not improbable that this behind the-time parson and his followers may be relegated to the obscurity they would so much better adorn, and with a majority of sensible members, children will not be required to waste their time in learning clerical fables.

Messrs. Watts & Co. hav sent me a parcel of brochures treating of Agnosticism and kindred subjects, written by men who are well qualified to write on such matters—Laing, Bithell, "Julian." "Lara," and "G. M. McC.," all well known as contributors to the Secular Review at various times. These excellent text-books are well printed on good paper and should command an extensiv circulation. Mr. C. A. Watts is steadily extending his list of publications of contributions to Freethought literature, and if he continues much longer in the same ratio as during the last year or two, will hav to extend his business premises. His Literary Guide I hav had from the first number, and find it a very welcome and useful monthly.

Mr. Foote has announced his intention of increasing the size of the Freethinker, which is undoubtedly a good sign of appreciation on the part of subscribers, and should be the means of extending the circulation. The "Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers," by Mr. J. M. Wheeler, promises to be a valuable work of reference, filling as it does a place hitherto unoccupied. Such a work must entail great labor of research, but it could not be in better hands for that reason. The only drawback is the time that must in consequence elapse before its completion.

The Radical, edited and published by Mr. G. Standring, deserves a wide circulation, and its closer attention to Freethought topics should assist it in that direction. The editor's "Historical Sketch of Freethought in England" is of considerable interest, and might well be continued for some time to come.

I hav just been reading "Robert Elsmere" by Mrs. H. Ward, and from the reviews I had seen of the book was led to believe it a very wonderful work. I must confess to having been somewhat disappointed. It is far too voluminous, and might, with advantage, be "boiled down" considerably. In my humble opinion Mrs. Lynn Linton's "Under Which Lord?" is far beyond it. None of the characters are particularly attractiv, the religious ones are very narrow-minded, and the more Liberal ones are not excessivly so; they all hav the supernatural bogey to frighten them. Until I read the book I was under the impression it recorded the path from Christianity to Agnosticism, but it appears the hero only got as far as Unitarianism when he died. If it took six hundred closely printed pages to describe that journey, I wonder how many it would hav taken to hav carried him to Atheism.

It is generally reported that Mr. Spurgeon is a very humble individual who devotes all his salary to works of charity, but if a report I saw in a newspaper a few days back be correct, he livs in very grand style, and a year's expenditure would hav sufficed to hav kept the whole Christian church in early times in comparativ affluence. I wonder if he ever thinks it would be more consistent to his professions to liv in the same style as the apostles he pretends to admire, and minister freely to the necessities of the needy saints attending his tabernacle. I never heard that he ever proposed throwing all his wealth into the common stock, so that all could share alike. He is about as sincere in this respect as in his implicit faith in the watchfulness of God over those who believe and love him, which he so well proves by his periodical visits to Mentone in search of health. J. D.

Is Man Morally Responsible?

It is an axiom of philosophy that two like objects will act the same, if acted upon by similar forces under the same conditions.

Now let us take two men. They do not act alike Then it follows that one of two things is true—either that they were not alike when born, or that they were not acted upon by the same forces. If they were not born alike, it is not their fault, and neither is responsible for not being like the other, though one may be a criminal and the other a philanthropist. On the other hand, if they were born alike, then they were acted upon by different forces, and neither is responsible, for they cannot control the forces that act upon them. In either case, man is not responsible.

It seems, then, that character and morality depend entirely upon two things—the accident of birth and the circumstances of life; so we are forced to the opinion of a modern philosopher that "man is as he must be." This may seem all wrong, but if you reason, the conclusion is inevitable.

"Yes," says the Christian, "but man is not a machine. He is a free moral agent, and can do right or wrong, as he desires."

True, man is a free agent, and being such, he will necessarily make some use of his freedom. Then do not conditions and circumstances decide what that use shall be? And if it be a bad use, is the man responsible?

Of course man can do as he desires to do, but if something else controls his desires, he is really as much of a machine as a wheelbarrow, and while he may fancy himself a free agent, he is only free to execute the commands of outside forces. He is only a tool, and desire is the motiv power that makes him act.

The psychological fallacy of man's moral responsibility is the foundation upon which metaphysicians hav built structures of sophistry sky-high; but modern thought is shivering the frail shams to atoms. WILLIAM SCOTT.

Editorial Notes.

A VERY good book to giv to Christians—especially Methodists—to set them to thinking about the truth or falsity of their theological scheme is a little ten-cent pamphlet which we hav just published for Israel W. Groh, entitled, "Did Man Fall?" Mr. Groh considers in detail the statements made in Genesis concerning the garden of Eden, and locates the place where according to scripture the garden must hav been, concluding with an offer of $5.000 "to the person or persons who will make it possible for excursionists to visit Eden and see the garden with all its points of interest" Mr. Groh thinks, and not illogically, that the clergy should spend their vacations exploring the garden, giving the results to their congregations, or even leading their lambs to the hallowed spot in order to convince them of the truth of the theological scheme of man's fall that he might be redeemed. At present many doubt the need of redemption because of the uncertainty of a previous fall. These doubts will be at once removed if the garden can be visited and the tree of life and the cherubim and the blazing sword pointed out. The reward offered is in the interest of Christianity, and the public spirit exhibited by Mr. Groh will no doubt be appreciated by zealous church-members—Methodists especially. Price, 10 cents; sold at this office.

THE Rev. Charles Locke, of Pittsburgh, Pa., evidently has not recovered from the effects of the Liberal gathering in his city last fall. On a recent Sunday he reared up in his pulpit and told his herd what a bad thing Liberalism is. Liberalism, he brayed, is the most slavish, the most contemptibly narrow, the most contracted thing on earth! Why! came in splitting force from the pulpit, Liberalism would even erase from our national escutcheon the motto of our fathers, "In God we trust!" Heinous as is this charge, Liberalism, according to Mr. Locke, is open to worse. Liberalism gave birth to the French Revolution! "Liberalism makes men moral cowards! Liberalism leads to despair and suicide! Liberalism builds no universities! Liberalism carries on no great philanthropic enterprises!" And so on to the end of the same old chapter that all hav read, and everybody knows to be a chapter of ministerial romance. An angry friend in sending us the report of the sermon, writes, "See how the damned scoundrel can lie. Wish you would dissect the man!" But what is the use of wasting more time with such an ignoramus? Our friend would not go out of his way to kick a cur snarling in an adjoining town, and there is nothing to be gained by breaking into Locke's stable and feeding him thistles till he ceases braying. Even thistles hav a slight value.

Man's Worship Always of Himself.

Alastor in Secular Thought.

The other day, while reading Sir Richard Burton's remarkable translation of "The Thousand Nights and a Night" I came across a note written by the learned translator which might be of interest to Frederick Harrison and his friends. If Captain Burton is right, "Comteism"—or what is understood when the term is used—is somewhat older than the last generation, and the religion is rather more widely spread than the wildest adherent of the French philosopher would probably claim. "The more," says Burton, "I study religions the more I am convinced that man never worshiped anything but himself. Zeus, who became Jupiter, was an ancient king, according to the Cretans, who were entitled liars because they showed his burial-place. From a deified ancestor, who would become a local god, like the Hebrew Jehovah as opposed to Chemosh of Moab, the name would gain amplitude by long time and distant travel and the old island chieftain would end by becoming the Demyurgus. Ganymede (who possibly gave rise to the old Latin Calamitus) was probably some fair Phrygian boy who in process of time became a symbol of the wise man seized by the eagle to be raised among the Immortals; and the chaste myth simply signified that only the prudent are loved by the gods. But it rotted with age as do all things human." Elsewhere Sir Richard treats with contempt many of the scripture stories. His learning, vast and varied as it is, has undoubtedly placed him in the Agnostic ranks.

Able Books and Able Paper.

From the Union Printer.

We are indebted to the Truth Seeker Company for copies of recent works. "The Limitations of Toleration" is presented in pamphlet form at the reasonable price of ten cents. It is the famous discussion on this topic by Colonel Ingersoll, Frederic R. Coudert, and Stewart L. Woodford, and will amply repay a careful perusal "Did Man Fall?" is the title of a very able essay by Israel W. Groh, and "Pioneer Pith," by Robert C. Adams, embraces the gist of his celebrated discourses on Rationalism. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the leading journal of Freethought in this country, and able contributors are being constantly added to its already large staff. It is published at 28 Lafayette place, this city, where copies of the above-mentioned works may be obtained.

Friendly, free discussion calling forth
From the fair jewel, truth, its latent ray.

The discussion, I believe, sir, is now between you and me, and I opine that, in view of yours of December 29th ult., a defense of Mrs. Slenker from your pen is not only inopportune but unwise. Let the "dead past bury its dead," for Mrs. Slenker has the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER open to her if she should deem that any of my remarks need explanation.

Even as a young man the prurient had few charms for me, and now as I am verging on fifty it has, if possible, still less. Consequently I shall decline to entertain such a subject, whether started by Mrs. Slenker or anyone else.

I hav frequently noticed while watching a discussion that the weaker party branches off from the regular line, hoping thereby either to cover his inability to grapple with the subject, or to distract the attention of his opponent; so, while heartily sympathizing with you in your efforts in behalf of a lone woman, yet I must beg to draw you back to the line of argument between us.

I regret that your "Chips" forces me to a recapitulation of your various articles, as it seems to favor the idea that I forced you into this controversy, instead of, as is the fact, that you forced yourself into it.

Under heading "An Old Story," published in the November 24th issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, you circulated a series of calumnies against Spiritualism, and uttered them in such a tone that one would hav thought you had thoroughly experimented with every phase of the phenomena, and could not only prove them false, but that their believers were a set of deluded asses.

"Are these deponents," you ask, "in such mental condition that their testimony is to be received without any criticism?"

Having set up your man of straw you then knock him down with: "This is to giv all the advantage to fools and knaves, or if this is too harsh, to persons who are abnormal, whose faculties are aberrant."

A shudder ran through the entire Spiritualistic community on reading this, and many "ghost-mongers" felt to return thanks because you spared their feelings further by adding: "I do not wish to speak unkindly of these poor creatures," for (Baker) was in logic a great critic,

Profoundly skilled in analytic.
He could distinguish and divide
A hair 'twixt south and southwest side.

Well, from this and similar articles I supposed that you carried a "chip on the shoulder" which you were anxious to hav some Spiritualist knock off, and I volunteered to attend to the job and notified you accordingly.

So, under date of March 2d, I published an account of two sittings held with Dr. Slade, stated them as clearly and concisely as possible, and calmly awaited your explanation.

Being a well-known "ghost-monger," I desired that my personal character should not be called into question, so I invited three well-known and highly respectable gentlemen to be present at the first sitting; and at the second the Editor of this paper, who had also been present at the first, and myself, were the only persons present.

You will pardon me for stating right here that I consider E. M. Macdonald to be as clear and level-headed a man as I number in my list of friends. A pronounced Materialist, he could in no way be connected with Spiritualism or its claims, and the article was carefully read by him and pronounced to be correct before it was published in the columns of his paper.

It would be difficult to describe my feelings as I opened my TRUTH SEEKER containing what you style your answer, "Chips." I felt it was not "impossible" that the omniscient Baker had exploded the whole fraud, and those cherished hopes of mine, built on what I had chosen to consider experience, of many and many a year, had been shattered by one stroke of his pen.

But what did I find? Nothing but quibbling.

There had been presented an array of facts which Mr. Baker had pronounced as "impossible," and whose advocates he had attempted to stamp as "fools." Not an argument, not a counter-statement, nothing but a play on words.

I at first thought some joke had been perpetrated on the Editor by the insertion of an article from some other pen, but on a rereading I determined that it was a genuin article, and that the author was "not merely a chip of the old block, but the old block itself."

Candidly, I had looked for better things from you after all you had written, and really felt disappointed.

Now, my dear Mr. Baker, from obvious reasons, doubly dear since this article has appeared, as I now feel that my cherished hopes are not doomed to annihilation, at least from your pen, let us attend strictly to business, that is to say, provided you mean business.

You hav been calling for "facts," and I hav given them. Never mind theories. It is true that the moon may be made of green cheese, or it is even possible, as Washington Irving says, that the inhabitant thereof may wear his head under his arm. But we are dealing with neither of these subjects—we are treating of facts, cold facts. I don't desire to theorize as yet. I hate theories when they interfere with facts.

Ingersoll, the Chevalier Bayard of Freethought, sans peur et sans reproche, laughs at theories and deals out facts; consequently, he is irresistible. Now, as a Freethinker, an admirer and possibly a follower of that noble man, why can you not treat this subject in the same manner? Why treat Spiritualism and its claims only with quibbles, and reserve your "facts" for Christianity?

Does this not lay you open to the suspicion of having no counter-facts to present?

Facts are ugly customers to controvert. Theories never can successfully oppose them. So, let us argue this matter honestly. If you hav made a mistake in your assertions, as I honestly believe you hav, and moreover think you will discover if you only review your articles, then come out like a man and admit it.

An honest admission disarms an adversary, and that you do not know everything, though it may be humiliating to your pride, is no personal fault, for it is common to humanity.

"He loads the dice against himself who scores a point against the right," says Ingersoll, and Cicero, whom both of us honor, wrote, "I am not ashamed, as most men are, to confess my ignorance of what I do not know."

So, I repeat again, let us keep closely to the line of argument, and I await with anxiety your confession, or a conclusiv proof either that the sittings did not take place or that all the sitters were "aberrant."

Now a few lines to Mr. Priestley in regard to his letter of February 16th.

I regret, sir, that my advocacy of a "fact" should draw your wrath down upon me. But I am so constituted that I must continue my advocacy of that fact until it has been proved that I am mistaken.

I hav no theory so cherished that I would not abandon it on its fallacy being proved. But argument is necessary; neither sarcasm, double entente, nor calumny can accomplish that result.

Let me ask you a question. Hav you ever read anything from my pen in advocacy of the "ghost theory?" But, per contra, hav I not distinctly stated that from my standpoint Spiritualism had no ghosts, "either holy or otherwise?"

Therefore, why the lament? "And this, alas, is McArthur! This is the distinguished Freethinker of whom we were so proud, and whose fame had extended across two oceans!"

Now, let us examin this—not that I agree with you in regard to my reputation, for I do not deserve it—but, to compare us, as man to man.

In one of your letters to Mrs. Ritchie you remarked in proof of your evolution theory that Bucephalus, the horse of Alexander the Great, had rudimentary toes, or, in other words, was a pliohippus.

I do not object to this assertion. It may be true; it may be false. It can neither be proved nor disproved. But it does seem strange to me that a man of your mentality—surely, far above the average—should, for his basic proposition of a theory, rely on ancient testimony of an uncertain character, and, when a live question such as Spiritualism comes to the fore, accuse a fellow-laborer of having lost his wits, because he advocates the Spiritual theory from facts within his own personal knowledge.

We—that is, you and I—seem to hav different ideas in regard to the meaning of our corps badge, Infidel.

I agree with S. P. Putnam, who, in a recent article in Freethought, said: "The true Infidel is he who accepts no finality. He will always inquire, for he will always believe that there is a new and better way. Infidelity, therefore, is not a passing phase of humanity, but a permanent necessity. There must be eternal search and eternal questioning."

Both of us, sir, are Infidels, and both of us should be inquirers. I am seeking the truth and am willing to credit you with the same desire. I present my "facts" just as they come to me, and would it not be wiser and better for you to disprove them first before slinging mud?

Simply because you do not understand a proposition, is the proposer a fool?

Now, if Mr. Priestley can advance any sound, sensible argument against the Spiritual phenomena, as per the facts I hav already published, I am prepared to giv him a respectful hearing. But, if his criticism is to be based on his want of knowledge or indisposition to investigate, and consequent inability to accept, then I must decline taking the time to answer him.

The Church—Its Moral Status.

The fourth century marked an important epoch in the history of the church. It then impressed itself for evil on the entire Eastern world. The conversion of Constantine and his instalment as the head of the Christian hierarchies, wrought a wonderful change. The church, under the direction of its imperial leader, made a new departure. Its attitude, previous to the conversion of Constantine, had been submissiv and persuasiv, but, under Constantine, an alliance was found between the cross and the sword, and Saome Jenyns—a celebrated Christian writer—informs us that, under Constantine, "nations were converted by the sword, and converts to Christianity were baptized with daggers at their throats." But who was Constantine, heralded by the church orator and Christian historian as the "first great, royal patron of Christianity?" As to the character of this man, the secular and church historians widely differ.

Eusebius, the great ecclesiastical writer, in referring to Constantine, passes on him the following eulogy: "I am annoyed when I contemplate such singular goodness and piety. Moreover, when I look up to heaven and behold his blessed soul living in God's presence, and vested with an unfading wreath of immortality—considering this, I am oppressed with silent amazement, and my weakness makes me dumb, resigning his encomiums to almighty God, who alone can giv to Constantine the praise he merits." On reading this eulogy of a church historian in relation to the character of this first royal patron of the church, one would be forced to conclude that he was a veritable saint, in fact. This high commendation of Constantine is worthy of the arch Christian forger and prevaricator who wrote it. No man, but one who believed that it was a virtue to lie for the glory of God and the advancement of the church, would hav been guilty of so gross and willful a perversion of the truth. Now for the facts as to the character of this first great royal convert of Christianity. He murdered his two brothers-in-law, husbands of his sisters, Constantia and Anatasia, and also murdered his father-in-law, Maximian Hercules. He drowned his wife, Fausta, to death in a boiling bath, and beheaded his son, Crispus. He also put to death his nephew, Licinius, a boy only twelve years old. And this old, red-handed monster—an incarnate fiend—is the subject for high eulogies at the hands of church historians and the Christian clergy.

Dr. John Draper informs us that the personal history of the sons of Constantine is an awful relation of family murders—fit sons of such a son—and yet Eusebius was dumb for want of words to praise this illustrious saint, and resigned his encomiums to God almighty. Dr. Draper, in referring to the councils and religious assemblies of the fourth century, discloses "that the horrible bloodshed and murders attending these religious quarrels in the great cities showed that Christianity could not control the passions of men. Religion had disappeared, theology had gone mad, and Macedonens, bishop of Constantinople, passed over the slaughtered bodies of three thousand people to reach his episcopal throne" (Draper's Intellectual Development of Europe, page 214).

When the church thus obtained dominant power the Eastern world, under its blighting influence, experienced twelve hundred years of intellectual and moral night. Ignorance, oppression, cruelty, and wrong held universal sway. "Throughout the East men in terror burnt their libraries to save themselvs and families from destruction." Thus did the vandal hand of the church seek to destroy the grand discoveries of science, and the literature of the world. The famous library in the temple of Serapis at Alexandria, containing six hundred and fifty thousand volumes, the representativ literature of the world, was wantonly burnt by a Christian archbishop, Theopolis, and by the order of a Christian emperor, Theodosius. The instructions of the emperor were significant: "If the contents of the library are contradictory to the Bible, burn it. If it accords with the Bible, burn it, as the Bible is all-sufficient." The Christian Crusaders burnt the great Tripolitan library in Algiers, containing three hundred thousand volumes. Dr. Draper thinks the destruction of these two libraries alone set the world back a thousand years in its progressiv march, and yet in the face of these facts that should cover Christianity with that lasting infamy it so richly deserves, its ignorant or dishonest devotees will claim for it all the intellectual advancement made by the civilized world. The Jesuit Question in Canada.

Goldwin Smith in the Independent.

When public men in the United States hav spoken to me with indifference of Canada and her affairs, as they usually hav, I hav told them that if they did not take care trouble, as it had come to them from the South, would some day come to them from the North. It will not be trouble of the same kind, or trouble which will bring on four years of civil war. It will be trouble with which, if citizens hav common patriotism and resolution, the ballot may deal; but it will be trouble, and perhaps serious trouble. The South Carolina of a second irrepressible conflict is not unlikely to be found in French Canada, dominated by the Jesuit.

That a second irrepressible conflict, though happily of a much milder type, impends over society on this continent, is a fact to which Americans are apparently beginning to awaken. The fight over the public school system at Boston is the prelude probably to a general struggle, other preludes to which are the fights over grants of public money on land to the sectarian purposes of the Roman Catholic church at New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, and elsewhere. Once more, as in the case of freedom and slavery, two social systems radically antagonistic, each with its political and intellectual concomitants, confront each other. On one side is the social system of the New World, the system of individual liberty, of freedom of opinion and speech, of religious equality, of science and progress—the system which, leaving all churches to themselvs and the religious conscience to itself, repudiates all ecclesiastical domination and claims for the state as paramount the undivided allegiance of every citizen. On the other side is the system of the church of Rome, that comparativly late but formidable immigrant—the system of the encyclical and the syllabus, the system which seeks to make the pope, as representativ of the ecclesiastical power, supreme lord of all in things temporal, so far as the church pleases, as well as in things spiritual, which demands for the ecclesiastical power the first allegiance of the citizen, which denounces freedom of opinion, and asserts the right of the infallible church to put down opinions opposed to hers by force, which declares that the papacy will not make terms with modern science and progress, which combats explicitly liberty of speech and of religious conviction, implicitly liberty of every kind. The two systems, that of civil and that of ecclesiastical supremacy, that of reaction and that of progress, cannot, any more than could that of freedom and that of slavery, liv under the same roof. The Roman system was finally formulated by the council of the Vatican, which crowned it with the infallibility of the pope, while the control of the papacy itself passed into the hands of the Jesuit, the heir of that great and wonderful conspiracy which has been carried on for three centuries against freedom and progress. Still devoted to the prosecution of his old enterprise, the political power having departed from kings and settled in the people, he has now to cultivate, and does with great success cultivate, the arts of the demagog in place of the arts of the courtier. It is needless to dilate to Americans on the power of the church of Rome in the United States—on her numbers now recruited not only from Ireland and Germany, but from Italy, her activity, the vast and steady growth of her wealth, the disciplin which she maintains among her political legions, the prompt obedience with which they obey her call on election day, and the effect, out of proportion even to their real muster-roll, which their compactness, and the unity and energy with which they are wielded, make upon the imagination of the politician. It is a very weak point in electiv institutions, at least under the party system, that any interest or conspiracy which will deliberately treat the state not as the object of civil duty, but as an oyster to be opened with the knife of a sectional veto, may, by holding the balance of parties, enslave the commonwealth to its own ends. The green flag, which is virtually the flag of the church of Rome in the United States, after being lowered for a moment by an insurrection of American nationality, floats again in triumphant domination over the city hall of New York. Nor can a Canadian cast the stone of reproach at the citizens of the United States. We bow beneath the same yoke.

In attacking the public school system Rome attacks the key of her enemy's position. Free institutions cannot possibly continue to exist without an educated people. Over an educated people Rome can never reign. Nominally she opposes the religious system of education to the secular system. Really, if she could extinguish her rival and hav all things her own way, popular education would cease. Look at the countries which hav been thoroughly under her sway. Look at Spain, Portugal, Italy, especially Calabria, Sicily, Brittany, and other ultra-Catholic districts of France, the remote provinces of Austria, Mexico, and the South American colonies of Spain. In French Canada, where the church is absolute, the bulk of the people are illiterate, and we are told that even the mayor of a town is not always able to write. In British Canada the Roman Catholic church has managed to secure for herself separate schools, and these are unquestionably inferior to the rest. Ireland has a national system of education, but it was introduced by the Parliament of the United Kingdom against the wishes, and in spite of the half-veiled resistance, of the main body of the Roman Catholic hierarchy and priesthood. Whether the policy of the church be deliberate or not, as it is everywhere the same, we may infer that it is rooted in her character, and that her victory would be the death not only of the secular school system but of popular education. The Jesuit was, as Bacon saw, a great, and, in his way, a successful educator. But of whom? Not of the people, but of princes, nobles, youth of the wealthier class, of those over whom he wished to get influence, because influence over them was political and social power. Nor was his object in teaching that of the genuin educator, but that of the social and intellectual intriguer. What he imparted was not light, much less independence of mind, but only genteel accomplishments, with a hollow show of learning, in return for which he exacted the entire submission of his pupil's mind. His aim was, in short, to extirpate by educational vaccination that dangerous malady, the love of knowledge, which the Reformation and the Renaissance had set up. If the church of Rome throws herself into the work of popular education it is to take the people away from the heretical schools. She cannot possibly love it for its own sake. Where education is she dares not venture on the performance of miracles, and scarcely on the exhibition of relics. We hav miracles and relics in Quebec.

The scene of battle now shifts to French Canada. I hav tried to describe before the French Canadian theocracy, and those who bear the facts in mind will see that the church of Rome has in that theocracy an admirable basis for her reactionary operations on the continent. The church in French Canada is virtually established. She retains the legal power of collecting from all Catholics tithes and other ecclesiastical dues which she had before the conquest, while she is not like all other established churches under state control. Her priesthood is supreme in all things temporal as well as spiritual, her people are uneducated and submissiv. Amid the general poverty of the people she is rich, and her wealth is always being increased by gainful investment as well as by pious contribution. It is reckoned that she now holds realized property to the amount of eighty millions and has eight millions of revenue. She derives a great addition of strength and of security from her identification with French nationality, which in late years has been growing more intense and more aggressiv, the British Canadian element having not only failed to assimilate the French, but having begun visibly to recede before it. The eastern townships, once British, are now rapidly passing into French hands. The church gladly advances money at a low rate of interest to the Frenchman to buy out the Englishman, because the land in Catholic hands will pay tithes. The assessor, under French Catholic control, is able to help the process by raising the taxes on a property in British hands. The British element will soon be reduced to the commercial quarter of Montreal, while the French are overflowing and carrying at once their nationality and their ecclesiastical system with them into the adjoining parts of Ontario and the maritim provinces. They are also overflowing at a great rate into the North-eastern states of the Union, and, in combination with the Irish Catholics, they bid fair to swamp the Puritan in his ancient seat.

Till lately, however, the Roman Catholic church in Quebec was comparativly quiet and unaggressiv. She was a remnant of Gallicanism saved by distance and British rule from the catastrophe of the Gallican church at the time of the French Revolution, and also cut off from the Ultramontane reaction which followed upon the Restoration. She devoured the substance of the people and kept them ignorant and unprogressiv, but she did her best to make them moral in an ecclesiastical way; and though her influence upon the political parties and her use of it for her exclusiv objects, as well as her irregular interference in elections, were great political evils, she did not systematically encroach upon the rights of the state. She accepted the British monarchy pretty much as she had accepted the monarchy in France. But by the coming of the Jesuit with the program of Ultramontanism embodied in the encyclical the scene is changed. Quebec, in spite of the resistance of some of the bishops, the parish priests, and the old orders, such as the Sulpicians, is yielding to the influences now dominant at Rome, and becoming Ultramontane, and, what is the same thing, Jesuit. Her solid and separate nationality, cut off by difference of language from the liberalizing influences of the New World, thoroughly permeated with Ultramontanism and identifying theocracy with patriotism, promises henceforth to be the citadel of the Jesuit, and the center from which he will carry on his crusade against the free and progressiv civilization of the New World.

Flushed with victory over his ecclesiastical rivals and confident in his hold over the politicians, the Jesuit in Quebec has now ventured on a stroke which makes Canada ring and awakens echoes in New England, if not beyond. The estates which the order held in Canada under the Bourbons, on the suppression of the order by the pope in 1773 lapsed to the British crown. They had, indeed, never been held by the order as a corporation under British rule, since the Treaty of Paris guaranteed the French Canadians their religion only "so far as British law permitted;" and Jesuitism was, at that time, proscribed—indeed, at the present day it is hardly tolerated—by British law. To these estates the revived order, after an interval of more than a century, during forty years of which it was itself out of existence, has had the hardihood to put in a claim. Such a demand, if preferred to any Roman government or community in Europe or America, would at once be dismissed with scorn; but in a Protestant community ridden by the Roman Catholic vote, it not only is not dismissed with scorn, but is humbly admitted. An act has been passed by the provincial legislature of Quebec awarding the Jesuits, by way of compromise, the sum of $400,000. To emphasize the aggression the act contains a provision making the settlement conditional on the assent of the pope, and thus submitting Canadian legislation to the control of a foreign power. Through the provincial legislature the act passes with no opposition beyond a protest from members of the helpless Protestant minority, and Mr. Mercier, the premier, receives as the guerdon of his services a well-earned decoration from the pope. From the provincial legislature the act goes, like all provincial acts, to the federal government for allowance or disallowance. The federal premier, no doubt, abhors the act, and he has a strong Orange element in his following and the head of the Orange order in his cabinet. But he dares not estrange the Roman Catholic vote. Accordingly he allows the act. Nor is the Opposition in a condition to do its duty; since, like the government, it stands in awe of the Roman Catholic vote and has, moreover, recently entangled itself in a very discreditable alliance with the Nationalist party in Quebec. There has been an Orange and Protestant uprising in the government party; but, according to the last advices, Sir John Macdonald seems to hav succeeded in quelling this by a threat of resignation. Thus the act appears likely to pass with no opposition beyond a feeble protest from either of the organized parties and will stand in our statute-book a monument at once of the daring of the Jesuit and of the liabilities of party government. In the people of British Canada, however, a strong feeling has been aroused and is not likely to die away. The agitation against the act has been led by the Toronto Mail, an independent journal. The Jesuits hav brought a libel suit against the Mail, claiming $50,000 damages and laying the venue not at Toronto, where the journal is published, but at Montreal, where they command the jury box. This is putting British Canadian submissivness to a rather severe trial.

It is impossible not to regard with wonder, at all events, this famous organization of the Sons of Loyola—Ignatius's black militia, as Carlyle calls it—which has done so much for reaction; which counts among its achievements, or the achievements in which it has had a great share, the war of the Catholic League, the Thirty Years' war, the persecutions in the Netherlands, the extirpation of the French Protestants, the war of the Sonderbund, and the Franco-German war, besides the plots against the government and life of Elizabeth, the Gunpowder plot, the attempt of James II. against the liberties of England, a whole series of regicides or attempts at regicide, and intrigues which hav disturbed in turn almost every community in Europe. Not only has the Society of Jesus done all this; it has, to a wonderful extent, held back the dawn of intellectual progress in the morning sky. Marvelous hav been its vitality, its tenacity of purpose, its sustained activity, its power of adapting itself to changes of circumstances which, it might hav been thought, would be fatal to it. Wounded apparently to death by the dart of Pascal, it did not die, though it has borne and will forever bear about the scar. Suppressed by the pope himself, at the instance of the Catholic powers it has risen again from the tomb of suppression. Deprived by political progress of the despots who were its foster-fathers and by intriguing with whom its power was originally gained, it has learned to intrigue not less cunningly and almost as successfully with the leaders of the people. Expelled from country after country, it found its way back, and now at last ejected from Europe, by the combined fear and loathing of the nations, it takes ship, crosses the Atlantic, and sets to work at the foundation of a new empire for Loyola, and the power which Loyola served, among the democracies of the New World. Its ultimate victory is inconceivable. Reaction, ecclesiastical despotism, and obscurantism, whose standard it bears, cannot in the end triumph over progress, freedom of opinion, and the kingdom of Light. Morality fights against it, and will prevail if this is a moral world. Often, as in France at the time of the League, in Europe generally under Philip II., in France again under Louis XIV., in England under James II., in Switzerland before the Sonderbund, in France once more under the second empire, it has seemed triumphant, and flattered itself, no doubt, that the future was in its hands; when suddenly the moral powers hav intervened, and its edifice of conspiracy so laboriously constructed has come to the ground in a day. Its cunning, as its behavior at the time of James II. showed, though profound is not identical with wisdom. Fail in the end the Jesuit must; but in the mean time there may be considerable havoc if the United States and Canada remain in the hands of politicians who are controled by the Catholic vote.

Additions to the Agnostic Ranks.

The most famous preacher in Chicago is the Rev. W. H. Thomas, of the People's church. He is the Beecher of the West in popularity, and his sermon on the 24th ult. shows that he is like Mr. Beecher in holding heretical notions. Chicago is greatly stirred by his utterances, and his fellow-ministers are obliged to confess that he is right.

The paragraph in his sermon which causes the flurry is this: "I question whether or not it is possible for man and the human intellect ever to stand without the possibility of a doubt with reference to God. I never saw an argument tending to prove the existence of God that did not need another argument to uphold the first. Reason tries to show God and fails. It is the heart that perceives God, but doubt will ever remain on the part of the understanding."

That is as close to Atheism as a minister can get and keep his pulpit. The admission, however, is portentous for Christianity. If God cannot be perceived by the mind, if his existence is not capable of proof by mental process, if no reasonable argument can be adduced in support of his actuality, then indeed must Theism be given up once for all. The longing of the heart, like the craving of a child, is worthless as a guide and of no possible value in determining facts. And to be anything, God must be a fact—a something or a nothing. He either exists or he does not. If he does, according to Mr. Thomas, he can never know it, and by this statement he destroys, so far as he can, the positiv position of theology. If his statement that there can be no intellectual processes which shall enable man to comprehend and prove the existence of God is correct, then must the Christian church come down in her assumptions and humbly assume the position of the Agnostic. For the heart, or the emotional side of man, never yet discovered a truth in nature. Its "perception" is simply a blind desire.

> "An infant crying in the night,
> An infant crying for the light" is an object of solicitude, perhaps, but not a lamp to the feet of the searcher for truth.

Viewing the matter in this Agnostic way, which is the sternly logical result of the adoption of Mr. Thomas's philosophy, it is interesting to know what the other preachers think of his sermon. The Chicago News has interviewed a number of the more prominent ones, and prints their words:

Rev. W. H. Holmes: There is a shade of truth in his doctrin.

Rev. Dr. Mandeville: The idea of God is an intuition. It doesn't come to man by any process of reason.

Rev. Dr. Terry: It is the heart which perceives God. No doubt it is true that while the other arguments for the existence of a God are comforting to the believer and confirmatory of the conviction that there is a power without ourselvs which makes for righteousness, still they would be inadequate to convince a man to whom the dogmas of a creator were presented as an entire novelty.

Rev. Dr. Henson: The tendency in human nature is to reject as incredible all that is unthinkable, and the infinit is to the finite unthinkable. Paul said: "The world, by wisdom, knows not God." It isn't possible to know God intellectually any more than it is to climb on a ladder to the moon; and therefore there is a sense in which the Agnostic is right. But he is wrong when he says I can't understand God. The philosopher can't understand God, who is a pure spirit. The spirit of understanding must first be imparted; by his intelligence alone no man can know God. The tendency of learning is to pride of intellect. That is what ailed the devil.

Dr. Barrows: Dr. Thomas must hav felt pretty well when he wrote this discourse, since his wife says that when he is suffering from dyspepsia he usually preaches on hell!

Dr. Lorimer: Dr. Thomas is a good friend of mine, and it is safe to say that any statement he made is very nearly right.

Dr. Perrin: I think Dr. Thomas is right. It is not demonstrable by reason that God exists. I don't think that it can be reasoned from analogy, or that there is a positiv confirmation of the existence of the deity.

Other ministers said that Dr. Thomas was all wrong, as the heart was an organ quite sufficient to comprehend God. Others said that his opinion was not of much account, that he was a skeptic, and that the subject was too deep to be tackled anyway. Its consideration only landed the inquirer in quagmires as he proceeded. These latter are all agreed that no matter what Mr. Thomas thought himself about the possibility of proving the existence of God, he should hav kept still.

A division of these criticising ministers becomes at once, and naturally, apparent. They are in two classes by reason of their views. These classes are Agnostics and hypocrits. The first acknowledge that they cannot prove the existence of God, the second say that if they cannot they will keep still about it. These latter can, of course, expect to obtain only the contempt of honest men. The first will soon find themselvs in trouble to answer the very natural inquiry why, if they cannot know that God exists, they go on preaching as though his reality is as undoubted as the Atlantic ocean? If they are honestly at heart Agnostics, why act like Christian teachers?

Life.

When Freethinkers get to arguing with Christians, they seem to be usually expected to be able to answer a quantity of questions like: What is life? how did it come about? what is consciousness? how do we come to think? etc. The Christian asks these with a victorious air, and if all is not explained at once claims that this is somehow proof for his whole nonsensical mythology. Freethinkers should familiarize themselvs with that division of science that treats of living matter, as distinct from not-living, that is, biology; in particular, with that branch that treats of the origin of living matter, that is, etiological biology. Those not familiar with this branch of knowledge may perhaps be benefited if we present a few of its fundamental truths. Besides, we must answer a letter:

"March 11, 1889.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I would like, if you think the subject deserving of further elucidation, and space will permit, to ask a few questions in relation to your theory found in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 2d, under the heading of 'The Design Argument.' Apparently this inference is fairly to be drawn from your position and argument: That life is spontaneous. And of this force, or energy, which is equivalent to, or in other words is, life, I would ask, is it recognizable by any of the senses, or is it invisible, imponderable, impalpable? . . .

"In the summary and at the close of the article reference is made to the theory of evolution, as containing the solution of the mystery of life, the beginning, etc. With due regard to the opinions of those eminent thinkers and authors, Darwin, Spencer, and others, is this theory of life and the beginning demonstrated as a palpable fact, a truth, or is it an assumption, a guess? I submit that it is only that; and that the time is not yet when a theory of such magnitude is to be accepted on the guess of any party, no matter how distinguished they may be. J. VAN DENBURGH,

"Milwaukee, Wis."

On looking about us in this world, we find everywhere matter. We find matter, and nothing but it—atoms of matter, each possessing inherent capabilities of action by which it moves and works and produces all the stir and change that we see around us every day. We find this matter assuming many very different forms, and working in many very different ways. There seems to be, between its workings in more simple forms, like that of a rock, and its workings in more complicated forms, like that of a man, a vast gulf of separation. Just where to draw the lines of this gulf, and how wide to make it, is a question on which opposing views hav been taken in all ages. There are two systems of thought that pass diametrically opposit judgments on this matter, one wishing to widen the gulf, the other to diminish it. The system that wishes to widen it is Christianity. The system that wishes to diminish it is science. We will state first the motivs that impel Christianity to try to widen this gulf between living and not-living matter, and then the motivs that impel science to try to diminish it.

The motivs that impel Christianity are: 1. The desire, common to all priesthoods, to keep the people believing that the more highly organized forms of matter contain a something distinct from natural forces, called "spirit," and in particular that men contain the highest form of this something, as "souls," so that priesthoods may hav a dominion over which to reign. 2. The desire to support the special revelation to Christianity which givs life a special and independent origin, and constantly speaks of "spirit" as of a special and independent nature. 3. The desire to support that revelation by proof from miracles, supernatural interventions; it being clear that if the not-living and the living are so different that the latter could not hav developed from the former, then, as we know that the earth was once in a gaseous state incompatible with life, the presence of life now is evidence that a life-germ was introduced by supernatural intervention.

The motiv impelling science to maintain the opposed view is simply, that the evidence it discovers so tends.

Now as to proof of the view of science, that living matter has developed, under natural laws, from not-living. Mr. Van Denburgh wishes some that is direct, "palpable." A way of obtaining such proof suggested itself to science quite early—a hundred years ago. It occurred to science that it might by experiment exhibit actual cases of life developing, under the observation, from lifeless matter. For while Christians directed attention to those orders of living beings that we see to be generated only by matter derived from previous similar beings, science took notice that there were other orders among insects and animalculæ that were apparently produced without such germs and from not-living matter merely. For instance, the maggots that appear in decomposing flesh. But on the institution of experiments rigidly excluding all possible introduction of germs, life has not clearly made its appearance. It is true that Bastian claims to hav succeeded in thus producing living creatures, and has set forth many such results in his "Beginnings of Life;" but other experimenters hav arrived at opposit results. While some eminent scientists embrace spontaneous generation, others reject it, and many are silent. On the whole, we must pronounce it unproved. So we cannot giv our friend proof of that degree of directness and indisputableness that would be possessed by a successful outcome of the experiments named.

But we can giv proofs of a directness and cogency quite sufficient. It is upon these that we made our affirmation. It is upon these that all the eminent men in natural science are unanimous in their conclusion—men such as Haeckel, Büchner, Vogt, Maudsley, and Tyndall. For after all, what was wanted was not to demonstrate that life could be produced from not-living matter now, in a limited number of experiments, under existing conditions. Our claim is merely that it was thus produced at a remote time, among an almost infinit number of experiments, under then-existing conditions. And that this should be the case there are strong probabilities, strong analogies.

For the conditions in remote ages were totally different from present ones. "Think only," says Haeckel, "of the fact that the enormous masses of carbon which we now find deposited in the primary coal mountains were first reduced to a solid form by the action of vegetable life, and are the compressed and condensed remains of innumerable vegetable substances, which hav accumulated in the course of many millions of years. But at the time when, after the origin of water in a liquid state on the cooled crust of the earth, organisms were first formed by spontaneous generation, those immeasurable quantities of carbon existed in a totally different form, probably for the most part dispersed in the atmosphere in the shape of carbonic acid. The whole composition of the atmosphere was therefore extremely different from the present. Further, as may be inferred upon chemical, physical, and geological grounds, the density and the electrical conditions of the atmosphere were quite different."

Besides this total general difference in the conditions, it is to be noted that that substance spoken of as then abounding in a diffused form is carbon, the substance that above all others plays the most important formativ part in the composition of organisms. "It is this element," says a high chemical authority, "which, by its peculiar tendency to form complicated combinations with the other elements, produces the greatest variety of chemical compounds, and among them the forms and living substance of animal and vegetable bodies."

Be it noted that there is in living bodies no element that is not also found in inanimate nature.

Consequently the difference between living and not-living bodies lies not in any difference in nature in the elements composing them, but merely in the different manner in which the elements are united by chemical combination.

Once it was thought that a line of demarkation between living and not-living divisions could be drawn upon the criterion of simpleness or dissimilarity of the materials. The most perfect not-living bodies, as crystals, were supposed to consist of matter continuous, all of one kind—homogeneous. While on the other hand, living bodies were supposed to consist of matter composit, dissimilar, of several kinds—heterogeneous. But this distinction has been invalidated by the discovery of the exceedingly important monera, creatures consisting of formless, semi-fluid lumps of simple albumen, totally without organs, who yet grow, nourish themselvs, and propagate.

Once that structure which we call organic—that in which there is a division into special parts or organs each performing some particular function that relates to the welfare of the whole—was supposed a distinctiv mark of living bodies. But the discovery of living orders destitute of organs and perfectly simple in structure has destroyed that supposition. The best examples of these orders of life are the monera just mentioned, and says Haeckel, one of the very first authorities, "the origin of the first monera by spontaneous generation appears to us as a simple and necessary event in the process of the development of the earth." The terms "living" and "organic," and "inanimate" and "inorganic," are commonly used interchangeably, but not with scientific correctness.

Once it was believed that distinctiv differences could be found in opposed outside forms of living and not-living bodies. Living bodies were supposed to possess only curved surfaces and crooked lines, meeting at variable angles. While not-living bodies, especially minerals, and among them preëminently crystals, were supposed to possess exclusivly the plane surfaces, meeting in straight lines and at geometrical angles. But recently there hav been brought to light large numbers of lower orders of living bodies possessing the same mathematically determinable form as crystals.

We hav not space to detail all the cases in which supposed distinctions hav been broken down, and in which parallels of constitution hav been exhibited. But we will add one more, a remarkable likeness in the development of crystals and that of living bodies. "We can perceive," says "The History of Creation," "that there exists no insurmountable chasm between organic and inorganic nature most clearly if we examin and compare the origin of the forms in crystals and in the simplest organic individuals. In the formation of crystal individuals, two different counteracting formativ tendencies come into operation. The inner constructiv force, or the inner formativ tendency, which corresponds to the Heredity of organisms, in the case of the crystal is the direct result of its material constitution or of its chemical composition. The form of the crystal, so far as it is determined by this inner original formativ tendency, is the result of the specific and definit way in which the smallest particles of the crystallizing matter unite together in different directions according to law. That independent inner formativ force, which is directly inherent in the matter itself, is directly counteracted by a second formativ force. The external constructiv force, or the external formativ tendency, may be called Adaptation in crystals as well as in organisms. Every crystal individual during its formation, like every organic individual, must submit and adapt itself to the surrounding influences and conditions of existence of the outer world. In fact, the form and size of every crystal is dependent upon its whole surroundings, for example, upon the vessel in which the crystallization takes place, upon the temperature and the pressure of the air under which the crystal is formed, upon the presence or absence of heterogeneous bodies, etc. Consequently, the form of every single crystal, like the form of every single organism, is the result of the interaction of two opposing factors—the inner formativ tendency, which is determined by the chemical constitution of the matter itself, and of the external formativ tendency, which is dependent upon the influence of surrounding matter. Both these constructiv forces interact similarly also in the organism, and, just as in the crystal, are of a purely mechanical nature and directly inherent in the substance of the body. If we designate the growth and the formation of organisms as a process of life, we may with equal reason apply the same term to the developing crystal."

From this filling up with intermediate forms of the gap that once existed between known living and not-living bodies; from the intimate parallels between the two divisions; from the knowledge that at the time when life appeared on the earth there abounded the very material required for its development from inanimate nature, diffused carbon, and electrical conditions and heat, strongly favorable to such a process; and from application of that universal principle that is daily emerging more and more clearly under the progress of science, that of an unvaried and unbroken natural development of the earth and its products from the simplest beginnings, we think our proposition receives sufficient confirmation.

We take it for granted that our friend is a believer in those principles of evolution in accordance with which, when the simplest living bodies are thus produced, they may develop into the highest known complexity of organization.

That highest manifestation of natural force, human consciousness, we find we hav no space to touch upon. We will endeavor to satisfy our friend in regard to it in another issue.

It is asked: "Is life recognizable by any of the senses, or is it invisible, imponderable, impalpable?" Life is recognizable by the senses. Life is a process, not a thing. When matter gets together in certain ways and works according to certain forces and in certain processes, we perceive those processes by our senses, and call them the processes of inanimate nature. When matter gets together in certain other ways and works in certain other processes, we perceive those processes by our senses, and call them the processes of animate nature, of life.

On the Museums—Reporting Progress.

Though the Sun has apparently withdrawn from a contest with the trustees of the museums in Central park, those individuals hav found some legislativ rocks which interfere materially with their sailing into New York's treasury. In addition to the hundreds of thousands of dollars—amounting, with the annual subsidies, to nearly two millions—already given the museums, both institutions are before the legislature with bills allowing the city to appropriate to each $400,000 for additional buildings. The bill for the Museum of Natural History was put in early in January, that for the Art Museum not till later. Both bills originated in the senate.

January 10th, when the first bill was under consideration, Senator George F. Langbein, of the Seventh district, offered this resolution:

"WHEREAS, The legislature, by chapters 44, 460, 579, and 581 of the laws of 1887, authorized the appropriation of $750,000 for the completion and equipment of the American Museum of Natural History and Metropolitan Museum of Art, in the Central park in the city of New York; and

"WHEREAS, Twenty thousand dollars of said sum is an annual appropriation, for the purpose of enabling the trustees of said respectiv museums to exhibit the works of art and wonders of nature in said museums to the general public; and

"WHEREAS, It is alleged that the major part of the general public hav no opportunity to visit said museums and enjoy the benefits thereof because the same are not open on Sundays;

"Resolved, That the board of trustees of said museums respectivly and the department of public parks of the city of New York be, and they are hereby requested to furnish this senate, within the next ten days, the reasons or causes why, if any, the said museums hav not hitherto been open to the general public on Sundays.

"Resolved, That the board of estimate and apportionment of the city of New York be, and the same is hereby requested to furnish this senate within the next ten days the amounts or sums of money appropriated by said board for said museums for any purpose whatsoever since the first day of January, 1887.

"Resolved, That the department of public parks of the city of New York be, and the same is hereby requested to furnish this senate within the next ten days the amounts of money it has set apart for said museums from any of the moneys appropriated for the uses of said department during the years 1887 and 1888, and the purposes or objects for which the same was so set apart, or expended in or about said museums."

The resolution was tabled and ordered to be printed, and has since been smothered by a committee, and there is small prospect of finding out why the trustees do not open the museums on Sundays.

The bill permitting the board of estimate and apportionment to appropriate the money was finally passed in the senate and sent down to the assembly. Senator Langbein's opposition to the bill awakened the latter body to amend the bill, making the appropriation provided the Museum of Natural History were kept open on Sundays. It then went back to the senate, where the amendment was agreed to, and the bill is probably now a law, for it is not likely that Governor Hill would veto it. If the trustees of the museum, therefore, desire new buildings, they must open the doors on Sundays.

In the matter of the Art Museum, the screws were not so directly applied, but Senator Langbein succeeded in giving them a gentle turn. The bill allowing the board of estimate and apportionment to set apart $400,000 with which to build an addition to the Art Museum came up on a motion by Senator Grady on the 27th ult., asking it to go to a third reading. There was no Sunday opening clause in it. Senator Langbein, however, was on hand, and objected. He was then allowed to insert the following amendment when it comes up on third reading:

"Provided that the trustees of the said museum shall conform to such rules and regulations relating to the days of opening and closing the same as may from time to time be made by the said board of estimate and apportionment."

The senators hav held, as a means of escaping from the responsibility of forcibly opening the museums on Sunday, that the board of estimate and apportionment is the proper power to deal with the trustees, and this amendment clearly throws the responsibility upon our city officials so far as the Art Museum is concerned. It was undoubtedly the best that Mr. Langbein could get from the senate, and if the bill passes, the board has the whip hand of the trustees in a larger sense than ever before. They cannot giv the Natural History Museum the money unless it opens on Sunday, and they probably will not giv it to the Art institution unless the trustees comply with the same condition. It is possible, too, that when the bill goes down to the assembly the same amendment that was put on the other bill will be added to this. The assembly has for two years been ready to force Sunday opening, passing in 1887 a bill introduced by Mr. Langbein, then an assemblyman from the Tenth district, giving the museums $20,000 instead of $15.000 annually, provided they were open on Sundays, but which was emasculated in the senate by striking out the Sunday clause. The trustees of the museums hav always preferred to make their fight against Sunday opening in the senate, as the less numerous body is more easily influenced by their peculiar arguments. Social and church magnates and alleged aristocracy hav a stronger "pull" in the senate than in the assembly.

It is to be hoped that when these bills become laws, if the first is not already a statute, and the trustees hat in hand come begging of the board of estimate and apportionment for the issuance of the $800 000 worth of bonds for which they get the money and on which the city pays the interest, the board will hav backbones of a more rigid nature than the vertebræ of the last board, which asked for Sunday opening and compromised on two evenings a week, and which the Art museum has found excuse to as yet evade. Every one of the board, we believe, has publicly declared in favor of the Sunday opening, and if they stand up to the rack, twelve months more will find crowds of delighted people wandering through the halls and corridors of the museums enjoying a view of treasures for the exhibition and care of which they hav been taxed enormously but never allowed to see because they were not in the Puritan ring of alleged aristocratic millionaires whose hardest labor is going to church on Sundays. The board of estimate and apportionment should be made to thoroughly understand that the people of the city do not desire to longer support institutions which are in fact but little more than private galleries and lecture rooms for those who toil not, but who array themselvs in gorgeous apparel, and when the real world is hard at work spend their time among the treasures which the laborer pays for housing and protecting.

Letters from Friends.

TULE LAKE, ORE., March 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: We take this occasion to say to the Liberals of Longmont, Cal., that we are in favor of sending G. E. Macdonald on that proposed trip around the world, if he wants to go, and will help to furnish the funds.

Yours truly, WILLIAM TERRILL,
C. L. DOEBLER.

CANFIELD, COL., March 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I think the suggestion of Colonel Kelso and others, that the Liberal friends subscribe and advance a sufficient fund to pay the expenses of George E. Macdonald to Palestine, is both good and timely. George E. Macdonald has that Artemus Ward style of humor which Americans so highly appreciate. The next few years is likely to be a period of comparativ political quiet, and if the scheme could be worked up, and George could be induced to go, it might turn out to be quite a boom for the Liberal cause, Liberal papers —and to the traveler himself, if he should succeed in finding any of the chariot wheels lost by Pharaoh in the Red sea.

GEORGE X. YOUNG.

WELLESLEY, MASS., March 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad that you hav no word of encouragement for the proposed plan of sending your brother George on a trip around the world.

There is not the slightest doubt that, were he to accomplish the undertaking as proposed, we should receive from him a charming history of his travels, a delightful picture of the people he met and the places he visited. But can the Radicals of the country afford the risk which such an undertaking involves—the risk of losing him and his services forever? Hav they not lost too heavily in this way already? The activ brains of D. M. Bennett and William Denton were never more needed among us than they are at the present time, but their places among us are empty. While they were eagerly gathering materials with which to enrich the world's storehouse of knowledge, the poisonous vapors of those far-off shores were silently stealing from them the only ready medium of communication between their intellects and our own, and the knowledge they had there gathered lies buried in their graves. And what assurance hav we that the life of the brilliant editor of Freethought would be exempt from the poisoned shafts which so cruelly robbed us of their aid? No! We need him here. Let us keep him with us while we may. It was, no doubt, needful that, with you and THE TRUTH SEEKER establishment in New York, he and Mr. Putnam should establish themselvs and Freethought in San Francisco, in order to maintain a proper balance of forces between the eastern and western portions of the continent. But what good reason can we hav for consenting that any of our "bright, particular stars" shall sink from our horizon and disappear behind "the waters of the great deep?" I confess that I discern no reason that appears at all worthy, and I am, therefore, glad that you do not encourage it.

Cordially yours, etc., E. M. F. DENTON.

TORONTO, CAN., March 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: While thinking over the subject of prayer to-day, the thought struck me that it was an "appalling fact" that the time spent in praying could be put down as almost beyond calculation.

Now, there are, for easy calculation we will say, sixty million people in the United States, and with all the prayers that are said by priests and nuns in convents and monasteries every day and night, and all said by women and children and ministers of all sects, allowing half a minute for the Lord's Prayer, the time amounts to the following enormous figures: Half a minute per day, per head, amounts to thirty million minutes per day, or seven million six hundred and four thousand and forty-five days in a year, literally wasted to the winds. What a result!

If all those good people would spend their share of that time in doing something to unloose the chains of mental slavery, and to alleviate the condition of poor, suffering, downtrodden humanity, what a world of good could be accomplished, and how much brighter their crowns would shine in the eyes of all the humane world! Society would be graced, and better for their existence, and the whole universe would ring with the sound of freedom and liberty. Reason would hold high and undisputed sway, and superstition would be a thing of the past.

Imagin all those millions of people every day getting down reverently upon their "stubbs," and praying to some imaginary almighty God for strength and assistance, who, all the intellectual world ought to know, neither will nor can render assistance to those who need help up out of the gutter of distress and despair.

It seems to me that these agents of Christ ought to be ashamed to read those figures, and look up into the face of the world and say they are making the least effort to better the condition of one of their fellow-men, when they are only drumming error and superstition into the ears and minds of a blinded and misled race.

Just think of seven million six hundred and four thousand and forty-five days every year devoted to such a foolhardy cause, when there are countless numbers of our fellow-brethren ill-clad and hungry, who could be clothed and fed, made light-hearted and happy and better citizens, and are now outcasts from society, neglected and spurned by the very ones who are claiming in stentorian tones to be their benefactors!

My only prayer is that these heartless, superstitious teachers of tradition and error may be called to some bar of judgment, and made to giv an account of their doings and works upon earth, and I believe that were such the case they would be ashamed of having lived where so much good could hav been done among men and having failed to do it.

J. B. VAIL.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., March 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, which you will be kind enough to see placed to the credit of the Bruno statue. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church. If this was a Catholic enterprise $6,000 could be raised in a week, and I feel ashamed of men who call themselvs Freethinkers who fail to respond to so noble a cause. He gave his life for me that the way might be opened for me to enjoy what little liberty I hav, and I hope there are five hundred more willing to do their share, that the work may proceed at once.

Respectfully, J. B. ELLIOTT.

LYONS, KAN., March 4, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 25, to renew subscription for this year, and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL.

In spite of President Cleveland's bountiful proclamation of crops, this part of Kansas for the past two seasons has gone back on her record, and the farmers are in a tight place. This day, I presume, will furnish us with a new presidential officer; and should he prove as true to the instincts of his Presbyterian crew, by favoring the theological party, in opposition to the equality of all, I fear the country will receive a set-back which it will take years to recover from. Hoping for the best, and for the prosperity of your valuable paper, I remain, Yours, E. BUTLER.

March 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I would be pleased to send more names and money for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but am unable to do so. There are many Liberal thinkers here, but they care more for politics than for any ism. I am nearly the only outspoken Liberal here, and as they cannot answer my questions, they are only too willing to avoid any conversation with me on subjects which need knowledge, not theory, to answer. If some able speaker could come, an awakening might be effected, but things are running in old ruts. Church, and church influence, is bearing on the business men; they are obliged to contribute or be left out. So they must submit or keep quiet; most of them do the latter.

P. PREEMORE.

HAY SPRINGS, NEB., March 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I came here from Axtell, Kan., upon the statements of our Liberal brothers Tripp and Mattley, both stanch supporters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am greatly pleased with the country. The climate is excellent, water good, plenty of timber, vast rolling prairies, and some government land. There are greater inducements here than in any other country I know of. Mrs. Miner is delighted, and joy abounds. We will send a list of subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in a short time. The Methodists are holding a revival. We are not numerous, but we intend to down the churches, and want every Liberal that is seeking a home to write us, inclosing a stamp, and we will supply truthfully a description of this country.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, E. W. MINER.

MAIDEN, MONT., March 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to renew my subscription and to pay for one new subscriber, viz., E. C. Abbott, Maiden, Mont.

I wish I could send one hundred names instead of only one to help along the cause of Freethought. There are a good many Liberal-minded people here, besides a few outspoken Infidels, but they need stirring up. If we could hav a few lectures delivered here by such men as Reynolds, Remsburg, or Watts, to arouse these people to a sense of their duty, and infuse a little of the spirit of the illustrious patriot, Thomas Paine, into them, there would be no trouble to organize a Secular Union here. Though the roll of membership might not be very large, it would be composed of the best minds in the place. With such men as the Hon. Granville Stuart, Hon. James Fergus, and William H. Culver as leaders, success would be assured. HENRY WILLIS.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., March 4, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It is not necessary to be a Christian in order to belong to the Young Men's Christian Association of Salina, Kan. So I learn from one of the members. Now I do not state this with the hope that any of the brethren will join them, but to ask that if any of you hav any cast-off clothing, as it were, or perhaps it would be more proper to say any that you hav outgrown, you present it to these young men. I don't exactly mean clothing, either, unless you construe it to mean clothing for the mind. For these young men are "seeking and hungering after righteousness." But I notice they take more readily to the checker-board or a novel. But let us hav patience with these young men. I was up in their rooms the other day, and I noticed James Anthony Froude's history and some other works written by some of our shining lights, and I presented them with John W. Chadwick's "Bible of To-Day," and also Hugh O. Pentecost's paper, the Twentieth Century, which is very good, but really belongs to the eighteenth.

Now, these young men hav much to learn. I would suggest that they get some books on etiquet and Cushing's "Manual," or Hill's "Manual," or some other work on parliamentary rules, which they are really in need of. Why, Mr. Editor, you would be surprised at the young men in the Salina Herald office. They taunted and jeered at me for more than a week after the editor refused to giv me a hearing in self-defense against the scurrilous attack made on me by the Rev. Mr. Chittenden. They forget that good manners is one part of morality, and without it a person is not a gentleman. So I suggest, brother Liberals, any books and papers you hav outgrown present to this society, as they stand very much in need of the knowledge. And they hav their organization so broad as to take those in that do not belong to the church; it would be inconsistent if they would not allow the more liberal Christian doctrins in their library. So I again urge you very strongly not to neglect this important matter. If you hav any literature that you hav no use for, present it to them.

One day Mr. A. R. Hayens, Hon. Joseph B. Negley, and Mr. Sweargen, of Canton, Ill., were talking on religious matters, and I was among them, and was acquainted with Uncle Joe, as we were wont to call him from childhood, and knew he used to be a Universalist, and I spoke up and said, "Let's see, Uncle Joe, I believe you are a Universalist." "Oh, God!" said Uncle Joe, "I've gone further than that." So you see he has no further need of that kind of literature. Neither hav you for any that you hav outgrown. So be charitable, and giv it to these young men, while I—to quote Mr. Chadwick's own words—I trust through you to sow a little of the good seed of truth in their inhospitable fields.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

DANA, ILL., Feb. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I don't want to make myself conspicuous, but I desire to mention a little circumstance. I take THE TRUTH SEEKER. After reading the proposed Blair bill, and the remonstrance against it, I took the paper to R. M. Pitchett, a reader of the paper, and also a Spiritualist. I asked him to circulate it among his patrons in his store, which he did. He soon got a number of names to it, and sent it to Senator Cullom, receiving a prompt reply. Now, this week's or last week's paper says Cullom had the only protest against the Sunday Rest bill. You see the mass of people are in a state of blissful ignorance of such matters, while the orthodox class are working like beavers.

Find inclosed ten cents, for which send discussion as advertised in last paper, i. e., the Ingersoll discussion with Coudert and Woodford. WILLIAM STRAWN.

TOUTE, Feb. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5 85 and apply as follows: $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, twenty-five cents for Paine's "Age of Reason," fifteen cents for "John's Way," and twenty cents for two copies of "Limitations of Toleration."

"These are the times that try men's souls," would apply to the present if written. These are the times that try senators' manhood, when confronted with the Blair Sunday bill, backed by a petition containing six million names, the same being a mixture of Catholic and Protestant, men, women, and children. What a holy alliance for an unholy purpose! Should they get the bone between them, it would tax Heston's ability to picture the scenes that would follow. Liberty might hav to fold her wings and remain a captiv while the demon that ruled in the Dark Ages overshadowed the land. Very cordially yours, SARAH A. COPE.

WACO, TEX., March 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Among the letters which appeared in last week's TRUTH SEEKER is one by J. G. Johnson, Putnam Grove, N. J., recommending the story, "Robert Elsmere's Daughter," which appears in the Family Story Paper. The story is the most abominable stuff that ever appeared in a sensational paper. If a single line of it was ever written by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, she has suddenly changed from a most chaste and classic writer to a common sensational penny-a-liner. I, like many others, was induced to read the story, thinking it was from the pen of the gifted author of "Robert Elsmere." But I had not read through the first chapter before the fraud was apparent, and upon examining the heading of the story, I found that it was ingeniously worded, so as to deceive the unsuspecting public. It reads, "Robert Elsmere's Daughter, a companion story to 'Robert Elsmere,' by Mrs. Humphrey Ward." So you see that it does not claim to be written by Mrs. Ward, but only a companion story to one written by her. Such frauds as this cannot be too severely condemned by the press, and I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will use its influence to protect Mrs. Ward from the damaging imputation of having written such trash as "Robert Elsmere's Daughter." ST. STEPHEN, N. B., March 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I cannot let the opportunity pass without putting on record my appreciation of your efforts in placing within the reach of those who, like myself, hav outgrown the wicked doctrin of Calvinism, such an able exponent of Freethought. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for four years, and having been thirty-two years a denizen of the printing-office—one-half of that time foreman in the present office in Canada, and the other half in Edinburgh, Scotland—I may be pardoned in saying that I should hav some ability in judging of the merits of a newspaper. Your paper is, to my mind, better every week it reaches me, and so long as I am able I intend to hav it.

It givs me pleasure to introduce to you, Friend Macdonald, a brother Scotsman, Richard Rose, who has decided to take your journal. He is sixty-nine years of age, and although brought up strictly orthodox in the land of the heather hills, yet he assures me he never scared a bit. Indeed, it would seem that, like, in some instances, re-vaccination, it did not "take" with him, or in my own case either.

Having visited Boston last November, and remaining in that city over a Sunday, I had the pleasure of hearing Miss Wixon deliver a lecture in Paine Memorial Hall. I need hardly say to the intelligent readers of the "Children's Corner" of THE TRUTH SEEKER over which that lady presides, that her effort on said occasion was particularly able. And as at the time the school question was largely engaging the attention of the citizens of the Hub, her notes of warning were both apt and opportune. I would take it as a particular favor, if Miss Wixon would publish in some part of THE TRUTH SEEKER an illustration she made use of on that occasion. It was showing the treachery and danger of the Roman Catholic church, if it had the power, and she described a man who trained a snake to coil around his body and exhibit the same to audiences, when one day it overpowered him and he was crushed to death. I am sure it would interest many a truth seeker as well as myself.

I inclose money for the subscription of Mr. Rose and myself, and for an ANNUAL. Mr. Rose wishes you to send him a catalog of your books.

Wishing you many years of life to continue at the helm of our noble journal of Freethought, and trusting your subscription-list may correspondingly increase, as it deserves, I shall draw these few lines to a close and subscribe myself,

Yours for the upbuilding of humanity, J. C. HENRY.

March 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As I read THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, I am impelled to the belief that you are doing a great work in the interest of humanity. We hav but to look about to see the baneful effects of the superstition called Christianity. Its effect is in everything that it comes in contact with, as it permeates the very being of those affected with its ideas, its elements of fear, its would-be dealings with the hereafter.

We look about us for advice, for comfort, for assistance; is it the long-faced Christian that we search out on such occasions; is it to his brethren that the professor of the great salvation goes for alms? Not often, but to the kind-hearted Liberal, Deist, Atheist, if you like, but not to the good Christian who has too much to do working for his little creature called God to be able or even willing to devote a small portion of his time to the improvement or comfort of the unimportant contingent, the human family. Nor is it natural that he should be much interested in such trash as man after tinkering with divinity-making and remodeling gods to the fancy of priests or the clamor of the multitude.

Your picture of pagan and Christian Rome ought to be in a frame in every house in the land. It is too true to life, as the photograph man says, to be cast aside after a glance, but should be allowed to provoke thought historical and psychological. Let the National Reformers hav their due in good measure, with a little to spare. A. D. CAMPBELL.

COALING, ALA., March 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 23d is a letter from D. Higbie, M.D., Burton, Mich., in which he expressed his sympathy for me, for which I am grateful, and my love to him and all Freethinkers is returned. He and I differ as to spirits. I hav been investigating that clock phenomenon I wrote of in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 12th. It is a spring clock, and while the running-spring is broken, and verge, pendulum, hands, and face are all off, the striking-spring is not broken, and was wound up. Also the spring that timed the strokes was broken, so that it did not fall into the catch, and if anything—moth or roach—should walk over it it would strike once, and then fall in any of the teeth on the spur-wheel. I let it strike until it ran down and it has not repeated that phenomenon since, and I don't think it will. Mr. Higbie asks me to get a planchet and hav six to surround a table to produce spirit manifestations. Does he not do just what the priest does when he tells me I must come to the anxious seat, consider myself lost, lay down my reason, become a monomaniac, and then believe I hav been pardoned and get what is called religion? I think this spirit-rapping can be explained by electricity, though I am not posted well enough to do it. If any Spiritualist will find my child or friend in the spirit world and answer the questions I asked, it will come nearer convincing me. I don't take issue with Mr. Higbie for his belief—it is better than the Christian creed—but why don't spirits help to bring criminals to justice? I hav never heard of one yet. They seem like Abraham and Lazarus—with no sympathy for the suffering of humanity. H. J. WOOD.

TRAVERSE CITY, MICH., March 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I do not think I could get a better paper to help along Freethought, and I liv in a neighborhood of bigots, some of them believing and preaching that education only injures mankind. One offers to take his Bible and argue with anyone, and prove by the Bible that a moralist is of more damage in society than a rake or drunkard, and I do not know but that he can, as the Bible is a very crooked book.

Some time ago we had a literary society, and were having a very pleasant time when, all at once, the Christians finding that we were drawing the largest crowd to our meetings, and there was a falling off of members of their revivals, they kicked up a row and asked the director to order us out of the school-house. Finding that to be a failure, they began to preach about such a society being a sin. That aroused a few of our members, and my brother rehearsed a declamation entitled, "The Devil is Dead." The preacher got to hear of it, and preached a sermon on, or about, the devil. He said: "Somebody said the 'devil is dead,' but I tell you he is not; he is going around getting converts every day." We then invited the preacher to our meeting and rehearsed the piece of poetry to him entitled, "Why Does not God Kill the Devil?" It was too good; he left the meeting before it was over with.

After this we concluded to discontinue our meetings, as they were causing so much trouble.

At last the revivals had a damper put on them by the appearance of a certain evangelist preacher, calling himself W. Davy, and claiming to hav been a partner of Moody, traveling with him in some of his circuits, especially in New York, Chicago, and other large cities.

Davy preached hell-fire and brimstone as of old, and, I am sorry to say, converted some of the brightest of our neighborhood. At last, thinking to do the preacher some worldly good, the young converts got up a social for him, and raised $7. The following night they gathered as usual around the school-house to hear more about the torments of hell, which they had just escaped, but no Davy appeared. On investigation the next day, it was found that he had left his wife and child in the care of neighbors, and had driven to town to "blow in" his $7 in a saloon and a house of ill fame. A couple of days after there was seen a few of the converted ones gathered around their drunken savior trying to persuade him to go home with them. "For humanity's sake," said one, "I helped him home, but it has shaken my belief in religion, and especially the ministry. I think," he said to me, "that it will be the last time that I shall put confidence in a preacher."

Well, I must close. I would like to tell you, if I had the time, of the success I hav had with the illustrations in your paper; they set a good many to thinking, some of them that words could never affect.

I wish some good lecturer would happen up here. We hav a town of about four or five thousand inhabitants, and a hall which would accommodate about six or seven hundred people—the Ladies' Library Hall. I do not know whether it could be got for a Freethinker or not, but I guess it could, for there are quite a number of Liberals in Traverse City, and I would giv considerable, according to my means, to hear Robert G. Ingersoll. I sincerely believe that that man's name will be looked up to and fairly worshiped in one hundred years hence as no Christ ever was before.

I hav been trying to get up a subscription list of five and hav two toward the number. CHARLES A. EMERSON.

PALATKA, FLA., March 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I notice with interest the anxiety evidently felt by a class of your friends lest you may eventually make the discovery that Spiritualism is entitled to the same patient and scientific investigation accorded to evolution, geology, and other not absolutely "positiv" sciences, not to mention their greater fright at the prospect—such as it is—of your making some actual discoveries favorable thereto.

I said, "I noticed with interest," etc.—my interest lies in the fact that your position in the Liberal ranks makes your potency for good or ill equal to that of any and superior to that of most; you are a young man with exceptional natural ability, and the more knowledge you acquire the better can you serve and seek the truth; and it occurs to me that you hav fallen within the only lines that can lead you to an intelligent and satisfactory conclusion upon the whole or any part of the subject. I allude to the lines of actual personal investigation, with an honest determination to seek and follow the truth, let it be found, or lead, where it may.

In looking over the old files of THE TRUTH SEEKER a few days since, my eyes fell upon a communication from this place, printed in No. 19, vol. xii, page 298, which pretty well expresses my views upon the discussion of the subject as well as upon the subject itself; and it occurred to me that many of your controversialists on this and some other themes might profit by observing the advice given in the last paragraph thereof. As I see you are following the lines of that suggestion, I hope you will not abandon your efforts until you learn the facts in the case, and that you will let us hear from you thereafter. LEWIS MORRIS.

BAKER'S CORNER, IND., March 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25, to be appropriated in the following manner: $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another two years, and twenty-five cents for a pamphlet entitled, "For Her Daily Bread." One word for Mr. Heston. The pictures are all right, not just because some one else has said so, but because I always appreciate them; they speak volumes, and no matter how hard household duty is pressing, I must hav a look at the cartoons. They figure a conspicuous part as an educator.

I am very much interested in the discussion between Spiritualists and Materialists. I think this is all right in a Freethought paper. Giv all sides a fair show. Truth, like pure, unalloyed gold, only shows up brighter when roughly handled. Some one has expressed the opinion through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Spiritualism is an outgrowth of orthodoxy, or something to this effect, and, if I mistake not, another that it is a superstitious belief. Now, as for myself, I will not here express an opinion one way or the other with reference to an individualized existence after this life. My purpose here is to refute this testimony so far as my experience with Spiritualists is concerned. My good old parents, now both in their seventy-seventh year, are avowed Spiritualists, and at the same time stanch Freethinkers, also great admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, being subscribers to the same. Before they had any knowledge of the Spiritual philosophy they were stigmatized by their neighbors as Infidels—and justly, too—for they had never had any affinity for the orthodox church and its dogmas. Their case is only a parallel with others who remain firm in the Spiritual belief, whilst those of orthodox faith prior to their professed conversion to Spiritualism could not stand the test, and hav been blown out as chaff and gone back to the church where they rightly belong, not finding enough food in the Spiritual philosophy for their superstition to feast upon.

My letter has already grown too lengthy, but I cannot close without striking one blow for the emancipation of my sex. How any man could hav so far outgrown the church dogmas as to become a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and yet take up his pen and record opposing views in this paper to his mother's enjoying political equality with himself, is something entirely beyond my comprehension! How any man could so far lose sight of respect for his mother, sister, and, mayhap, wife too, as to stigmatize them as "Biddys marching to the polls to vote for the priests and preachers," is an aggravating problem which I cannot solve. I said this writer might hav a wife. I hope he has not. In he has one, in order to insure domestic tranquillity she must certainly be a true follower of Paul. The article containing the above statement was read in your paper published three years ago, but it has been a rankling sore in my mind ever since, and I feel with some of my good orthodox friends that "I cannot breathe my life out sweetly" until I hav given the writer a "piece of my mind." How would it do to undertake to disfranchise the priests and preachers, the non-producing class, and giv hard-working, taxpaying women a chance to exercise for a time the right of electiv franchise? I am inclined to think such a change might be fraught with good.

I am heartily glad to know one thing for certain, that this brother in question is an exception to the general rule. The majority of Liberals are in favor of granting to women the electiv franchise. I am glad also to know that this great reform question has come to stay until it is fairly and squarely met. But, "as those who would be free must first strike the blow," I will be found scoring one for the right whenever and wherever I can, "let the chips fall where they may."

Yours for the speedy advancement of all good and great reforms, SARAH F. BAKER.

CINCINNATI, O., March 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 9th instant, I noticed with pleasure the following remarks by one of your most able correspondents, Mr. Frank Greene: "While THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other like publications, were being cursed and condemned for telling the truth, and forcing their way into recognition against mountains of prejudice, but a tenth of a century ago, few of their supporters believed that a more general demand for Freethought literature would be made so soon. Very few, even the most sanguin, imagined that a work like 'Robert Elsmere' could, in this year of our Lord, attract so much attention and create such a furore, while the much superior writings of William McDonnell—'Exeter Hall,' 'The Heathens of the Heath,' and others—had been so long on the market begging for readers. Such is the advantage of having a quasi-orthodox house for a publisher."

Truer words were never spoken. W. McDonnell's works are, in talent and ability, immeasurably beyond anything in the line of heterodox novels or romances yet written. In powerful argument, in pathetic tenderness, in poetic illustration, he leaves all others far, far behind; and yet, though many able critics are willing to admit that he is the most gifted living writer in this way, how is it that he is comparativly so little known? "Exeter Hall" was first published by the American News Company of New York. The first edition had a rapid sale, but, even before that edition was exhausted, the clergy were aroused and indignant, their suppressing influence was felt, and the author was politely informed that the company would not stand sponsors to a second edition. As the work was widely spoken of at the time, for its good or evil reputation, the publishers of the Banner of Light, Boston, offered to do what the New York company declined, and, at the present time, "Exeter Hall" has reached its tenth or eleventh edition.

"Robert Elsmere" had a powerful send-off when Mr. Gladstone, ex-premier of England, undertook to giv it a review. This undoubtedly has been the main cause of the success. Had Mr. Gladstone noticed that far greater work, "Exeter Hall," or had even Colonel Ingersoll publicly said a word in its favor, the result, to the work and the author, would hav been widely different. Mr. McDonnell is evidently an unassuming man who, in a manner, has been overlooked by the pressure of fourth or fifth rate authors seeking for recognition. He is evidently too independent to solicit any man's indorsement—his works speak for themselvs; the public press, even in some cases with seeming reluctance, has admitted his ability, and no author of light literature, either in England or the United States, has had a higher compliment paid him than when Public Opinion (said to be Lord Palmerston's favorit paper), in a review of the "Heathens of the Heath," expressed itself as follows: "Mr. McDonnell has, indeed, produced an interesting book; his characters are mostly simple and delightful, while his descriptions of scenery are painted by the tenderest hand. . . . Not a few of his readers will hope that the author may, at no distant future, show his undoubtedly brilliant talents in some fitting channel, say, for instance, in a historical work free from the taint of skepticism." Aye, there is the rub! Even twenty years ago "skepticism" in England was, to many, nauseating. Now what a change when the comparativly wishy-washy production of "Elsmere" can find so many readers because Gladstone noticed it! But there is a good time coming—new editions of "Exeter Hall," "The Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," and the "Reminiscences of a Preacher," will be required, and eager readers will find these books for sale on the shelves of the most orthodox publishers, and not confined, as they are at present, to the fearless few.

In conclusion, I wish to say a few words by way of recommendation to my German countrymen.

Zu meinen deutschen freunden in the United States: Viele von meinen deutschen freunden haben ohne zweifel gehört und gelesen von den neuen werk "Robert Elsmere" in England. Die ursache der Beliebtheit dieses buches ist hauptsächlich durch die kritische beurtheilung des Hon. Mr. Gladstone darum in anspruch genommen worden. Es ist gestatted worden bei dem besten kritikern, es nichts besseres in vergleichung kommer kann zu "Exeter Hall" und den andere werken and büchern geschrieben bei William McDonnell so nun mürde ich meinen deutschen. Freunden und bekannten aufs beste nach drücklich empfehlen die werke William McDonnell's zie kaufen, and sie werden sich nicht getäuscht finden dieselben zu lessen, A. SCHWARTZ.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The World is a Chess-Board.

The world is a chess-board,
The game is called life,
The pieces maneuver
In noiseless strife.
Some of the players are
Skilful and shrewd,
Many, however, hav
No aptitude;
And while they are moving,
'Tis solemn to know
Each is pitted against
An invincible foe,
And whether one's side
Is well managed or not,
The result is the same
When the battle is fought.
As the game nears its close
And the pieces move fast,
Then Death's voice is heard,
Calling, "Checkmate" at last.

Lines to a Daughter on Her Birthday.

I come with greetings while I may
Upon this happy natal day:
One little word of mother love
Like message from a carrier-dove.
Whate'er though others bring of cheer,
Of wishes for each coming year,
Of golden books and presents rare,
And gems of art beyond compare,
This simple line shall only be
A token wrought with tears from me.

An emblem set with dewy pearls
In memory of your sunny curls
Beneath the blue of summer skies,
Whose azure blent with laughing eyes;
But ne'er a sculptured image stands
A model for your baby hands,
And never fairy steps as sweet
To mother-heart as baby feet.

The jeweled wheels of Father Time
Turn backward through the winter rime,
Where, on one tender, far-off morn,
A tiny life to me was born
And laid within my waiting arms,
A glad, new guide from earthly harms.
Then shrieked in vain the roaring gale,
I only heard the helpless wail
That bound me heart and soul alone,
And made of life the corner-stone,
Sweet monument of love to be
The seal of our maternity.

Our Boys and Girls.

They should hav good health and strength, ability to play, to run, jump, kick, and roll. They should be truthful, honest, and should practice right dealing. They should certainly be modest, and not appear to know too much, or be too forward in company. They should show respect to their elders and heed their opinions, for a ripe experience givs ability to impart useful and practical information and advice. They should aim to be helpful to parents and friends. There are many little things a boy or girl can do in the home that will lessen the work of parents greatly. They should learn economy and prudence. With these simple principles and a knowledge of the common school branches boys and girls can push their way through the world with honor to themselvs and credit to their parents and friends. S. H. What the Little Ones Are Saying.

MISTAKING A HOLE IN THE ICE FOR THE HOLY GHOST.

That editorial note in the last TRUTH SEEKER about baptizing through a hole in the ice out in Illinois, in defiance of its somber shading of fatal results to one of the candidates, calls to mind the ludicrous exploit to which an imitativ little four-year-old was prompted by witnessing a similar ceremony. Little Maggie went home from the scene fully impressed with the idea that her pet doll, in order to hold caste as a good little Christian doll, must undergo the ordinance of baptism. So the next day, having procured a pitcher of water, this is how—evidently through a slight misunderstanding of the previous day's wording—she got off the ceremony: "I baptize thee into the name of the father, and of the sun, and into the hole you goes," and suiting the action to the word, into the pitcher went dolly.

I hope the foregoing will not be deemed sacrilegious, since it was told to me by an exemplary Christian lady of the Presbyterian persuasion.

And now that pen is in hand, I might repeat some sayings of other little ones which, if not as amusing as the preceding, are at least new.

Aunt Mary had changed her dress, putting on one with a train, noticing which little Rob, a four-year-old, remarked: "Aunt Mary, I think your dress has a great long mustache."

Master Fred, an irrepressible nine-year-old, had been reared in a household where religious observances were conspicuous by their absence. Into a neighboring house where familiar acquaintanceship rendered the preliminary knock quite unnecessary, Fred rushed one morning unceremoniously while the inmates were kneeling around the family altar, on beholding which, to him a novel sight, and calling to mind, no doubt, former sports in that room, he exclaimed: "What new game are you at now?" "But you received no injury," replied the Boy.

"Yes, but I might hav been Broken to Pieces," persisted the Jug.

"Oh, well," observed the Boy as he continued his way, "the Tumble proves how good is the material of which you are made, and I value you twice as much as before."

Correspondence.

CORINTH, ILL., March 20, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter to the Children's Corner. This is my first letter. My uncle takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and he lets my ma hav it to read. I like to read the Children's Corner. I hope this will not go to the waste-basket.

Your friend, MARY ROGERS.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., March 15, 239 E.M.*

DEAR MISS WIXON: While I inclose this small poem let me take this opportunity to tell you, as I hav long thought of doing, how proud I am of our young people—our Sadie Thorpes, our Maude Morrisons, George Remsburgs, and the whole host of them who write so well and do so much for humanity. We shall see their names and their work "as the years go by." Sincerely yours,

MARY B. FINCH.

STOCKTON, CAL., March 17, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Mamma is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to look at the pictures and read the letters from the boys and girls in the Children's Corner. I hav not seen a letter written from this place. We hav two cows and seven head of horses, and I hav a saddle. I love to ride horseback. Mamma has sent for "The Story Hour." We are having vacation now. Our school will commence the last week in March, and then I will go every day. I like to go to school. I am ten years old. I hav no brother or sister. I think this letter is long enough for the first one.

Your Freethinker friend,
VIOLET M. RICH.

DODGE CITY, KAN., March 15, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav not seen any letters from this part of Kansas, I thought I would write one. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and would not be without it, as he likes it very much; also, he takes the Light Bearer, or Lucifer, and Freethought. I like the Children's Corner very much. I don't think you will ever come to Dodge, but if you do, I would be pleased to hav you stop and see me. There hav been no Liberal lectures here lately. I expect this is long enough, so I will close. With much love, I remain,

Your friend, KATIE COLLAR.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

New Publications.

"Roman Rule and Ruin" is a pamphlet published by Putnam & Macdonald, San Francisco. It opens with the motto:

He that recalls the attention of mankind to any part of learning which has been left behind it may be truly said to advance the literature of his own age.—Dr. Johnson.

The writer then proposes to throw light upon the paths of our own age by calling attention to the course of a certain institution of ours when it had power in the past. He undertakes to indicate what would be the conduct of the Roman church to-day, if given power, by exhibiting that indescribably horrible and infamous record of its career that it now so carefully hides. This record is unknown to nine youths out of ten growing up in this country to constitute the guides and guardians of America in her next generation. It is time that it should be put in the hands of every one of them. The price of the pamphlet is 5 cents; for sale, like all books mentioned on this page, at this office.

The English firm of W. Stewart & Co. hav begun the publication of a useful and scholarly series of pamphlets called, "The Gospels Critically Examined." No. 1 is "The Birth of Jesus." The improbabilities, impossibilities, and self-contradictions of the scriptural narrativ of this event are well exposed. Some Christians who are forced to admit the falseness of the astronomy, geology, and science generally, of the Bible, resort to the subterfuge of saying that "the Bible was not given to teach science," and still claim divinity for its moral and spiritual instruction. So our author observes:

A book which professes to guide us to heaven is not worthy of credence if the portion dealing with this life be found untrue. If a guide were published to the star Sirius and to the city London, in which we discover that the latter—of which we hav an opportunity of testing the statements—be found to be mis-described; if we discover that the writer knows nothing of the British metropolis, and describes it merely from imagination or from hearsay, what reason hav we for giving credence to his remarks on Sirius, which we hav not visited? Are we likely to believe the writer of the work?

"Church and State: The Bible in the Public Schools," is a large and handsome pamphlet issued by H. L. Green, Buffalo, N. Y. Freethinkers wishing a work covering the whole ground of Christianity's nature and record, with a thorough exposure and denunciation of the Blair bill, may confidently send for this. It will be good for their own reading, and good to lend in anti-Blair propagandist work. We copy one good point:

If a man—but he must be an intelligent and decent one—happened some day to be present in a school in Chicago where his sixteen-year-old daughter was engaged with the rest of the scholars in reading the seventh chapter of Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians as the one which fell out to be read in course, and he joined devoutly in the exercise, would he not, when the shock was over, and he came to reflect upon it, infinitly prefer that his daughter would form her opinions on the subject of love and marriage, and the relations she is to sustain to her future husband, according to the noble teachings of Robert Ingersoll, in his reply to Cardinal Manning, published in the November number of the North American Review, instead of the low conceptions of the "inspired apostle?" According to Ingersoll, love is a holy sentiment, and, in true marriage, the wife is an object of the husband's purest worship and devotion. According to Paul, love is mere lust, and the wife is only a legalized prostitute, hired, in consideration of her food and clothing, for the purpose of keeping the saints from indulging in sexual promiscuity among the Corinthian women.

Price, 10 cents; five, 30 cents; ten, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

At last we hav the long-wanted means of silencing those Christians continually inquiring for our great men, and asserting that all great men hav been on the side of Christianity. J. M. Wheeler, the scholarly English Freethinker, is compiling "A Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers of All Ages and Nations," and it is being published in parts. Part I is ready, and contains names and biographies from A to Ba. A very few may be mentioned. Abelard (b. 1079), "almost the first," says the historian Hallam, "who awakened mankind, in the age of darkness, to a sympathy with intellectual excellence." Abbot, Francis. Adler, Felix. Alembert, Jean le Rond d', one of that illustrious group of great men, the Encyclopedists, contemporaneous with Voltaire, who freed France from its monstrous incubus of monarchy and ecclesiasticism. Alfieri, famous Italian poet. Alfonso the Wise, king of Castile. Allen, Colonel Ethan, Revolutionary patriot, and author of "Reason the Only Oracle of Man," the first publication in the United States openly directed against the Christian religion. Amberley, Viscount. Andrews, Stephen Pearl, prominent Abolitionist, and profound philosopher. "His principal work is entitled, 'The Basic Outline of Universology' (N. Y., 1872). He also wrote 'The Church and Religion of the Future' (1886). He was a prominent member and vice-president of the Liberal Club of New York, a contributor to the London Times, the New York TRUTH SEEKER, and many other journals." Arago (1786–1853), French Academician, statesman, physicist, and astronomer. Aristophanes, great Grecian comic poet. "He wrote fifty-four plays, of which only eleven remain, and was crowned in a public assembly for his attacks on the oligarchs. With the utmost boldness he satirized not only the political and social evils of the age, but also the philosophers, the gods, and the theology of the period. Plato is said to hav died with Aristophanes's works under his pillow." Aristotle, the most illustrious of ancient philosophers. "His inculcation of ethics as apart from all theology, justifies his place in this list. After the death of Alexander, he was accused of impiety and withdrew to Chalcis, where he died B.C. 322. Grote says: 'In the published writings of Aristotle the accusers found various heretical doctrins suitable for sustaining their indictments; as, for example, the declaration that prayer and sacrifices to the gods were of no avail.'" Arnold of Brescia. Arnold, Matthew. Aurelius, Marcus Antoninus, Roman emperor and stoic philosopher. "His 'Meditations,' written in the midst of a most activ life, breathe a lofty morality, and are a standing refutation of the view that pure ethics depend upon Christian belief." Austin, John, standard writer on jurisprudence. Averroes (Muhammad Ibn-Ahmad Ibn Rushd), Abu al Walid, Arabian philosopher, born at Cordova in 1126, died at Morocco, Dec. 10, 1198. "He translated and commented upon the works of Aristotle, and resolutely placed the claims of science above those of theology. He was prosecuted for his heretical opinions by the Mohammedan doctors, was spat upon by all who entered the mosque at the hour of prayer, and afterward banished. His philosophical opinions, which incline toward Materialism and Pantheism, had the honor of being condemned by the University of Paris in 1240. They were opposed by St. Thomas Aquinas, and when profoundly influencing Europe at the Renaissance through the Paduan school were again condemned by Pope Leo X. in 1513." Bagehot, Walter, author of "The English Constitution." In "Physics and Politics," a series of essays on the evolution of society, he applies Darwinism to politics. Bain, Alexander, Scotch philosopher. His "The Senses and the Intellect" and "The Emotions and the Will" constitute the best systematic exposition of the human mind extant. Bakunin, Russian revolutionist against despotism. Barlow, Joel, American statesman and minister to France. He translated Volney's "Ruins," an Anti-christian work, and contributed to the literature of the Revolution. When the eminent Christian, Robespierre, contrived the arrest of Paine, then a member of the French Convention, it was to Joel Barlow that the latter intrusted the manuscript of the first part of the "Age of Reason." Readers of that book will remember the passage: "Conceiving, after this, that I had but a few days of liberty, I sat down and brought the work to a close as speedily as possible; and I had not finished it more than six hours, in the state it has since appeared, before a guard came there about three in the morning, with an order signed by the two committees of public safety and surety-general, for putting me in arrestation as a foreigner, and conveyed me to the prison of the Luxembourg. I contrived, in my way there, to call on Joel Barlow, and I put the manuscript of the work into his hands, as more safe than in my possession in prison; and not knowing what might be the fate in France either of the writer or the work, I addressed it to the protection of the citizens of the United States." Baudelaire, distinguished French poet. Bauer, eminent German biblical critic. These names are but a few among a very large number. Freethinkers would do well to get this work part by part, and if they hav a cyclopedia handy refer to it for information on the principles and system of thought of each subject of the biographer. Thus a great store of learning would be accumulated. It would also be a good work to giv out to children for the same purpose. The price is 25 cents per part.

The Freethinkers' Magazine for April contains a full-page steel-plate portrait of Dr. R. B. Westbrook, president of the American Secular Union, a good likeness of J. J. McCabe, and full biographical sketches of each. The contents are very valuable, including "Respiration," by Prof. Hermann Ohlsen; "The Logic of a Miracle," by L. K. Washburn; "Did Bacon Compose the Shakspere Poetry?" by J. J. McCabe; "Church and State"—concluded; "The Late Amy Post"—obituary, by Parker Pillsbury; "The Death Penalty," by A. Schell; a poem "To Giordano Bruno," and much other valuable matter. For sale at this office. Price, 20 cents.

J. P. Mendum, Investigator office, publishes one of the best lectures of that admirable speaker, L. K. Washburn, "The Protestant Menace to Our Government." The pamphlet deals crushing blows at the Blair bill, and is a good one to distribute. It is pleasing to read a style in which the author goes so straight to the point. For specimens:

I insist that while every religion is free to propagate its faith by all the ecclesiastical arts known to priest and minister, no church has the right to claim the power of the law to shield it from just criticism, or to enforce its faith upon the people. . . . The Protestant church asks our government to giv it the right to teach its dogmas to our children, when there is not a Christian minister on the earth that can defend these dogmas before the court of common sense. . . . Here is the truth: This bill is not to secure to those who wish to observe the Sabbath in a religious manner the right to do so, but it is for the purpose of preventing those who wish to observe it differently from so doing. . . . This act of desperation on the part of the Protestant Christians of the United States is a confession that their religion is a failure, that without the arm of the law to compel people to observe Sunday as a holy day, the church is powerless to secure such observance. . . . Let Congress pass this national Sunday law, and it will soon be asked to pass a law for the endowment of the church and the support of the clergy. . . . The Protestants of this land are not restrained from teaching their religious dogmas or observing the ceremonies of their religion. Worship is free. A clergyman may teach the most absurd faith, the most ridiculous superstition, and the law protects him. It is not for liberty of conscience that the Christian church demands the passage of this Sabbath bill; it is to kill liberty of conscience and take away the rights of the people. . . . I do not believe that sixty millions of people should be enslaved to please fifteen million bigots.

The price is 10 cents.

In the Popular Science Monthly for April Prof. Joseph Jastrow in "The Psychology of Spiritualism" affirms the falseness of all Spiritual phenomena, and attempts to explain the nature of those mental faculties that cause the reception of the Spiritual belief. He givs an estimate of the numbers of Spiritualists:

To-day Spiritualists count their adherents by millions. In 1867 there were estimated to be three millions in America. They publish about one hundred journals, hailing from all parts of the world (twenty-six of them appear in America).

Professor Romanes has a chapter on "The Derivativ Origin of The Human Mind," taken from his book, "Mental Evolution in Man"—a book which Freethinkers would find it profitable to procure. He shows the presence in the lower animals of nearly all our emotions, volitions, and intellectual processes, and argues conclusivly that the human mind is an evolutionary outcome from that of the lowest orders of life. The editor of the Monthly castigates the latest pietist who has made an ass of himself, as follows:

It is a somewhat melancholy thing to reflect that, while we hav a ministry of truth in the men who, with dispassionate minds, are applying themselvs to discover the laws of nature and the true succession and affiliation of historical phenomena, we hav also a ministry of error devoted to opposing, one by one, the conclusions of science, and fostering in the minds of those to whom it is addressed habits of false and inconclusiv reasoning. We may quote, as an example of the first, the work of a man like our valued contributor, Dr. Andrew D. White, whose articles on "Demoniacal Possession and Insanity" in recent numbers of this magazine hav attracted so much attention. We regret to hav to quote as an illustration of the second the recent utterances, on the very same subject, of a man who stands to-day in what but lately was, perhaps, the most progressiv pulpit of the whole country, that of Plymouth church. The Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott is a man of fine sympathies, of wide culture, and of much moderation of character and judgment. He is a man to whom we should hav been disposed to look for steady work in the direction of sound and reasonable views; particularly considering the vantage-ground he occupies as successor to one who, whatever his faults and eccentricities, was ever looking toward the light, and had thoroughly reconciled himself to the leading tenets of modern science. Instead of this, however, we find him accepting to the fullest extent the doctrin of demoniacal possession, and defending it by arguments of the most sophistical character. While the ex-president of Cornell is laboring to banish from men's minds the last vestiges of belief in diabolical agency, the successor of Beecher is handling the devils of ancient narrativ with all the tenderness and respect due to the most venerable possessions of the human race. Let us, then, briefly examin what this prominent divine has to say on the topic in question. Dr. Abbott announces the theory that "evil spirits exercise an influence over mankind." He explains later that by "evil spirits" he means "disembodied spirits;" and adds that there is "nothing unnatural" in their exercising the same kind of control over men that masterful characters exercise over others of weaker will. . . . Charles J. Guiteau, of repulsiv memory, he considers to hav been a man possessed. . . . What lusts are, we know; what devils are, we know not, nor hav we any means even of certifying ourselvs in regard to their existence. Why, then, frame hypotheses beyond all need for them? . . . We do not doubt, indeed, that the amiable Brooklyn divine would gladly throw the whole doctrin of devils overboard, as not only useless but hurtful, were it not for the sanction which he understands it to receive from the scriptures. . . . Take the case of Guiteau. If he had a devil, why did no one of the hundreds of thousands of orthodox believers throughout the country cast that devil out? What do we read? "These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils." Did anyone so much as try to cast the devil out of Guiteau? The only utterance we distinctly remember as proceeding from the pulpit at the time was a passionate demand by the eloquent preacher of the Brooklyn Tabernacle for the hanging of Guiteau on a gallows as high as Haman's. If Guiteau really had a devil, it was certainly hard on him that the faith of the Christian world was at so low an ebb that no one cared even to try to relieve him of it. Who knows what an innocent and amiable person he might hav become if the uncanny tenant could only hav been dislodged? . . . Surely it is time that, for men as intelligent and with as liberal instincts as Dr. Abbott, the bands of authority were broken in matters of this kind. What do we want with devils in nineteenth-century thought? Can any honest man say that we need them as a working hypothesis for scientific purposes? Would not such a hypothesis rather prove an obstacle to scientific investigation by drawing attention away from the natural antecedents of crime and insanity? What misery has been wrought by this doctrin in past ages Dr. White has well shown. To-day it is a mere wretched survival from ages of ignorance, and one which a wise man, if he cannot afford openly to combat, should at least studiously and conscientiously ignore.

The price of the Popular Science Monthly is 50 cents per copy; $5 per year.

The North American Review for April further confirms our disposition to pronounce that periodical the very first of the high-class reviews and magazines. Colonel Ingersoll takes up the question of Agnosticism, which has been brought into special notice by Professor Huxley's recent paper in the Nineteenth Century, and in his usual eminently clear and brilliant style explains why, in his opinion, the Agnostic's attitude is more reasonable than the Christian's faith. We reprint the article on another page. Senator Chace, of Rhode Island, who has just resigned, discusses Congressional salaries, and contends that Senators and Representativs are sadly underpaid. Another political topic of interest at present—the question of the surplus and of an extra session of Congress to revise the tariff—is handled by Senator Allison, of Iowa. The symposium in this number relates to the prevention of collisions at sea, which is the chief subject to be considered at the approaching international marine conference; expert opinions are expressed by Captain Kennedy, late of the Germanic; Captain Brooks, of the Arizona; Captain Burton, of the Coptic, and Captain Boyer, of La Champagne. The Rev. Dr. Abbott, editor of the Christian Union, points out the differences between the underlying principles and methods of Christianity and those of Socialism. Yan Phou Lee, who was recently graduated from Yale College, makes a strong plea in behalf of the Chinese in America, and Mr. George Haven Putnam tells of the advantages that would result from international copyright. An interesting chapter in reference to the assassination of Lincoln, with inside facts regarding Booth, Mrs. Surratt, and others, is narrated by John T. Ford, formerly proprietor of Ford's Theater, in which the martyred president was shot. Dr. W. S. Searle describes many of the idiosyncrasies of alcohol, and some entertaining speculations in reference to the probability of navigating the air are furnished by Carl Blind. Per number, 50 cents; per year, $5.

Mrs. E. Lynn Linton, the distinguished English authoress, has written a book presenting that view of Christ by which he is regarded as a radical reformer, Socialist, and revolutionist. The title is "The True History of Joshua Davidson." This Joshua Davidson, a man who endeavors to follow with the closest imitation the conduct of Christ, after a life of persecutions from powers spiritual and temporal, is finally brought to a scene in which he is denounced by a preacher, as follows:

Mr. Grand, the clergyman, rose, and standing up on a chair on which he had been sitting, waved his hand for silence.

"Friends," he said, "I am glad that by your honest English love of law and God, you hav shown what you think of the poison this demagog would hav poured into your ears. I know that man well," pointing to Joshua; "I hav known him from a boy; and I can bear my testimony to the fact that he has been an ill-conditioned, presumptuous, insolent fellow from the first. I know that he has led an infamous life in London; and that he kept such a disorderly house the police were obliged to interfere; and he was imprisoned for the offense. Loose women, thieves, burglars—all the scum of the earth hav been his chosen companions; and, to crown all, he went over to Paris at that awful time of the Commune, when, if ever hell was let loose on earth it was then, and joined himself to that band of miscreants who disgraced the very name of humanity. And now he has the audacity to come before you, honest and sober men of Lowbridge, loving your queen and country, abiding by the laws, and fearing God as I hope you all do. And what for?—to praise that pandemonium of vice and crime—the Paris Commune—and blasphemously to liken those fiends in human shape to our Lord and the holy apostles; to incite you to a rebellion as bloody as that; and more than all this—to pick your pockets of your honest wages, that he, an idle vagabond, who won't work, may wander about the country, sowing his poison everywhere, while living on the fat of the land. Giv him your minds, my men; and let him understand that Lowbridge is not the place for a godless rascal like him at any time—and by no means the place for an Atheist and a Communist!"

Then he got down, and the men cheered him as lustily as they had hissed Joshua.

I will do Mr. Grand the justice to say that I do not think he intended his words should hav the effect they did hav. Gentlefolks do not often incite to riot; and a clergyman does not like to be the wirepuller for a murder. But, maddened by their own misconceptions to begin with, and excited still more by their parson's abuse and encouragement to violence as it were, the audience lost all self-control. A dozen men leaped on the platform, and in a moment I saw Joshua under their feet. It was in vain then for Mr. Grand to cry "Order"—for the two policemen at the doors to be sent for—for me to lay about me as hard as I was handled. The men had it all their own way. They were the representativs of law and order in their own minds, the champions of God and religion, and they regarded it as a sacred duty to take it out of this godless Anarchist. Beaten, kicked, held back by a dozen or more, I could not help him. They beat me first; and then the police beat me, and knocked me about savagely with their truncheons, because I struggled to get free, and to get to Joshua. He was lying on the ground, pale and senseless, with a stream of blood slowly flowing from his lips; while the men trampled on him and kicked him, and one, with a fearful oath, kicked him twice on the head. Suddenly a whisper ran round them, and they all drew a little way off; when, at a sign from one of them, the gas was turned down, and the place cleared as if by magic. When the lights were up again, and I went to lift him—he was dead.

I know no more—no more than this, that the man who had lived the life after Christ more exactly than any human being ever known to me, who had given himself to humanity and poured out his strength like water for the sacred cause, who had been loving, tolerant, pitiful to all—that man was killed by the Christian Party of Order; his memory denounced on the one hand as that of a bloodthirsty revolutionist who was justly punished for his crimes, on the other, as that of a presumptuous and heretical enthusiast who had insulted God and dishonored the true faith. But the same things were said of the early Christians as hav been said of him, of the Communists, and of all reformers of all times.

The world has ever disowned its Best when they came; and every truth has been planted in blood, and its first efforts sought to be checked by lies. So let them rest, our martyrs whom men do not yet know; as neither did they know eighteen hundred years ago the crucified Communist of Galilee—he who dwelt with lepers, made his friends of sinners, and preached against all the conventional respectabilities which society then held in honor.

ARGUMENT

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Gems of Thought.

PARABLES: Indirect ways of expressing facts, much affected by the godhead in holy writ, doubtless for fear he should speak too plainly to the favored he wishes to instruct.—Voltaire's Pocket Theolo v.

EVERY sect is a certificate that God has not plainly revealed his will to man.—Ingersoll.

ISAIAH is, upon the whole, a wild, disorderly writer, preserving in general no clear chain of perception in the arrangement of his ideas, and consequently producing no defined conclusions from them. It is the wildness of his style, the confusion of his ideas, and the ranting metaphors he employs, that hav afforded so many opportunities to priestcraft in some cases, and to superstition in others, to impose those defects upon the world as prophecies of Jesus Christ. Finding no direct meaning in them, and not knowing what to make of them, and supposing at the same time they were intended to hav a meaning, they supplied the defect by inventing a meaning of their own, and called it his.—Paine.

THE argument . . . would hav all the force which is attributed to it, were the objectors able to lay their finger on a single Old Testament prediction clearly referring to Jesus Christ, intended by the utterers of it to relate to him, prefiguring his character and career, and manifestly fulfilled in his appearance upon earth. This they can not do. Most of the passages usually adduced as complying with these conditions referred, and were clearly intended to refer, to eminent individuals in Israelitish history; many are not prophecies at all; the messiah, the anointed deliverer, expected by the Jews, hoped for and called for by their poets and prophets, was of a character so different, and a career so opposit, to those of the meek, lowly, long-suffering Jesus, that the passages describing the one never could hav been applied to the other, without a perversion of ingenuity, and a disloyal treatment of their obvious signification, which, if employed in any other field than that of theology, would hav met with the prompt discredit and derision they deserve. There are, no doubt, scattered verses in the prophetic and poetical books of the Hebrew canon, which, as quotations, are apt and applicable enough to particular points in Christ's character and story; but of what equally voluminous collection of poems or rhetorical compositions may the same not be said?—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

THE doctrin giving to the word its three senses, viz., the material, or external, the spiritual, or internal, and the celestial, is open to this objection, that if applied to Mother Goose's melodies it produces the same wonderful results as if applied to the Bible. It is a mere device for pumping into a narrativ whatever "sense" or nonsense the interpreter desires to get into or out of it. Thus take the simple stanza from Mother Goose:

Jack and Gill
Went up the hill
To fetch a pail of water,
Jack fell down
And broke his crown,
And Gill came tumbling after.

In its material sense it is a mere rhyme got up to please a child's taste for the jingle of words. Now if we say that Jack means the Western Roman empire, Gill means the Eastern Roman empire. Their joint ascent of the hill signifies their mutual competition with each other for wealth, territory, and power. The object of these competitions, viz., "to fetch a pail of water," was to advance the interests of civilization upon the earth, water being typical of civilization, both as to its purifying qualities and its mobility. Just as they were about perfecting their civilization. "Jack fell down," etc., i. e., the Western empire passed under the sway of the Infidel, "and broke his crown," i. e., he lost his share of the scepter of the world. "And Gill came tumbling after" indicates the fall of the Eastern empire. We might go on and giv to these words a third celestial sense whereby it would refer to the struggle of the soul with its passions, but this suffices to show that this paltering with words in a double and triple sense is mere jugglery.—Denslow.

MODERN scholarship joined with common sense, has shown that every claimed fulfilment of Bible prophecy is fairly met by the the explanation of coincidence, forgery, invention, or the correct date of the writings.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

IF the naked are clothed, men must clothe them; if the hungry are fed, men must feed them.—Ingersoll.

THERE is an Order of Nature, pervading alike the actions going on within us and without us, to which, from moment to moment, our lives must conform, under penalty of one or other evil; therefore our first business must be to study this Order of Nature.—Spencer.

IT is only a question of man's knowledge or ignorance as to in what degree events shall be benefits or injuries.—Robert C. Adams.

Odds and Ends.

"I AM humble," said the preacher; "anything is good enough for me." "I believe you," replied his listener; "I hav heard your sermons."

MOTHER: "Yes, Bobby, God made you. I'm surprised that you should hav forgotten that." Bobby: "Well, it happened a good while ago, ma. Seven years is a long time for a boy to remember anything."

WICKED boarder (on Sunday): "You do not read Sunday papers, I believe, Mrs. De Goode?" Mrs. De Goode (severely): "No, I do not, and I am grieved to find that you do." "I was only going to say that this copy of the Sunday Scandal has a two-column account of that minister who was arrested for improper——" "Oh, if there is anything in the paper about ministers, that's different. Thank you."

A MARCH IDYL.

Three women, good neighbors, did all agree,
On St. Patrick's day, when the rain came down,
To lock the door on their husbands three,
Who delighted with red to paint the town
While the bands outside were droning.
Three stovepipe hats of different shapes
Came silently down three fire-escapes;
Three husbands climbed over the fence like apes
And left their wives ochoning.

Three women leaned out of a casement high
On St. Patrick's night when the moon shone down,
And saw 'neath the light of a cloudless sky
Three men come rolling up, muddy and brown,
The sidewalk completely owning.
For men must march and women must wait,
And in forcible terms mankind berate,
As they open the door when hours are late,
For husbands they'd rather be stoning.

—Judge.

SOME railroad man has given to the world what he knows on this subject in the following: "A sleeper is one who sleeps. A sleeper is that in which the sleeper sleeps. A sleeper is that on which the sleeper runs while the sleeper sleeps. Therefore, while the sleeper sleeps in the sleeper, the sleeper carries the sleeper over the sleeper under the sleeper, until the sleeper which carries the sleeper jumps the sleeper and wakes the sleeper in the sleeper, by striking the sleeper under the sleeper o the sleeper, and there is no longer any sleeper sleeping in the sleeper on the sleeper."

WORSHIP.

Wide open stood the church's doors,
And hundreds crowded there,
Bedecked in Sunday finery
Because the day was fair.

A stranger strolling by the place
Approached and bowed his head,
And to the sexton, gray and grim,
He reverently said:

"Methinks, 'tis well, the people should
Upon the Sabbath day,
Collect in numbers such as these,
To contemplate and pray.

"How noble is the thought, my friend,
That those from far and near,
The rich and great, do congregate
In humble suppliance here."

The sexton wiped his weeping eyes,
And sadly turned away;
"The president, you know," he said,
"Comes here to church to-day."

WHY do not the papers come out and say that Victoria is queen of England?

Because everyone knows it.

Why do not the papers say that twice two are four?

Because that fact is already well known.

Can you tell us why the press refrains from stating that Rhode Island is smaller than Texas?

Certainly we can tell you. Everyone is informed on that point.

Now, then, why hav the papers been printing the names of a certain four hundred people as being ladies and gentlemen?

Can it be because they think it is a matter of news to the public, and, unless they were printed down as such, no one would ever know it?—Puck.

THE new German penal code authorizes permanent suppression of offensiv periodicals, and dissolution of radical societies and meetings.

A WELL-PRESERVED copy of Gordon's Geographical Grammar, published in London in 1719, was purchased from a local bookseller the other day. Under the head of Pennsylvania the geographical and grammatical Gordon observes: "The length of the days and nights is much the same here as in New Jersey."

POPULATION is so scattered in New South Wales that the failure of fifty per cent of the voters to go to the polls at a recent exciting election, where the issue was between protection and free trade, is accounted for by the distances many would hav had to travel to cast their votes. In one case, where there was an omission to open polls at a given locality, the electors had to travel two hundred miles or lose their votes.

A NEW YORKER explains why the people of the divided territory of Dakota hav permitted the two parts to go into futurity as North and South Dakota, instead of naming one part prettily as Pembina or Lincoln. It seems that Dakota wheat has so high a rank in the markets of the entire world, and is so much the greatest product of the territory, that neither half of the territory would consent to drop the magic word from its name. The people carried their pride in their name so far as to refuse to consider the idea of one half being called Dakota while the other half went as North Dakota or South Dakota.

THE spring emigration from Europe to the United States has assumed large proportions this year. The arrivals since January at Castle Garden hav added over fifty thousand to our population. Advices from Germany, Italy, the British Isles, and Sweden are such as to lead to the belief that we are about to hav an extraordinary number of newcomers.

A WIFE'S affection may be legally excessiv, according to the argument in a will case in Liverpool. William Evans lived in great happiness with his wife for twelve years, when he died, after a month's illness. Mrs. Evans was by her husband's side constantly, and about a week before his death he made his will bequeathing all his property to her. A second cousin, however, disputed this testament on the ground of "undue influence" during the period of illness.

SINCE the death of John Bright the story told by the late artist Frank Holl is revived: When Mr. Holl was taking the portrait of Bright, the latter said, in speaking of Gladstone: "To think that after we hav trodden the same path together, shoulder to shoulder and hand in hand, we should be forced apart in the evening of our lives. Do you know, Mr. Holl, I seriously fear that my dear old friend's mind has really become radically undermined." When Holl was painting Gladstone at Hawarden, reference was made to Mr. Bright. "Ah?" said Mr. Gladstone, "and how did you find him?" "Fairly well, and he spoke very affectionately of you, Mr. Gladstone." "Did he indeed? It was a cruel blow to be divided on so clear a question after a lifetime of mutual esteem. Tell me, Mr. Holl, did you observe anything in the manner of my old friend which would lead you to believe that his reason was becoming in any way unhinged?"

ACCORDING to a decision just given by Judge Travers of Iowa under the anti-liquor law of the state, cider cannot be publicly sold there; for, as the judge argues, "though it is at first a non-intoxicant, it produces intoxication when taken in large quantities." Whether the makers of apple cider in Iowa will be allowed to continue their business under the law has not yet been decided, but it may be inferred that their mills are illegal establishments. As yet, lemonade may be lawfully quaffed in the state of Iowa.

HERE'S a temperance lecture that has the merit of being true: A Sun reporter met a man the other day who for years kept a well-known up-town grog-shop. "I've given up the business; sold out and quit for good," said the ex-saloonkeeper. "I couldn't stand drunken men. Oh, I could handle them all right—I wasn't afraid of them, but the idea of taking so much money that deprives women and children of necessaries and comforts was too much for me. I used to see poor fellows who got ten or twelve dollars a week come in of a Saturday and blow in half their earnings, and I knew that it meant distress for hard-working women and innocent children. I couldn't keep on taking their money. It broke me up."

ANOTHER victim falls at the hands of Christian science treatment, and the affair produces a profound sensation at Charles City, Ia., where the death occurred. Mrs. A. S. Graves had been ill for several days, and, believing in the efficiency of Christian healing, refused to hav a physician, and relied on the treatment of the healers, who urged her to stand out against the doctors. Mr. Graves, who is a traveling man, was away from home, but was telegraphed if he wanted to see his wife alive to come at once. Immediately upon arrival, seeing the critical condition his wife was in, a doctor was summoned, but too late, for the last hope was gone, and the poor woman died. The indignation of the citizens was aroused to such a pitch that a coroner's jury was impaneled, and, after spending two days in making an examination, made a report condemning the Christian healing or faith cure treatment.

IN Denver, on Sunday, the Rev. Myron Reed, while making an eloquent appeal for a day of rest for barkeepers and whisky-sellers generally, remarked: "I believe in a day of rest. It is good for the wheel of the wagon, it is good for the master, and it is good for the horse. At my house Sunday is the best day in the week. If we ever hav a good dinner it is on that day." The Field and Farm adds: "We would like to ask the reverend gentleman what's the matter with the servant girl or the cook that prepares his sumptuous Sunday dinner! Is she not human? Is she not as good as a barkeeper? Does she not also need rest? There is less labor in mixing a toddy or a cocktail than in cooking a goose, and the poor woman who works in the kitchen over a hot stove fourteen to sixteen hours a day needs rest as well as does the horse or the able-bodied barkeeper who is only on duty a part of the day. We are in favor of preachers eating cold lunch on the Sabbath that their overworked wives and oft-times ill-treated servants may hav a little rest. Let the reform commence in the right place."

Humbug.

As the dictionary-makers would express it, humbug is a compound word of low origin, but its antiquity dates in posse from the birth of language. The term has two applications, one impersonal, as for example, "that is humbug," the other personal, for instance, "he is a humbug." Every man, being more or less subject to humbug, is in danger of becoming at any time, or all the time, either a conscious or an unconscious humbug. Leaving out of consideration all assumed humbug, adopted merely as a cloak to cover wit or humor and generically harmless, conscious humbug is to be defined as hypocrisy and unconscious humbug as unmistakable evidence of imperfection.

In all classes of people, and at nearly all periods of life, both forms may be manifested in a greater or lesser degree. When a person, be he child or adult, claims to possess knowledge and power which he has not, or professes a belief which he cannot establish by rational testimony, then, whether he is aware of the fact or not, he is a humbug; though not altogether blamable, for as the twig is trained so will the tree develop. We send our children to school, taking trouble to find that kind of school whence, or that particular teacher from whom, we expect the best possible education. We desire the pupil to be so grounded in the elements of the branches of education desiderated, so trained in correct thinking, that he shall, thereafter, hav reason for the faith that is in him, and shall be able to retrace mentally the steps taken in the progress to his present beliefs. School education should be an appropriate preparation for life's later lessons, whereof we apprehend the man is more likely to reap profit if the method of his primary tuition has been founded upon correct principles. It is the ultimate lesson of experience that those who first find out the folly of running counter to the laws of being; who first realize discomfort and positiv loss by excess on the one hand, or from parsimony on the other; who first acknowledge that the best life can be, after all, only a compromise between circumstance and possibility, are they who will the most steadily endeavor to conform conduct to the inevitable course of nature—which, could we conceive it to cease, or even for but one moment to be interrupted, could only giv us, for the world, chaos, and for life, annihilation.

But the humbug thrives and replenishes the earth. Barnum's saying that "the American people love to be humbugged," owes its spice to the fact that no other nation is composed of so many varieties of the outer barbarian. To the republic's own accrued reservoir of humbug has been daily added the drippings of the rest of civildom, sluiced hitherward through the palm-greased waste-pipe of free immigration. No wonder, therefore, if, in this country, the professional humbug should find rich soil for the propagation of his weeds!

Ignorance and immorality joining hands, the professional, the trading, the social, the political, and the religious humbugs spread their branches, and like the upas-trees, do evil work on all who come under their deadly shade.

In professions the dishonesty of humbug impudently asserts itself:

> For all know that quacks are full of pretense,
> And only the ducks go quacking with sense.

In trades, witness the adulteration of food and lying advertisments. Against adulteration there is some feeble legislation, called forth partly by the danger to life, and by the palpable harm done to the health of the people, and partly by the comparativ ease of proof. Against mendacious advertising, however, the only legislation, so far, is aimed rather at indecency than dishonesty, and the responsibility is left with the people to discover, by personal experience and at their own cost, whether the baits held out by traders are genuin or false.

Social humbug is invariably tinged with vanity, and is aping of better appearances than there exists just claim to support. This is, perhaps, the least venal, as it is the most contemptible, form in which the disease manifests itself. Its influence is more general, but happily, its evil more limited than in other forms; yet it is none the less a symptom denoting imperfection. Of this class, the prig, the snob, and the innocuous dude, are familiar specimens. It is evident that the individual who schemes to be taken for better, or richer, or even for worse than his compeers, is seeking that bubble, notoriety, which s ever in danger of being pricked and dissipated by the first jocose gossip who comes along. Instead of gaining the consideration for which he has sacrificed time, tide, and intellect, the society humbug is ridiculed, even by others who occupy the same social plane to which he belongs. "They which hav seen him will say, Where is he?"

Nearly the most abominable form of humbug is that which riots in our political world. For the sake of filthy lucre, pretenders can hardly go greater engths than when aspiring to positions of responsibility and public trust. The proportion of incompetent, or immoral, men seeking office and, by coöperation with others like themselvs, succeeding in filching from better men places which they can only unworthily occupy, is almost too conspicuous for patience. The game to such persons, if they only knew it, is not worth the candle, which also is the country's scandal. Possibly, as an ancient optimistic writer has declared, "the times shall reveal his iniquity, and the earth shall rise up against him."

Having referred thus briefly to immoral, to contemptible, and to abominable humbugs, there but remains to mention the most criminal, because the most subtle and far-reaching in effect, namely, the religious hypocrit, who, as a rule, combines in his person all forms of humbug. Under disguise of superior holiness is concealed the cloven hoof, for he strives to deceive, not only his brother man, but also in the shallows of his mind thinks to down the infinit. How often, for instance, are detected canting humbugs, who hav traded on the reputation of being pillars of the church, subscribers to missions, patrons of the Sunday-school, and supplicators in the prayer meeting! Yet the hands of such pious frauds hav been busy robbing the widow and the orphan and filching from honest industry its savings. Such men, lulling their victims into confidence by soothing shams, as a vampire gently fans the innocent sleeper whose life-blood it sucks, yet insist on closing their eyes, as only obstinate fools can, to the approach of the pursuing nemesis, whose arrival, sooner or later, is the surest of sure things.

Whenever humbug acts, then wrong may be certainly predicated. Lawyers tell us that "for every wrong there is a remedy," adding parenthetically, "or there ought to be." But the existence of wrong is not now at issue. It is an abstract fact, with the origin of which man certainly cannot be fathered. It inheres with the imperfection of humanity, without which, however, progression and advance would hav no theater. Or, to put it another way, if perfection was the absolute rule, there would be no need for effort and no possibility of advance, for there would exist only a dead level of equality, without duty, disciplin, or reward, destitute of hope, and, for want of contrast, no happiness. This, not by way of justification of wrong, nor to indorse evil-doing, but rather to emphasize the necessity of acknowledging in thought, word, and action the stubborn fact, imperfection, so that if the highest pursuit in life is the greatest attainable happiness, the course of human conduct must be so shaped as to avoid, as far as possible, the rocks and shoals of wrong-doing whereon and wherein so many lives hav been wrecked. Evil fastens, like a parasite, upon our imperfections, and thrives best where these are in greatest force. The wisest men, ex officio, best understand and are most ready to admit that for any personal lapsus they will hav a penalty to pay, they or their children after them. No one can permit imagination to run riot, nor formulate a lie, nor act a sham, without thereby bending his manhood before the shrine of the great deity, humbug. Still, as no man can help being more or less a humbug, or, biblically, as "all men are liars," it is well to be chary in passing judgment, or, possibly, better to judge not at all. For inasmuch as no two persons are precisely alike, each springing from a different set of antecedents, causing him to think and act in accord with his particular entity, he being himself, plus circumstances thrown in, and in short imperfect, it is humbug for him to assert that he knows just how far he is a creature of free will, or just how far he is responsible for his conscious or unconscious humbug. Wrong is recognized only by force of consequences, that is, by its evil effects upon the individual or on society. It is eminently humbug to assert or to believe that the consequences of evil can be cut off short, or suddenly absorbed, or totally averted by any mental pretense, for it is not a process such as is involved in blindly believing dogmas which are confessedly mysterious, and only to be understood, if ever, after translation of incorporeal reason into a perfect ego, located somewhere within the mystic portals of an utterly inconceivable future. Imperfect as we all are, yet a minority of our fellow-mortals, affecting spiritual authority, dogmatically assert that only in affairs of this mundane sphere can man be permitted to exercise the virtue of skepticism; only as to material matters may ask to see, to taste, to handle; only for such things may require vouchers or seek the indorsement of rational history. So far, indeed, we agree, but when their command is to lower the flaming sword of reason and bend the knee to fable, or in any way to sacrifice common sense on the altar of mythology, we reply in one word, humbug. Under threat of direct penalty they insist the majority must accept the minority's own particular account of the genesis of human life and of the subsequent entrance of evil thereto, introduced through the agency of an illicit spirit, who, bringing a hybrid metempsychosis into play, successfully buncoed our paradisaical mother-in-law, whereby, alas, pitiful humanity lost irretrievably its primitiv perfection. If such as hold this belief claim direct lineal descent from poor, gullible Eve, there will be few to dispute it. They omit to inform us whether wily Satan took advantage of a moment when the "weaker vessel" was under the influence of a dietary spasm or not, but what exalts admiration is the implication that her assimilativ passion, privily to devour a magic apple, should hav so overwhelmed her presumably perfect reason as to lead her eternally to sacrifice herself, her husband, her home, her prospectiv progeny, and her only covenant with her creator. Yet, we must accept this particular origin of evil in "blind faith," for without it there is no basis for creeds and no hope of hell. And what is their penalty for unbelief? Nothing less than consignment by infinit love to nameless torments, enduring through the countless eons of eternity.

To all this the modern query, "What are you giving us?" is daily growing more imperativ and more general. It is gradually borne in upon even the average understanding that possibly the structural argument thus offered starts from unwarrantable assumption, and even if accepted is apt to arouse skepticism when logic is conspicuous only by absence from the premises.

Consider, if but for the first time, what centuries of time, sums of treasure, and even rivers of blood hav been wasted on such pseudo teaching. Consider further, how it attempts to pervert the universal testimony of experience as to the majestic methods of natural law, whereby the same process which inflicts inevitable and, ceteris paribus, invariable penalty on the lawbreaker, at the same moment enforces the great, unavoidable lesson that he who conforms, as far as possibilities permit, to the code of these laws which no more surely hold the planets in their orbits than they govern the infinitesmal organism and ultimate atom, undoubtedly will be doing his best to increase general freedom from pain, and consequently to secure the greatest possible happiness of all. And were all the misdirected energies of teaching turned into the true channels of progress, how much more rapid would become the amelioration of those pains and penalties which result from humbug and wrong-doing! The profit of beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks would the sooner be gained if our theological faith-temples were transformed into knowledge-halls, and our mystics into demonstrators. If the sincerest religion is the practice of truth, the acquisition of truth cannot be less than a sacred duty; nor can immediate reward be separated from the practice. Let us then rather stray "in fresh fields and pastures new," wherein are to be found "sermons in stones, books in the running brooks, and good in everything." Instead of devoting the seventh day holiday to a genteel thrashing of stale theological vapor, let us hav some hygienic recreation, or exhibit some novel inductions or new economics of force.

If experience teaches even fools, as is said, then how much may not mankind in general expect from the lessons of philosophy and science? All things affecting the reality of life may intelligently be appropria ed for future use, guidance, and benefit. The study of the invariable sequences in nature, the perception that no effect can be manifested without adequate cause, or that every cause is followed by corresponding effect, lead to an abiding conviction of the absolute uniformity of law at all times and in all places, from which emerges a maxim, ever becoming more prominent, namely, to avoid creating such causes as experience has taught can only lead to bad effects. It is for this reason the laws of being are designated beneficent; that they are educativ, and lead to the potent conception, that the trend of the average is upward, and that good will ultimately prevail. And if so, these laws cannot possibly emanate from any contaminated source. If, therefore, there is a spiritual personality originating and in such manner maintaining the universe, the attributes of such spirituality must be such as to leave no room to fear the mysterious future, but rather inspire with hope and giv firm ground for patience, confidence, and courage.

Whether these things be so or not, of one thing feel absolutely certain, that the man who affirms or even suspects he, at least, is no fool, is the biggest humbug in the whole crowd.

"The Second Coming of Christ."

Notwithstanding the popularity of and the widespread belief in the prophecy concerning the second coming of Christ, I believe there are many people who are professedly devout Christians who yet regard the prophecy as nothing but an expectation vainly hoped for but never to be realized. There has always been a tradition in the Christian church that the present state of things would be brought to an end by the reappearance of Christ, who was to reign both as a spiritual and temporal ruler. We are told, also, that certain signs and demonstrations of the most remarkable kind were to be contemporary with the appearance of the "son of man," such as "the destruction of Jerusalem," immediately after which shall "the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not giv her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shakened," etc. "And verily I say unto you, that this generation shall not pass away until all these things are fulfilled." Here is a distinct prophecy, so clear that there is no mistaking its purport. But is it fulfilled? Is the world destroyed? Not only has that generation passed away, but many, and still the prophecy is unfulfilled. The sun has not been darkened, nor has the moon ceased to giv her light, and the stars still shine in brilliant splendor, as if in mockery of such a monstrous blunder. They still ride in triumph through the fields of space, spreading light and warmth to an admiring world.

The anticipation of a coming redeemer to save a lost and degraded humanity has played an important part in all systems of theology. It is candidly admitted that some such anticipation prevailed among the earlier Jews, from the time when the decadence of their nation began down to the advent of Christianity. Now, any man of ordinary intellect can understand such an opinion, when he takes into consideration the character of the Jews and the position of surrounding nations. At the very time when Christ is supposed to hav given utterance to such words Rome was then the mistress of the world. She had deluged Europe with blood, darkened it with desolation, and was still disposed to crush anyone who might deny her supremacy. Knowing this, and being aware of the insolent and rebellious character of the Jews, it did not require a deal of foresight to anticipate the demolition of Jerusalem. Indeed, it would hav been a miracle if it had not been destroyed under the circumstances.

But what of the second advent? Did Christ really appear again immediately after the siege of Jerusalem, as predicted in the gospels? What assurance hav we that the prophecy was given before the event actually occurred? I contend there is not the slightest. If it has been so literally fulfilled, we ought to inquire when it was written. Can this be shown? The books which record it, i. e., the gospels, it has been proved were not written until upward of one hundred years after. How easy, then, to make a capital prediction under such circumstances! What profound sagacity it must hav required to foresee an event of this character! But what of the remainder of the prophecy, concerning the other signs which should mark the second advent of Christ? Did they really occur? Hav they occurred as yet? We think not. And yet all these things were to happen before that generation passed away.

The belief in Christ's speedy coming again prevailed for many years, and therefore it was very easy for Christ at this time to deceive the people into the belief that he was the son of God, or perhaps, being deceived himself into such a belief, that he should thrust himself upon the people at such an opportune moment, when he was almost sure to get their sympathy and support. That Christ wished to intimidate his audience and make them believe that the end of the world was near, may be inferred from his own words, when speaking to his disciples he says: "Verily, I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste death, till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom" (Matt. xvi, 28). "And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that there be some of them which stand here which shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God come with power" (Mark ix, 1). Again we are told, in Luke ix, 27: "But I tell you of a truth, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God."

Thus it may be seen that what Christ really believed was that these things should happen during the lifetime of his hearers, and though he announced emphatically that such would be the case, he candidly confessed that he could not fix the day nor the hour. Why not? If he had the power of foreseeing future events, or if he was divinity, why could he not hav known the time of occurrence as well as the occurrence itself? This is indeed a damaging admission, and vitiates the whole claim of Christ's prognostications to be regarded as an emanation from divinity.

It may, perhaps, be worthy of remark that the prophecy of the end of the world being near at hand, so earnestly taught by Christ and his apostles, completely falsifies the theory of Christianity, for if the world was to come to an end during that generation, how could Christ hav been sent to save posterity, when he himself disbelieved in any future on earth beyond his own times? In short, as strange as it may appear, the Christian religion affords the best refutation of itself. For the Christian must admit that either Christ never gave such a prediction, and thus the scriptures are falsified; or, having given it, he never intended us to hav any scriptures, since, if his prediction proved true, they were entirely useless.

Which of these two dilemmas will the church accept? It certainly cannot accept both.

It must not, however, be expected that these repeated predictions of a future state of things, commending itself to the aspirations both of religion and patriotism, would pass unheeded by the Jews, and the belief in the speedy return of Christ was even believed in after his crucifixion, for no sooner do they meet him again after the resurrection than the same subject, ever uppermost in their minds, recurs to them again. For, upon seeing him, they said: "Wilt thou in time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" What kingdom? Ay, there's the rub! It is not, however, the "kingdom of God" that they wished to be restored, but the "independence of their nation;" and in all probability it is this desire that will explain the zeal with which so many of the people followed him on all occasions and hung upon the words of his mouth.

And accordingly the fact of his accusation before the Roman emperor, his trial, condemnation, and speedy execution, did not deter his followers from maintaining the belief that his glorious promises would be realized, and that he would himself come back to realize them. And, still further, after eighteen centuries hav passed away since the prophecy was uttered, there are still people who are foolish enough to believe that, "although these promises are not yet realized," they will be at some future time. Well may sober-minded and thoughtful people smile at their credulity.

Every student of history will admit that the Jews, neither ancient nor modern, had no expectation of an incarnate deity; the idea as a canon of religious faith is purely of pagan origin; for the Jews only expected, according to their sacred books, a messiah, or a temporary deliverer and a conqueror. According to the forged passage relating to Christ in Josephus, we are told that Christ drew over to him many of the gentiles as well as many of the Jews; but this would hardly seem probable, from the fact that the very people to whom Christ was sent did not accept him, neither do they to this day, and according to the Rev. Dr. Giles, in his "Apostolical Records," p. 139, we find that his own "brothers and sisters did not believe in him from the first," and, he continues, "that it is not certain that the multitude were influenced by other motivs than wonder and reverence for the deeds of mercy and benevolence which he performed."

The chief of these being his doctrins concerning the equal division of wealth, a point round which many men will be found to rally even in our day, though, unlike the modern Socialist, Christ did not wish to raise all to wealth, but to abolish it altogether as a prolific source of evil, and together with the enthusiasm engendered by the opposition of society and the infliction of persecution, would produce the binding together of the followers of the new mysticism. Therefore, without any reference whatever to the supernatural, we can account for in the natural the zeal displayed so prominently by Christ and his followers. Communism and social equality was the dream they indulged in; it was the chief attraction for the poor and oppressed Jew, for the needy Greek, and, in later times, for the slaves of the luxurious patricians of imperial Rome.

It is, however, quite certain that the impression left upon his hearers by Christ was that he should return again during their lifetime, and that this was generally believed in, and even taught, by his disciples is evident from their own words. For example, we find James expressing his impatience at the delay of Christ's second coming; at the same time still insisting that it was "near at hand" (Jas. v, 8). This is afterward indorsed by Peter in his 1st chapter, 13th verse, who still says further on (4th chapter, 7th verse): "For the end of all things is at hand; be ye therefore sober and watch unto prayer." In the first epistle dedicated to John we find similar indications that Christ was expected almost immediately, but "that generation" has long since passed away, and many more besides, and in all probability there are many more to come before Christ shall hav fulfilled his prophecy, and it is a source of regret that with our nineteenth century civilization there should be found those who are still credulous enough and still superstitious enough to look forward to the time when the "son of man" cometh, with power and great glory, to judge both the quick and the dead.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

The Church—Its Moral Status.

When the history of the Christian church is held up before the public gaze in all its hideous features, its devotees, instead of accepting the facts, set about making excuses and resorting to the most untruthful and questionable methods to shield their favorit institution from the odium and condemnation it so justly merits. If the true history of the church was generally understood, it would justly receive public and universal execration at the hands of an outraged and indignant race. One of the standard methods resorted to by the Protestant leaders, in warding off the damaging truths of history, is to blame it all on the old harlot mother, wearing the scarlet, at Rome. Protestant ministers, who know better, will write books and preach sermons to convince their poor, credulous dupes that the church was a most lamentable failure up to the sixteenth century. At that time a young monk, named Martin Luther, became enamored of a pretty young widow, and so strong was his desire to enjoy with her the sweets of married life that he forswore his priestly vows, proving that a woman's charms were more potent with this young acolyte of the church than his religion, with all its promises of heaven upon one hand and threats of hell and purgatory on the other. Thus do we see that the Reformation did not find its origin in Martin Luther's zeal for the cause of Christ, but in his ungovernable passion for the charms of a beautiful woman.

But let us be candid. Did the failure of the church as a reformatory and soul-saving institution end and its success commence in the sixteenth century? A majority of the Protestants so believe, because they are the willing victims of clerical falsehood and misrepresentation.

In proving the pernicious influence of the church as set forth in history, we do not propose to quote a single word from the mouth or pen of its adversaries, but will rely exclusivly on the testimony of its originators and advocates to prove it to be one of the direst curses that ever afflicted the human race. This statement may sound offensiv to the ears of the faithful, but we hav now reached an epoch in the history of the race when the truth should be fearlessly set forth, regardless as to its damaging effect on the old superstitious church fabric. To learn of the true condition of the Reformed church during the early years of the Reformation, we will consult its illustrious founder, Martin Luther. In his "Postilla Adventus," Luther recorded his opinion of the Protestant Christians in a manner not in the least creditable to the character of the new religion of which he claimed to be the founder, and which reveals a state of morals among Luther's converts most disgusting to contemplate. Says he: "The world grows worse and worse, and becomes more wicked every day. Men are now more given to revenge, more avaricious, more devoid of mercy, less modest, and, in fine, more wicked than in papacy." If such was the effect of his doctrins, as observed by himself, why was he not honest enough to confess it and quit?

In his "Table Talk," page 55, Luther makes the following astounding statement: "One thing no less astonishing than scandalous is to see, since the doctrins of the gospel hav been brought to light, the world daily grows from bad to worse." Of course it did, and if Martin had properly understood the pernicious character of the doctrins he was propagating, he would not hav been in the least astounded; for, as the deadly upas sheds its sickening poison, so has the church by its man-degrading doctrins dwarfed and deformed the loveliest powers of the human mind.

In viewing the vicious and depraved effects resulting from the propagation of his second edition of the Christian church, Martin sometimes lost the entire control of himself, and indulged in language neither elegant nor edifying.

In his works, edited by Altenberg, he states with much vehemence that he "would not be astonished if God would open the gates and windows of hell and snow or hail down devils, or rain down on our heads fire and brimstone, as he did on Sodom and Gomorrah. Since the downfall of popery and the cessation of its excommunications and spiritual penalties, the people hav learned to despise the word of God." Awful must hav been the wickedness of this great church reformer and his followers, and fearful must hav been his feelings of self-condemnation, when he confessed that the just deserts of himself and wicked followers would be a copious shower of devils and fire and brimstone, hurled "down" upon them by an infuriate God from the gates and windows of hell. This elegant little impromptu effusion of Martin's would indicate that hell was located somewhere above, or else the devils, fire, brimstone, etc., could not hav rained down from the gates and windows of the infernal prison-house, which is supposed by many to be located in a different direction.

Now, if any honest man or woman can read this pedigree of the early Protestant Christians, as given by their famous leader, without feelings of deep humiliation and disgust, it is because their reason, moral sense, and spirit of refinement hav all been deadened by an undue familiarity with the low and depraved teachings of the Christian's Bible. Luther himself was a victim of these teachings. When his illustrious contemporary, John Calvin, burnt the learned Servetus at the stake, Luther wrote to him a letter commending him for the promptness with which he executed heretics. With such a record, properly understood, who would not loathe the church and its founders? But, at last, Luther's race was brought to a close, and when lying on his dying bed and looking back over his life career, he fully realized the results of his labor, and indulged in the following sad refrain: "I hav spent my strength for naught. Those who are called by my name are, it is true, reformed in opinions and modes of worship, but in their hearts and lives, in their tempers and practices, are not a jot better than the papists." Poor old deluded fanatic! What good he might hav done the world if, when he apostatized from Rome, he had embraced reason instead of a modified form of the old superstition! But like causes produce like effects, and as long as the cardinal church doctrins of "innate sin," "utter self-unworthiness," and "salvation through the merit of Christ" are accepted and believed by the masses, just so long will man occupy a low place in the scale of moral excellence.

Centennial Commemoration.

To the Members of the American Secular Union, and to all Liberals, Deists, Agnostics, and Free-minded Citizens of the United States.

The president of the United States, in response to the requests of "representativs of the religious creeds, both Christian and Hebrew," has recommended that on Tuesday, April 30th, at 9 o'clock in the morning, "the people of the entire country repair to their respectiv places of divine worship to implore the favor of God that the blessings of liberty, prosperity, and peace may abide with us all as a people. "Arrangements are accordingly being made by church organizations of all creeds to meet at the appointed hour for prayer and thanksgiving, and in the words of Cardinal Gibbons "to pray that the spirit of patriotism which burnt in George Washington may continue."

This is preëminently a proper occasion for those who do not classify themselvs either as Christians or Hebrews, but who are Americans and lovers of their country, to testify their appreciation of the blessings of liberty; to express their gratitude to those brave, noble, and broad-minded statesmen who, without the trammels of church or creed, devoted their lives to the founding of the republic; to manifest patriotic devotion to "the foundations of liberty, law, and order," as laid down by the framers of our Constitution; and to reassert their purpose to contest in behalf of secular principles every attempt at invasion of that Constitution by the adoption of "the principles of the Christian religion," or its nullification by the enactment of unconstitutional laws for "the promotion of religious worship." While recognizing the glorious success of our first century, we must cherish and continue the traditions of the Revolutionary fathers who laid the basis of a purely secular republic, a government, in the words of George Washington, "not in any sense founded on the Christian religion;" nor can we safely ignore the dangers with which our future success in the enjoyment of a free government is threatened at the beginning of its second century.

We, officers of the American Secular Union, therefore, recommend the branch organizations, and others similarly minded, to meet at the appointed hour on April 30th, to proclaim their allegiance to our secular, republican form of government, and to renew pledges for its maintenance.

Milleson vs. Proctor.

From the Secular Union platform it is expected that we should hav splendid scientific lectures, but in the past year we hav been unusually fortunate, for since Prof. Jas. Milleson has been one of our members we hav frequently called on him for lectures, he having become a general favorit. I know of no one who can so simplify abstruse scientific problems, make a more compact and entertaining speech, drawing from the every-day facts of life the illustrations for his argument, and at the same time adding to all this the charm of an original though not ornate orator.

Professor Milleson is not merely a scientific theorist but a discoverer, and it now looks as though our friend would receive the fame and recognition so long withheld, but such tardy justice will scarcely be beneficial to him.

As a prelude to his lecture last Sunday night on "What Science Would Substitute for a Creator," Professor Milleson preferred a rather damaging charge against the probity and honor of the late Richard A. Proctor and M. Du Bois, and reception of unfair treatment at their hands has evidently lowered these gentlemen in his estimation. As the statement is a matter of interest to all, I will state the case as nearly as possible in the lecturer's own language. He said:

While I was living at Indianapolis, Ind., in the spring of 1872, and shortly after I had developed this cosmical chain and secured the whole concatenation by known scientific tests from eternity to eternity, I delivered a number of lectures on the subject of World-making in the halls and colleges of that state, and especially in the state University and the Academy of Science at Indianapolis, where my bold and startling discoveries created not a little trepidation. The teachers and preachers generally were up in arms against both my scientific and Materialistic claims.

"I understand your system of nature, professor," said one of these college champions of religious science, "but what is to become of G–o–d if what you say is true?"

"He is a strong reasoner and a dangerous man," said another of these scholarly gentlemen; "he argues G–o–d out of the universe."

The very air was filled with similar expressions, and Richard A. Proctor, the famous London astronomer, was quite promptly imported to this field of consternation. During the winter of 1872–3 he delivered a course of lectures in these same places, as nearly as possible, for the purpose of flatly contradicting my statements in every essential particular. To equip himself for this intended war of extermination, he stayed over Sunday with Prof. Daniel Kirkwood of Bloomington, who had heard and comprehended one of my lectures.

Mr. Proctor then admitted the geological evidences of the growth of our world, for they cannot be gainsaid, but denied the constancy of its source from ethereal crystallization. My claims that aerolites grow to he asteroids, and that some of these bodies may be lassoed while falling toward the sun by the nearer and therefore greater attraction of the planets and thus become their satellites, and afterward grow into the estate of inhabitable planets to take the places of the older ones which are passing away, were denounced by him as impossible visionary speculations, calculated to destroy all confidence in the misguided author.

Of course the brilliancy of his world-wide reputation was calculated to overshadow my little obscure taper before a popular jury of ignorant, religious bigots. Milleson was said to be squelched, and everything moved on serenely as before. The dogmatic mouth was frothing with but one expression. "But what does Mr. Proctor say?" was the stereotyped answer to all my arguments.

But the years were rolling on, and death, the omnipotent leveler, was stealthily approaching the residence of Richard A. Proctor. Within three months after his sudden decease, last September, M. Du Bois, of the Paris observatory, published one of the most important scientific papers of this or any other century, which had been mysteriously suppressed for thirteen years. From this unexpected source we learn that the well-known asteroid Æthra, at that time revolving within less than nine million miles of the planet Mars, was lassoed by his attraction, and captured and converted into a permanent satellite of that planet, on March 12, 1876, just four years after my first public assertions that such must be the order of planetary development, and three years after Mr. Proctor came to America for the sole purpose of strangling these so-called impious propagations of mine.

Now, behold this most important scientific discovery of the age lying like the worthless balls of a thimble-rigger under the palms of Du Bois, Proctor & Co., from 1876 until 1880, and then candidly ask yourselvs if it means nothing. A paper that confirms the truth of every word in my TRUTH SEEKER article, "Here It Is," of Dec. 1, 1888, and also the whole chain of my System of Nature as embodied in my earlier lectures, and published in book-form in 1878, has all this time, and certainly would still hav, been withheld from the public if the great Proctor's life had been spared to keep it covered.

After lying covered with pigeonhole dust for thirteen years, why did M. Du Bois remember that it had not been published so soon after the death of his friend Proctor? Why giv to the public at this particular time in preference to any earlier or later date? If Mr. Proctor had nothing to do with its wrongful suppression, why should his death hav brought it to the mind of M. Du Bois?

Probably these two gentlemen were honorable members of the same astronomical society, and Mr. Proctor had private reasons for concealing from Professor Milleson this indubitable evidence of the truth of his already too well known views. Such an exposure in the hands of Professor Milleson, subsequent to March, 1876, might even blackball the fame of a popular London astronomer among the good people of Indiana.

The fact is, that M. Du Bois, the discoverer of this capturing operation, could hav had no personal reason for its concealment, but many noble ones for its prompt exposure to the public gaze. Professor Milleson was the only living man who had publicly declared that the planets must capture their satellites from the domain of asteroids, and might, therefore, profit greatly from such a confirmation. And Mr. Proctor being the only man whose reputation had all to gain and nothing to lose by such a concealment, we are left without a choice between conclusions. This wilful piece of nefarious trickery attaches itself to the latter gentleman with such an irresistible force of circumstantial evidence that nothing can shield him from its damaging consequences.

METHODIST MEDDLING.

At the weekly ministers' meeting it was resolved to forward a communication to President Harrison protesting against military inspections and unnecessary labor "upon the Sabbath." These sleek gentry should understand there is no "Sabbath" in the United States.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker sent a letter in reply to a resolution of thanks for his speech on Prohibition. Our cabinet certainly contains a prime assortment of fanatics and frauds.

NOT LIVING BY BREAD ALONE.

The Presbyterian and Methodist social unions held a banquet at the Palmer House Monday night, at which five hundred pietists tickled their sanctified palates and told some monumental lies. Rev. H. B. Ridgeway spoke of "Christian Education in its Relation to the Republic." He said that Christian education was necessary for the preservation of good government, and without it Anarchy and ruin would result. He claimed that the Methodist bishops were the ones who first began to agitate the subject of the centennial celebration, an object which they all were heartily in favor of.

"Christianity and the Founders of the Republic" was the Rev. J. H. Barrows's subject, and the speaker, "sketching the lives of the leading men of the Revolution," we are informed by the reporter, "proved that, in addition to being good patriots, they were also good Christians."

Rev. Frank M. Bristol poured forth his eloquence on "Christianity Essential to the Perpetuity of the Republic." This shows the drift of modern orthodoxy and the concerted efforts that are making to crucify truth and liberty. I replied to these misrepresentations, but as the article has not yet appeared it is not likely that it will ever see the light of day.

GOVERNOR FIFER'S FIRST.

The governor's proclamation setting apart April 30th as a day of patriotic observance is quite a disappointment to the ministerial crowd who are booming this centennial as a drawing card for a declining orthodoxy. With the exception of thanks to the "supreme being" and the formality of "this year of our Lord," it is quite a sensible secular document, the keynote of which is given in "demonstrating the capacity of mankind to govern themselvs." The Times, which has taken some new man at the helm, and who is evidently no friend to Freethought, says "it is too verbose, too oracular and patronizing in tone." It is a decided improvement, which, however, can still be bettered.

The following circular is issued by the Union League Club, the treasurer of which is a renegade Freethinker who was connected with the German rebellion of 1848, but since he became a millionaire cannot afford to be a man. Note the craven crawling of this toadying to the Christian religion:

In Chicago there will be a complete suspension of business, and an assembling of the people in all the churches at as early an hour as 9 o'clock, for religious services of thanksgiving and praise to God, as did our forefathers one hundred years ago, to be followed by the gathering together in the schools of the county, public and private, of their two hundred thousand scholars for appropriate exercises, addresses and national music, raising of flags on the school buildings, and for the presentation to the pupils of centennial medals, as souvenirs of the patriotic occasion. Later in the day, the adult citizens will assemble in the largest halls to listen to the distinguished orator; and, finally, the exhibition in the evening of fireworks to conclude the patriotic program.

"CHURCH AND STATE."

H. L. Green, of the Freethinkers' Magazine, has just issued a most valuable brochure of twenty-eight pages of the size of the Magazine. Those who hav read the logical articles by "Jefferson," which hav appeared in the last three issues, will be glad to procure them in a convenient form. The article is timely, and is a splendidly written defense of the secular school system. This pamphlet should be circulated by tens of thousands.

The Bruno Statue at Rome.

The second $500 necessary to make the $1,000 promised rolls up slowly but surely, as the account below shows. The chance for the honor of appearing on the list of contributors which will be sent to Rome grows less, but the time is short, and those who hav means should now step to the front and close the matter before the end of the month. I hope that this will be the last call.

Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds Going West.

I returned home here to North Parma, N. Y., and three days after was taken down with inflammatory rheumatism. I hav suffered fearfully for the past three weeks, but am now recovering.

Mrs. Reynolds is advertised to lecture before the Secular Union at Cleveland, O., on Sunday, April 14th. I shall accompany her there, as we hav decided to go to Walla Walla, Washington Terr., and make that place our headquarters for the next three months, with a view of making our permanent home in that, or some other city of Washington or Oregon.

Mrs. Reynolds will lecture at Walla Walla, Sundays, May 5th and 12th, and then make a lecture tour alone through Washington and Oregon, to the Pacific coast, and return to Walla Walla. Friends desiring to secure her services should write immediately. Address Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, Walla Walla, Washington Terr.

I propose to devote the greater part of my time and best energies for the next three months to building up and advancing the interests of the Walla Walla Liberal Society, lecturing on week-day nights in such places as are reachable, so I can return to Walla Walla every Sunday.

I hav shipped the tent to Walla Walla, and propose to again use this very best and most effectiv method of propaganda work as opportunity affords.

My being severely sick, confined to my bed, and suffering intense pain, is the reason friends and correspondents hav been neglected.

I rely on the genial climate of the glorious West to fully restore me to health and strength.

Mrs. Reynolds and myself alike desire lecture engagements for every night in the week, and every Sunday afternoon and evening. Letters addressed to Mrs. F. C. Reynolds or myself will receive immediate attention. C. B. Reynolds.

The Single Tax.

In the Open Court of January 17th, "Wheelbarrow" records his agreement with Henry George as to the "justice and practicability of land taxation." But he interposes several objections to George's arguments and their foundation, and directly, and by inference, charges George with overlooking important factors. I will confine myself as nearly as possible to the direct opposit of "Wheelbarrow," and my authority will be found in the writings of Henry George.

The land-tax theory is in no sense based on the idea of "the fatherhood of God." To me, and to nearly all single-tax people of my acquaintance, the phrase is as meaningless as "the fatherhood of a clam." And we hav George's word for it that he "followed the course of his own thought . . . with no theory to support, and no conclusions to prove." His basic propositions and arguments are as unsentimental as those of an Agnostic geologist. It was only after he gave himself up to contemplation of the finished problem that he "went beyond the clouds." "But out of this inquiry hav come to me some things I did not think to find, and a faith that was dead revives" (Progress and Poverty, Lovell, p. 399).

George's claim to originality is roughly limited to his correct apprehension of the law of wages, without which the science of political economy lacked the relation and coherence of a system. He was the first to show clearly that labor produced its own wages and did not in any way intrench upon capital during the process of production.

Labor applied to land produces all wealth. The wealth is distributed between the two prime factors in its production—wages to labor, rent to land. The landowner, as a mere landowner, does nothing toward production. His portion of every product is a forced contribution of the laborer. This forced contribution is specific, and can be located in every instance. If all of these forced contributions are taken from the landholders and applied to the distribution of free gas, water, etc., the laborers will receive the full reward of their exertion—directly, in that portion of the product which they originally retain; indirectly, in the benefits and conveniences that flow to them through the centralized social administration. It is thus that "a tax may be converted by political magic from a burden to a blessing."

All taxes come out of the products of labor. There is no other source. "In their wisest and most virtuous form they are a burden." So is labor. The narrow use of the word tax may be confusing. There are certain things considered necessary by organized and civilized society, and they are most economically administered in a community capacity—free schools, for example. As these things can be limited in number and variety at the discretion of the people, let schools stand for the job lot. A portion of each laborer's production is given up to build schools and pay teachers. His children are educated. Instead of being "taxed," he gets what he wants in exchange for something he had to spare—legitimate earnings.

Prices cannot be "artificially raised" to any great extent when all monopolies that grow out of the necessities of human beings, or are produced by community growth, are under the control and direction of society, and are administered for the general good. Capital being merely an offshoot of labor, and its activ use being necessary to its maintenance and perpetuation, perfect freedom of opportunity will restrict capital to its legitimate earnings.

A tax on land values only cannot but be beneficial to the real farmer, as he is more of a laborer and capitalist than a landowner. His food, clothing, and implements would be cheaper (as acknowledged by "Wheelbarrow"). The tax on his naked land would be lessened by compelling idle land in his neighborhood to pay taxes on its market value—by the evening up of taxation according to privilege.

As to "another fundamental error," George has only mentioned facts that are everywhere apparent. Labor-saving inventions increase the proportion or percentage of the product that goes to rent—necessarily decreasing the wages proportion. Further, their advent is anticipated and discounted in the raising of the normal rent line to the speculativ rent line. Or, in another view, they add to the number of idle laborers, thus increasing competition for the use of certain spots of desirable land—land in the center of a city, say—on account of the economy possible through the utilization of the centralized facilities afforded for production and distribution. The desired location being forestalled, and the possibilities of the future being, by the aid of past experiences, clearly perceived, the maximum speculativ rent line is reached in acquiring the privilege essential to a beginning of production. The enhanced value of one spot of land is reflected to all surrounding land. With every improvement more rent is taken out of the product—in gross and in proportion—and more men compete for the opportunity to toil—compete for the use of land—and while their wages are greater in the gross, they are less as a proportion of the product. Now, with all this invention and improvement, and the clash and jangle and competition in a progressiv civilization, the minds of men are broadened, and their wants and ambitions outrun the possibilities of gratification. As animals, they are immeasurably better conditioned than were their barbarian ancestors, but their sufferings are the more acute because they so fully appreciate the value of those things just out of their reach.

George does not "lose sight of the fact that land in itself and apart from labor has no value whatever." Bearing in mind the fact that the prospect of future demand for naked land would giv it a market value, the essence of the quotation from "Wheelbarrow" would make one of George's fundamental propositions. And while it is agreed that the value is due to labor alone, and that it is properly a subject of taxation, the objection is raised that "labor is taxed." Assuredly it is, because in the last analysis there remains nothing but labor—or its product—out of which a "tax" can be extracted. Rent is a tax—the first that labor pays—and it is assessed and appropriated by the non-producing landowner. But to tax the first tax—rent—into the community treasury for the good of the whole people is not a tax at all in the sense that the word is used by "Wheelbarrow." It is equivalent to the refund of a previous extortion.

There are no "lots on the lake side of Chicago that consist of improvement only." They would be in contact with what is comprehended in the economic term "land," even if suspended in mid-air, but as a matter of fact they all find a foundation on the soil of Chicago, and that foundation has a value easily separated from the improvement value.

In abstract justice, the question of compensation is not to be entertained for a moment. A moral wrong is a moral wrong, and that settles it—in my view. In the solicitude for the welfare of the landlords the natural rights of the landless are overlooked. Besides, the change would inure to the benefit of all who worked, whether with hand or brain; and as to idlers, society has performed its full duty when it furnishes them the opportunity to work. The perception of these truths justifies McGlynn in his most radical proposition for a change. His plan does not contemplate as great a turning over as was engineered by Solon, and Solon has quite a reputation for sense. But it is considered expedient to move slowly—rather, it is impossible to move rapidly, and attention is being directed to the starting-point—the shifting of all existing taxation to land values. Let it reach that point, and the movement will take care of itself.

I quote two separated sentences from "Wheelbarrow:" "Even a sudden change for unmixed good may be fatal. . . . I know of one panacea only; it is man's obedience to the moral laws." Which is which?

George is not "utterly blind to the fact that poverty has many sources." He has enumerated a dozen "sources," but he finds upon investigation that they are merely surface eruptions; and that the real "source" is in the monopoly of the gifts of nature and the consequent unjust distribution of wealth—in the shutting off of opportunities from the able-bodied poverty that is willing and anxious to toil for what it needs.

St. John the Divine "ate up the little book," and then recorded the queer and curious things he saw. We are advised by "Wheelbarrow" that he "devoured" "Progress and Poverty." James B. Hassett.

What the Sabbatarians are Doing.

From the Pearl of Days.

A bill legalizing the playing of baseball on Sunday was reported adversely in the New Jersey legislature.

Anthony Comstock, who resides in Summit, N. J., is vigorously engaged there in closing all places of business on Sunday that violate the Sunday law.

The Methodist ministers of Minneapolis, Minn., are unanimously opposed to the Red Rock camp-meeting keeping the gates open upon the Sabbath the coming summer.

In a letter to the Railway Age, general superintendent Whyte, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, states that no freight trains are run on Sundays on the western division of that road.

By appointment of numerous Sabbath associations on both sides of the sea the week beginning April 7th—including also April 14th—is set apart as the "world's week of prayer for the Sabbath."

At a meeting in Manchester, England, February 28th, it was stated that during 1888 over fifty-two thousand persons had petitioned the House of Commons in favor of the Sunday Closing bill, and eight hundred and thirty-two thousand in England had approved the stopping of the sale of liquors entirely on Sunday.

The following resolution was adopted at the late session of the Philadelphia Methodist Episcopal conference: "We greatly deprecate the custom of holding camp-meetings over the Sabbath with open gates on that day, thereby causing the depletion to the congregations of the services in the churches throughout large districts, and encouraging Sunday excursions and other forms of Sabbath desecration."

As a specimen of the gross misrepresentation of recent efforts to secure a national law to protect citizens in the enjoyment of a weekly rest day, the following is taken from the Sacramento (Cal.) Union of March 2d: "Samuel P. Putnam, Freethinker, lectured at Pioneer Hall, Sunday evening, upon the subject, 'Evils and Tyranny and Dangers of Sunday Legislation.' In the course of his lecture he said: 'The Christian has no right to compel a whole community to be pious, any more than the Freethinker has a right to compel the Christian to attend the theater or opera. The Sunday should be a free day for each citizen to use according to his own judgment. To enforce a particular kind of observance is a tyranny; to forbid work or play is as much a tyranny as to forbid worship would be tyranny.'"

[We wish the Pearl of Days had told us just where the misrepresentation comes in! From our point of view Mr. Putnam's statements are absolutely correct.]

Canada Going to the Dogs.

Alastor, in Secular Thought.

Signs of sinister aspect are just now abundant enough, pointing to an evil future for Canada. The war of religious factions; the almost universal corruption and selfish time-serving of our politicians; the significant and persistent aggression of the Roman Catholic church; the apathy, the sluggishness, the ignorance of the people—all tend in one direction: the death of mental liberty in this country. The minister of justice on behalf of the government calmly argues that it is perfectly right and natural that the pope of Rome should be invited by the government to assist the crown in making a final and binding agreement between it and certain of its own subjects. This confession of the minister of justice will hav a startling effect on the community. We hav been accustomed, says the Mail, to think that the trust prerogativs of the crown were on the whole wisely and beneficently administered; and that all subjects of the crown were bound to submit their rival claims to the executiv or judicial authorities of the nation, and that such authorities were sufficient for all the purposes of a sovereign government. To call in some foreign authority whom the minister says can alone prevent the rival claimants "making any further claim," strikes a serious blow at and degrades the sovereignty of the nation as well as the status of the crown.

What is the meaning of this confession? It means but one thing. That to maintain power in this land a government has got to truckle to one of the worst tyrannies which has ever cursed humanity. Neither of the political parties has clean hands in this matter. That the course of both parties has been prompted solely by a desire to secure the good will of the church is confessed without the slightest hesitation by their newspapers. The Liberal journal at Ottawa says: "The Quebec people know very well that Sir John would veto the Jesuit bill if he dared to do so," therefore it trusts they will not thank him for ratifying, as an act of political necessity, the legislation which has been passed by Mr. Mercier. The Bleu press, on the other hand, asks the clergy to note that not merely the Conservativ premier but Conservativ Orangistes hav fallen on their bellies before them. "We specially direct attention," says one of these papers, "to the fact that Sir John in caucus threatened to resign if his followers made up their minds to vote for disallowance. More the chieftain could not do in support of the resolute attitude of Sir Hector and the five other Catholic members of the cabinet." Better still, says another, "it is evident from the speech of Mr. Rykert, who is an Orangeman, that even the lodges hav felt the power of the party leaders, exerted as it has been in support of our religion and our laws." There could not be more forcible testimony to the alarming depth of degradation which Canadian politics hav reached.

What move on the part of the all-powerful Roman Catholic church may we expect next? The Mail says that time alone can tell; but it is safe to say her brilliant success in establishing the Jesuits under state auspices will not make either her or them any more modest or forbearing in their pretensions. The Jesuit journals tell us that one of the chief aims of the order at present is to fulfill the directions of the pope in a recent encyclical to the effect that the free institutions of the country should be turned to "the real and true public good," that is, to the good of the church. Hence we may look for fresh attempts, both in provincial and federal legislation, to extend the sphere of clerical supremacy. It is also hinted by the Jesuit press that the order will set itself to promote the spirit of French-Canadian nationalism. The greater its power over the habitant the greater its power over us all.

Liberal Organizations.

The Liberals of Denison, Tex., hav organized under the name of the Denison Philosophical and Social Club, with T. V. Munson as president. They start off well, says Mr. J. D. Shaw, and we hope for them a long and useful career. Organizations hav also been effected at Leadville, Col., and San Jose, Cal. Thus the good work goes on, and the lump of conservativ indifference is being leavened with the leaven of Freethought.

How Gods Are Made Out of Men.

The Rosetta stone was discovered in 1799 on the delta of the Nile, forty miles northeast of Alexandria. It is a slab of black granit, and is deposited in the British Museum, but a fac-simile of it is to be seen in the National Museum at Washington. This ancient record shows how gods were made out of men two thousand years ago. It is dated "in the year 9 (of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes), the 10th of the month Mechir"—i. e., March 10, 193 B.C. The inscription continues:

Considering that the King Ptolemy, ever-living, the well-beloved of Pthah, god Epiphanes, most glorious son of the King Ptolemy and of the Queen Arsinoe, gods philapatores (father-loving), has done all kinds of good, both to the temples and to those who therein make their habitation, and in general to all those who are under his dominion; that being (himself) a god, born of a god and goddess, like Horus, the son of Isis and Osiris, the avenger of Osiris, his father, and ambitious of signalizing generously his zeal for the things which concern the gods, he has consecrated to the service of the temples great revenues, as well of money as of wheat, and has been at great expense to restore tranquillity in Egypt and to raise temples; . . . that he has made many gifts to Apis and Ninevis, and to other sacred animals of Egypt; . . . it has therefore pleased the priests of all the temples of the land to decree that all the honors belonging to King Ptolemy, god Epiphanes, most gracious, as well as those which are due to his father and mother, gods philopatores, and those which are due to his ancestors, should be considerably augmented; that the statue of King Ptolemy, ever-living, be erected in each temple, placed in the most conspicuous spot, which shall be called the statue of Ptolemy, avenger of Egypt; near this statue shall be placed the principal god of the temple, who will present him with the arms of victory; . . . that the priests shall perform three times a day religious service to these statues; . . . and in order that it may be known that in Egypt he is glorified and honored, as is just, the god Epiphanes, most gracious sovereign, the present decree shall be engraved on a stella of hard stone, in sacred characters (hieroglyphic), in writing of the country (demotic), and in Greek letters.

Another stone of an earlier date was discovered in 1866, in the vicinity of the Suez canal. It is the decree of Canopus, bestowing divine honors upon King Ptolemy III. and his wife Bernice. The date of this decree is March 7, 238 B.C. The copy in the National Museum is in plaster, from the original in the museum at Boulac, a suburb of Cairo.

The absurdity of a council of pagan priests conferring divine honors upon their reigning king is apparent to every Christian. But how much more absurd and grotesque has been the action of the Christian councils! King Ptolemy, the legitimate son of his royal father, is solemnly declared to be "a god, like Horus, the son of Isis and Osiris;" therefore his statue is placed near that of the principal god of the temple, and three times a day the priest must perform religious service to the two deities. Such is the decree of the conclave of Egyptian priests. Five hundred years later a council of Christian bishops assemble at Nicea, ten degrees north of Alexandria, and solemnly declare that Jesus, the illegitimate son of a Judean maiden, was begotten by the Holy Ghost, and is of "one substance with the father, very God of very God."

The pagan priests decreed that their living royal master was one of the gods; the Christian bishops voted that a Jewish peasant, who had been dead some three hundred years, and about whom they knew less than is now known of Jack Cade or Crispus Attucks, was not only a god, but coequal with the father almighty. ANTICHRIST.

Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Mogyorosi.

I see our friend Mr. A. J. Mogyorosi has seen fit to select my late article as a proper medium to introduce a very elaborate and interesting essay upon the "Limitations of Toleration," showing that all who hav meddled with the question were laboring under the disadvantage of not knowing where they started from, nor where they were going to. That is rather a singular condition of things, and it is greatly to be regretted that he failed to accept President Palmer's invitation to attend that meeting, for if he had it must be presumed that this unfortunate muddle would not hav occurred. But no matter. "All is well that ends well." We hav learned something about logic already—we know the difference between thought and judgment, and if we keep up the agitation awhile longer we may learn something more. Mr. Mogyorosi also assures us that it is no disgrace for a man to learn what he ought to know, and for that valuable piece of information, of course, he has our unlimited thanks. But there are other difficulties in the way aside from the disgrace. I must confess that I do not know any more about mental philosophy, self-culture, or self-control now than I did when this discussion began, and that is just what I would like to learn. It was in pursuance of that desire that my article was written, and no one who read it could mistake my meaning. The subject is not even remotely referred to in Mr. Mogyorosi's essay, although he says at the beginning it was for my sake he took the trouble to write it. His last word is a hope that I will "find no reason for attacking our great Col. R. G. Ingersoll." It seems to me that piece of gratuitous advice was out of place and uncalled for. I never entertained so foolish a notion as wishing to attack Colonel Ingersoll, nor hav I the least ambition to be numbered among the headless victims of his matchless skill. If I were asked to name three of the greatest and best men now living, Mr. Ingersoll would be mentioned as one of the three. But even then his utterances are not too sacred for honest criticism, when the object sought is to obtain more light upon an obscure subject. Himself would be one of the first to despise a person that stood in silent awe of his towering genius. I am willing to admire and honor him, but I cannot worship him; nor do I think he is endowed with infallibility.

I was brought up in the Catholic church, where original free will was one of the fundamental doctrins, but I outgrew that fallacy some years before I was able to shake off the rest of the creed. I figured out to my own satisfaction that freedom and power were so closely connected that one could not exist without the other, and consequently a man's freedom of will depended upon the degree of power he possessed—power in its highest and broadest sense, including mental, physical, financial, or official power. That is to say, a man might be free to better his condition if he had power to do so; free to choose the good and reject the bad if he knew the difference between good and bad; and free to think if his intellectual faculties were strong enough to formulate an idea. I became convinced that the much-talked-of divine institution of free will amounted to this and nothing more, and that the doctrin, as promulgated by priests, was but an ingenious pretext for Jehovah to send his enemies to hell. Multitudes of people were going there every day, and, of course, it must be their own fault. The merciful redeemer should not be held accountable for their stubbornness and folly, so this doctrin of free will was invented as a very plausible excuse for the fiendish cruelty. During this time, too, I was told that Protestants denied the freedom of man's will, and compared it to a horse or an ass. When the Lord had hold of the reins the will, or the ass, went on steadily in the way of righteousness, but when the devil got into the saddle he pointed straight in the opposit direction. Under this simple régime the chief problem of life was to induce the Holy Ghost to ride the animal, and compel Satan to trudge along behind. Therefore, it was considered the highest wisdom to pray always, and when a man starved to death in the operation it was regarded as a sure sign that he went straight to heaven. We do not bother our heads with that sort of rubbish now, but still the question remains, Has man any power, or freedom of will, or has the will any power to control thought? Having dismissed the ghosts and Gods, saints and devils, that used to govern the will of our ancestors, does the power of control revert now to ourselvs personally, or is it scattered about in the air, the events, the circumstances, and environments that surround us? What is this thing that we call will, anyway? Is it anything more than a name, a word without meaning, an official without any functions to perform? If that is all that it means the word ought to be excluded from the language, for as long as it remains in use it will hav a tendency to mislead and deceive people. If, as Mr. Ingersoll's remarks seem to imply, a man's will has no power to govern his thoughts, it is not good for anything, and had better be thrown aside so people would not waste their time fooling with it. Or at least it ought to be defined and elucidated, so that people could know what its functions and capabilities really are. I am of opinion that a system of physiology and anatomy of the mind is quite as important to the improvement of our race as the science of physical anatomy, and I think if the subject was well launched in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER your contributors would soon shed a flood of light upon the perplexing subject. JEREMIAH O'BRIEN.

Forestport, N. Y.

A Daughter of Massachusetts Offers a Few Free Thoughts.

I like everyone to hav a free field and a fair fight. I suppose that is one thing THE TRUTH SEEKER stands for. And when one has been assailed in it I assume it is open for that one to speak for his or her self. I long ago learned to respect Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, of temperance fame (that certainly is not ill-fame), as an American, a reformer, and a woman; and, whatever her cradle sentiments on the subject of religious creeds, her virtue, and her valor for the uplifting of manhood entitle her to the esteem of readers and the courtesy of editors and correspondents of the public press. Last night I listened to her ardent address from the pulpit of the First Methodist Episcopal church—formerly her father's—and transmit a few of her free thoughts for the benefit of our distant friends who fondly think to advise us how to vote, with a multitude of words without knowledge. Mrs. Foster's language is as follows:

The question before the voters of this state is not a question of the time when it should be presented. The matter of suppressing intemperance in Massachusetts has been debated, and every other method tried, during the past one hundred years, and the trial of the constitutional amendment would hav to come some time, and it matters little if it is brought home to us now instead of a few years in the future.

It is not a question of class, unless you mean to regard good men as a class. Temperance is what all good men wish, and I doubt not in the least that if all the good men in Massachusetts should vote for the amendment they would carry it by a large majority.

It is not a question of total abstinence. You can vote for the amendment heartily, and yet be able to get a drink when you need it; yet, if you are up to the latest statement of science on the subject, you are all total abstainers. Those who offer the objection that the church needs alcoholic wine in the celebration of its rites, are miserable sinners themselvs, instead of consistent members of the society of Christ.

The question is not one of absolute extirpation of alcohol. When the amendment is made and enforced you may still buy whisky for snake-bites. On the use of liquor as a medicin we hav our opinions, and we hav them strong, but they are not the question before the people.

It is not a question of politics. I mean it is not a party issue. You may be a good Republican or a good Democrat, a low free trader or a high protectionist in the tariff definition. What we want is the protection of home, and no trade in the stuff that will wreck it. If you do not like the word "prohibition," you can call it by another name. It is not a question of appellation but of principle.

It is not a question of constitutional right to prohibit. The best judges of our great states hav decided that the people hav the right to prohibit that which threatens and destroys the peace and welfare of society. I notice that in the last political contest protectionists and anti-protectionists both stood squarely on the constitutional right to tax commerce.

The question is more than one of constitutional right, it is the right of making a constitution. The question is as much greater than the constitution, as the soul is of more moment than the body. We received colonial charters from monarchs; we set up state constitutions ourselvs. The difference is, in the colony the power was delegated from the king; in the state the power resides in the people. In the Constitution they tell what they want. If I cannot make you see it as I see it, I shall not condemn you, but be sorry that your eyes are so poor.

The reason that the amendment has not been called for before is because there hav not been conditions that demanded it. The saloon has come as a mighty power upon us, and the saloon must go or it will down society. It is against the saloon that the amendment is aimed. You may ask, would not high license and fewer saloons be better than many illegal places of sale—and it cannot be stopped altogether? I say, no! Can you prove that there will be less liquor sold in ten first-class saloons than in twenty ordinary ones? You cannot, and I do not believe it. Besides, with the fewer saloons there are abler, more influential saloonkeepers, and it is more difficult to successfully prosecute them. I know, for I hav tried it. It is easier to prosecute poor lawbreakers than it is rich ones. The attraction of ten high-toned saloons may be greater than the temptation more frequently offered by twenty common ones, by making them centers of sociability.

Those who talk high license do not stand by high license when they get it.

The implication that Prohibition is not enforced does not come with good grace from those who do nothing for enforcement, anyway. Officers do not do better than constituents expect and demand, any more than family servants will manage well when the master and mistress are abroad. Human nature is not built that way. The czar is able, in Russia, to keep his government running, but if he went journeying, how long would it be before his empire was run into the ground? The people are sovereign here, and they must look to it that the laws are obeyed. We hear about strong governments. Germany is called a strong government. Some express fears that America will hav too strong a government. A republic ought to be strong as a monarchy, under the dignity of a free citizenship. If the saloon is not put away pretty soon by sober people, monarchies may laugh in derision at our inability to govern by popular sovereignty.

Do not think that license can settle this problem; it can only be done by constitutional law.

Liquor making and selling are called industries. Are they? What is an industry? Let us see. In Lynn you hav principally the shoe industry, and it is good not only to build up the city, but it blesses people wherever the product goes. The shoe is something better than the leather it was made of, and the leather is better than the raw hide as it came off a creature, because it is more easily conformed to the foot of the wearer. So of all industries; and not only so, but one industry promotes another. He who wears shoes is better prepared to earn a hat, and he who wears a hat is in better condition to pay for shoes. That is what highly organized society is. That is what America is. Here the humblest are lords and ladies because of our diversified industries. But what of the distillery and the saloon—are they shops of industry? Whom do they bless? Oh, the proprietor!

See the man from the still or the bar, as he comes swaggering or creeping among these steady crownless kings, the laborers, and falsely talks of his "industry!" "Put him out! Echo the call, put him out! We do not need him here. We won't hav him among us." To ask these laborers to support him is an insult to them. He does not help you, laborers, he loads you. Those who use his products become thereby less able to buy the products of others.

Talk of vested rights of the liquor business! Vested rights to do what? Vested rights to impoverish the state? Vested rights to demoralize the citizen? Vested rights to disorganize government? Who wants such vested rights as that? Not the people, surely, but the liquor dealer, for his sole satisfaction.

But why put Prohibition in the Constitution? Because it is needed. Constitutional principles are the final decision of long-controverted questions. When we find out what we want and determin to keep it then we put it in the Constitution? We tinkered with slavery until we tinkered up a war, and then we tinkered the Constitution, and that finished slavery, and no one to-day wishes it back again. You say, Why lumber up the Constitution? Because lumbering up is a good thing, sometimes. You hav been lumbering up Lynn a great deal since I left it. This great population livs in houses made of lumber; they work in shops made of lumber; they labor in sawmills to manufacture all this lumber, and all are benefited. Yes, this church has been lumbered up; it is bigger than it was when my father preached here and I came here a child to Sunday-school. Say, don't you believe in lumbering up?

But you may say you never heard of such legislation before—why do a thing so unheard of?

That is what we hav been doing ever since this country was settled. It is America's business to do unheard-of things. Ours is a land of progress. They cannot do such a thing in England. Here any schoolboy can pick up a book and read the Constitution. There you may hear them talk about the British constitution, but not Gladstone himself can find all its parts and put them together. Yet there the people of progress are strong for Prohibition, and the Irish League is bound to the support of that cause. Parnell and Dillon hav told me so.

And so here I stand, a Yankee. And if it were not for my religion—if it were not for my love of Christ—yet still for my reverence for the dear old American flag, I would die, even gladly, if that would wipe out the curse of liquor. But I am a woman only. I can't even vote; you can. Do so. Vote for me, for yourselvs, for your children and wives, and daughters and mothers. For, if we fail, there will be joy in hell.

Mr. Editor, thus hav I put some of Mrs. Foster's ringing words on paper. Knock out their logic, if you can. The feeling with which she gave utterance to her ideas, the strength of her unutterable emotion, her impassioned sigh of regret at her helplessness before a woman-barred ballot-box, neither pen nor types can make visible.

Readers, if you vote with dram-drinkers and drunkard-makers, against the heart and head of such as the nativly noble and cultivatedly civil women of the land, you show yourselvs unworthy the founders of our country and the mothers who gave you form.

I must add three words more: Damn the rum!

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Boyden House, Lynn, Mass., April 5, 1889.

McArthur to "Antichrist."

Last evening, in a discussion with a theologian of the holy Roman and apostolic church, I was surprised by a historical (?) statement, which I take the liberty of referring to you, as, without intending any compliment, I consider you to be one of the best posted men in the country, and should value any statement you may make on the subject.

As is usual in discussions of this kind—I speak only of my personal experience—I found I could not confine the gentleman to "cold facts;" he would deal only in "glittering generalities."

In speaking of the moral influence always exerted by the pope, and his paternal anxiety and tenderness for all weak and struggling nations, this gentleman made the following assertion:

That after Benjamin Franklin had spent over two years as our ambassador at the French court, vainly striving to obtain recognition, one morning he was surprised by the chamberlain announcing that the king had concluded, not only to grant him an audience, but also to assist the struggling colonies.

Franklin immediately knelt in the center of the ante-room and fervently, and with tears streaming from his eyes, thanked God for this change in the heart of the French king.

In the midst of this solemn scene, the papal nuncio was announced, and, as he entered the room, the chamberlain informed Franklin that though his thanks were due to God, yet the visible means used by the divinity was this very papal nuncio, who had, at the express command of the holy father, informed the king that it was necessary that the colonies should be helped.

Personally, I am of opinion, on general principles, and from an intimate acquaintance with the methods of the papal see, that this is another ad majoram dei gloriam lie. But I am assured that it is going the rounds of the Catholic press and remains uncontradicted.

Of course it would be futil to attempt to follow up all these extravagances, and I would not attempt it, only in this case I think I see traces of the Jesuit velvet paw trying to smooth the way to claims which are more easily made than maintained.

When Eugenie and her husband ruled France the Jesuits controled the public school system, and I once noticed in one of their histories, used as a textbook by the younger scholars, that "Catholic Lafayette, assisted by one Washington, secured the independence of America."

This was followed up by a writer in the Boston Globe claiming that, as "Catholic Lafayette and his eight thousand Catholic soldiers" had done so much toward gaining our independence, Americans were proving themselvs ungrateful when they objected to the church having her share of the educational money.

Items of this kind show the tendency of the times, particularly when they remain uncontradicted. They show that the church is aware of the coming conflict and is carefully preparing her way, by claiming a participation in the efforts of our early fathers. And now this Franklin goody-goody story will shortly make its appearance in the secular press. Thousands will believe it and swear by it, so I hope I am not asking too much of "Antichrist," when I request him to explode it now. MCARTHUR.

Thoughts.

I hav written below a few thoughts on various topics. First, on the separation of religion and morals; and the fact that bare belief in a creed has for a source merely arbitrary education in that belief during youth, while morals rests upon natural approval or disapproval of actions, arising spontaneously and nearly uniformly in all peoples. Second, on the relations between Christianity and "pagan" religions. Third, on the benefits that we could now enjoy had such a one as Ingersoll taught of old.

Nearly a half century ago I heard Fanny W. Darasmont speak from this text: "Religion: a belief in, and homage rendered to, existences unseen and causes unknown." From that day I never had any doubt that all beliefs in creeds were greatly induced by youthful education.

There is a general impression in all Christendom that religion is based on morals, while, in fact, it has no real or necessary connection therewith. Religion is a mere belief, which is reduced to creeds by the interested parties, who claim for it the domain of morals, while again the fact is, morals is not a belief at all, but consists of conduct.

Pope says:

> 'Tis education forms the common mind;
> Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined.

Youthful education in that direction has the tendency, no matter how much we may endeavor to escape it, to confuse belief with conduct. But when we reflect upon it, good actions always commend themselvs to every person who possesses any intelligence, and, as a fact, mere creeds and beliefs do not.

There hav been great moral teachers in the Christian ranks, and it is only moral preaching that has saved them from sinking into obscurity or rendered them worthy of notice, operating as an offset to their bigot creeds.

No matter how moral the man, under the Christian creed, if he does not believe and be baptized, he will as surely be damned as the vilest wretch in Christendom.

Morals are not worthy of reward or commendation, without the creed and second belief.

While the fact is, conscience unperverted is the same in all, according to the degree of intelligence, and hence there has never been an important difference in intelligent opinions as to moral actions. If the action is good, the general assent and commendation is certain and in the main uniform. It has always been the reverse with all mere beliefs, and the Christian belief is the worst of all in theory, as its leading desire is to baptize, and the creed and record are believe and be baptized, or be damned, totally regardless of moral actions.

This is the creed of Christendom, from Catholicism down its thousand branches to Mormonism, morals being ignored in all the creeds.

Buddhists are in striking contrast with Christians, for where Buddhism only is taught, they are all Buddhists. Where Mohammedanism only is known and taught, they are all Mohammedans. And so with every religion and belief exclusivly taught, except the Christian, showing pretty certainly that they either hav better evidence for their beliefs, or religions, or better teachers or more consistent records; or perhaps their beliefs are more universal from another fact—which I am inclined to think the true reason—that they embrace in their records and creeds morality, to which the intelligent judgment naturally assents.

Is it not singular, and a significant fact, when the Christian command was, Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, and after the advantage of nearly nineteen hundred years having passed, that the Mohammedans, six hundred years younger, and without any missionaries, hav much the larger following, if we reckon out the unbelievers in Christendom?

The exclusiv belief, in Christian countries, of those educated in Christianity is at once arrested as soon as the belief of outsiders is shown to rest on morals or good actions. This is the case now all through the Christian domain, even from what little knowledge has been so far gained for comparison, and what is known now of what has generally been called heathendom by the Christian world.

Suppose heathens had had as many missionaries to their belief and religion, in Christendom, as Andover and allies hav had with them, it could probably hav shaken Christianity more than that has shaken the heathen Infidels.

Had Colonel Ingersoll lived a century ago and taught the world then what he has since by his lectures and writings on the subject, it is hard to imagin what the influence would now be. What an assumption we are making—for, of course, at that time he would hav been arrested before he had really opened out, and it could never hav been proved by pope, priest, or layman whether he went to keep Morgan company, or had, more likely, been torn in pieces on the Inquisition racks in Spain. There is a probability some Christians would vote for that now, and all this for a mere belief, without touching morals, and even in direct violation of the first principles of morality, being simply a mere matter of superstitious education, all authority, but no reason.

Newanee, 1889. A. W. WOOD.

The Great Work of the Vice Society.

From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

At every annual meeting of the New York Vice Society Anthony Comstock stands on the platform, and with a great flourish tells the bald-headed old gentlemen present what he has been doing during the year. From what he says about raiding gamblers one would suppose that no gambling places could be kept open in New York for twenty-four hours because of the vigilance of the Vice Society! But what are the real facts? They are forcibly indicated by some circumstances which lately occurred. The Liederkranz had a great ball, and the police undertook to enforce the law against the sale of wine after 1 o'clock. It is said that the influential members determined to retaliate and compel the police to enforce the law against gambling-houses. The New York World of March 9th informs its readers that until two weeks ago there were in the city one hundred pool-rooms in bustling activity, and as many more houses where faro, hazard, red and black, and roulet were played nightly. It speaks of a place in Fulton street that has been open for twenty years; another place in Broadway which has seldom been closed, and numerous others that hav been untouched. Now, when the reporters of the World know these facts concerning the gambling-places in New York, is it at all probable that they are not known to the officers of the Vice Society? That is to say, if the latter are as wide-awake as Comstock would hav his hearers at his annual meetings believe. We hav often referred to the work of the Vice Society as one in which gamblers are treated simply as sheep to be shorn and said that the Vice Society would not suppress gambling if it could. Recent revelations in the New York press hav signally confirmed this view of the matter. Brick Pomeroy's Advance Thought for March contains an article on this subject which ought to be an eye-opener for those who believe that the Vice Society is really attempting to do anything more than to pay the salaries of its agents and take to itself a little cheap notoriety.

Favorable Opinions On Our Books.

From the Denver Arbitrator.

"The Limitations of Toleration," a discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederick R. Coudert, and Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, a neat forty-four page pamphlet. Every lover of free speech should obtain, read, and circulate the valuable document. The Truth Seeker Company. Price, 10 cents.

"Pioneer Pith," or the gist of lectures on Rationalism, by Robert C. Adams, an excellent little work for circulation among the people who are mentally lazy. It is well calculated to make people think and keep them at it. Price, 25 cents.

Every student of economics should send to the Truth Seeker Company for a copy of "Social Wealth," by J. K. Ingalls. It is a work of inestimable value, and givs unanswerable arguments for free land. Price only $1.

From the Hastings, Mich., Plaindealer.

The Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York, are constantly issuing valuable Liberal and Freethought books, which are all very nicely printed and bound, prices moderate, and they send their catalog free by mail. We hav recently received the following:

"The Limitations of Toleration." By Col. R. G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, and Gen. Stewart L. Woodford. This should be extensivly circulated, as it teaches the doctrins of Liberalism on the most important subject of the world—the right to speak and think and write. Price, ten cents.

"The Religion of Humanity Better than Eternal Punishment." By M. Babcock, of St. Johns, Mich. Mr. Babcock is an able and vigorous writer, writing because he has something to say, and the Truth Seeker Company publish his works in neat form. Price, ten cents.

"Did Man Fall?" By Israel W. Groh. The perusal of this able little pamphlet raises the devil with the garden of Eden yarn, and all will be interested and edified by its reading. Price, ten cents.

The Inauguration Centennial.

A week from Tuesday New York will be in a glow of patriotism and religion. Committees of all sorts hav different branches of the great celebration of the 100th anniversary of Washington's inauguration as president in charge. There is a committee on parade, one on a naval review, another on entertainment of distinguished men, another on balls, and various others on various subjects. No doubt the display on land and water, both during the day and night, will be well worth journeying miles to see.

As usual, the religious element has come to the front in great numbers and importance. President Harrison has, first of all, helped them out with this proclamation:

"A hundred years hav passed since the government which our forefathers founded was formally organized. At noon on the 30th day of April, 1789, in the city of New York, and in the presence of an assemblage of the heroic men whose patriotic devotion had led the colonies to victory and independence, George Washington took the oath of office as chief magistrate of the new-born republic. This impressiv act was preceded at 9 o'clock in the morning, in all the churches of the city, by prayer for God's blessing on the government and its first president.

"The centennial of this illustrious event in our history has been declared a general holiday by act of Congress, to the end that the people of the whole country may join in commemorativ exercises appropriate to the day.

"In order that the joy of the occasion may be associated with a deep thankfulness in the minds of the people for all our blessings in the past, and a devout supplication to God for their gracious continuance in the future, the representativs of the religious creeds, both Christian and Hebrew, hav memorialized the government to designate an hour for prayer and thanksgiving on that day.

"Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, president of the United States of America, in response to this pious and reasonable request, do recommend that on Tuesday, April 30th, at the hour of 9 o'clock in the morning, the people of the entire country repair to their respectiv places of divine worship, to implore the favor of God that the blessings of liberty, prosperity, and peace may abide with us as a people, and that his hand may lead us into the paths of righteousness and good deeds.

"In witness whereof, I hav hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

"Done in the city of Washington, this 4th day of April, in the year of our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Eighty-nine, and of the Independence of the United States, the One Hundred and Thirteenth.

"(Seal) BENJAMIN HARRISON.

"By the president,

"JAMES G. BLAINE, Secretary of state."

This makes April 30th a combination of Fourth of July and Thanksgiving. In addition to this worship in our Christian churches, all the ceremonies and occasions of the celebration proper will be opened and closed with prayer, and sermons thrown in ad lib. Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Corrigan will be prominent features of the show, and the notable Protestant clergy will all be on hand with parts duly assigned. The Catholics will also turn out in the parade and hav a distinctiv position given them, not as American citizens doing honor to the anniversary of an immortal event, but as Roman Catholics who are an important part of our government. It is evident from all this that Christianity will get an advertisment which may reasonably be expected to add many thousands of dollars to her market price in politics.

What we want to know is where the defenders and eulogists of the Infidels of Washington's time are to appear? In all the programs and orders of exercises we hav seen no word regarding the appearance of men who would be likely to even mention the name of Thomas Paine. Jefferson may obtain a word as the accredited author of the Declaration of Independence, but that is all, unless Mayor Grant shall introduce him in his Tammany Hall speech, for the Tammanyites, be it known, pretend to be Jeffersonians. But where are the progressiv men to appear—men who fitly represent the growth of the greatest nation in the world? We see the names of Bishop Potter and Archbishop Corrigan and Dr. Storrs over and over again in the program, but these are all orthodox champions, and represent in no way the great difference between the religious intolerance of the last century and the Liberality of thought prevalent in this. From the selection of orators one would suppose that though the country had enormously increased in material resources and grandeur it had stood still in religious sentiment. It is not right that this should be so; but as the whole arrangements are in churchly hands we cannot expect anything else.

But it is a pity that amid the general jubilation and recounting of great men's virtues and labors the two men who did more than any other two to secure the country's independence and good government should not be specially honored, as will the first president who without their aid would possibly hav failed as a military commander. Let all Liberal societies do their duty as recommended by the officers of the American Secular Union.

Facts.

There is a certain funny story that cannot be told too often. "Oh," cried the visitor to a jail when his friend behind the bars told him what he was imprisoned for, "oh, they can't put you in jail for that." "The devil they can't," exclaimed the man, "I'm here!" To turn like this man from theories as to whether a thing can be or is probable to be so, to the actual hard fact whether it is so—this is a method of thinking that all should endeavor to adopt as habitual. In every case where the practical facts can be obtained—and there are few where they can not—the application of this way of getting at the truth should be the very first thing done.

Says one: Freethought must produce immorality, Freethinkers having no foundation, no ultimate sanction, for the moral command; while Christians hav a foundation for it, and they are moreover incited to virtue by promis of a heaven and deterred from sin by threat of a hell. This sounds very well. But how about the actual facts to be observed, which testify to the precise opposit? Which nations are the most criminal, those the most or those the least religious? Is it Germany and England that are notorious for gambling, brawling, assassination, and criminality generally, or is it Spain and Mexico? Are France and America bywords for tyranny and extortion, cruelty and injustice, while Russia and Ireland receive the praises of every tongue for equity and peace? Which of the nationalities among us are the immoral ones? Never mind theory; let us go out to the nearest public place and see whether the first couple we find drunk and quarreling there belong to those nationalities which we know believe least in Christianity, or to those that believe in it most.

Sometimes the argument takes this form: Freethinkers may perhaps be as moral as Christians, but that is because they are more intellectual. A few superior, thoughtful minds may be capable of continuing a just course of conduct without belief in God, but for the great masses of the people such a belief is absolutely necessary. This is a favorit position with some who are Freethinkers at heart but from fear of Christian ostracism are anxious to find some excuse for withholding themselvs from propagandist work. "Can they not perceive," says one of our late correspondents—though we are by no means to be understood as including him in the faint-hearted class mentioned—"that a godless race, unless at the summit of intelligence, must inevitably be sinful?" No, we cannot perceive anything of the kind. For here we hav only to fall back upon the same method used before, the referring to actual facts, and we find the plainest evidence that such is not the case. The facts are right at hand—nothing could be more convenient and more conclusiv; it is strange that it did not occur to our correspondent to turn to them. We will not compare intellectual with unintellectual men. We will leave out the intellectual men altogether. We will consider the masses of the people, and them only. And considering them—taking the masses of any European nation at all, looking into any history at all, do we not find that the rise of strong Christian belief coincided with the downfall of order and morals, that the hight of the power of that belief coincided with the midnight of barbaric ferocity and criminality, and that the decline of its influence has coincided with the sunrise of public order, justice, and goodness?

Freethinkers are unhappy. All Freethinkers that disbelieve in a future life hav lost what constitutes the greatest happiness of mankind. Freethinkers in spreading their doctrins take from Christians the only thing that makes life worth living, the only thing that enables them to endure it and that supports them under its troubles. The foregoing is another of those propositions that look well. But by looking around one will see Freethinkers everywhere going about very jolly, quite absurdly oblivious of the duty they are under to invest themselvs with the degree of dolefulness requisit to corroboration of their pious friends' theory. What Freethinker has felt a loss of happiness upon discarding the Christian belief? How many Freethinkers cannot testify to increased cheerfulness and appreciation of life?

Freethinkers are also expected to be unhappy from another cause. There is alleged to be in the world of science into which we would usher mankind a lack of human feeling. There is in it a lack of material for emotion. It contains nothing congeneric, congenial, to man. In its inconceivable spaces, inexorable laws, unassimilable minerals, is found nothing capable of raising or filling man's heart. The scientific beliefs are "unsatisfying," "innutritiv." Sometimes they are "cold," "frigid." What needs to be said to all this? Simply what we said before. Look about and see. Look about and see whether scientists and Freethinkers are less happy, or more happy, than Christians. Nothing further in disproof is required.

Surely it is well sometimes in making statements to construct them so that they will hav some connection, some faint relation, with facts. Artemas Ward said that a comic paper is the better for having a few jokes in it; perhaps theories about facts are the better for having some distant correspondence to the facts.

The Blair Educational Amendment.

It seems to us that Mr. J. M. Brown, of Fort Worth, Texas, is a singularly obtuse Freethinker. He writes:

"FORT WORTH, TEX., April 1, 1889.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Under 'Editorial Notes,' March 9th, I find the following, viz.: 'The Blair Educational amendment is the most gigantic sectarian measure that ever legislator had the hardihood to propose.'

"I read the bill some two years ago and approved it. I liked it so well that I procured and distributed over a hundred copies of it, and hav never ceased wishing it might become a law.

"If there is a religious or sectarian scheme in it I failed to see it.

"Would it not be well for you to print it, or so much of it as contains the sectarian scheme? J. M. BROWN."

Mr. Brown is so familiar with the proposed amendment that he knows of course that its chief section reads like this:

"Each state in this Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all the children living therein, between the ages of six and sixteen years inclusiv, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, AND THE PRINCIPLES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION."

It seems to us that the concluding words of this amendment are so plain that he who runs may read, though he be running at a very rapid rate. Without considering the conflicting theories as to what the principles of the Christian religion really are—theories which hav led to interminable discussions and upon which no two bodies of Christians ever did or will agree—we may point out as the major premis of our opposition to Mr. Blair's proposed amendments the incontrovertible proposition that among the world's religions Christianity is only one sect and not the largest one either. As against Mohammedanism, or Buddhism, or Judaism, or Positivism, or the educational principles of the Freethinkers, Christianity has no right to impose its tenets upon the people of this country—no more than has either one of the others mentioned. The question of equal rights for all religions and for no religion, is of far greater importance than the truth or falsity of any particular opinion on religious subjects, and it is this that is invaded and overthrown by Mr. Blair's amendment.

In matters of religion the majority cannot rightfully prescribe to the minority. Still less can they rightfully use the power of the government to force their principles upon the children of their opponents. If there be but one man in the country who is not a Christian he is just as much entitled to be protected from interference by his neighbors as though his views were supported by millions. To foist upon the people governmental support of Christianity is the biggest sectarian scheme the church has yet undertaken in this land, where the very fundamental idea is total separation of church and state.

Senator Blair's amendment uses a great many words to delude the people into the belief that it is not "sectarian." After ordering that all schools shall teach the principles of the Christian religion, section second goes on:

"But no money raised by taxation imposed by law, or any money or other property or credit belonging to any municipal organization, or to any state, or to the United States, shall ever be appropriated, applied, or given to the use or purposes of any school, institution, corporation, or person, whereby instruction or training shall be given in the doctrins, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances peculiar to any sect, denomination, organization, or society, being, or claiming to be, religious in its character; nor shall such peculiar doctrins, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances, be taught or inculcated in the free public schools."

It is this part of the section, probably, which has deceived Mr. Brown. It is, however, seemingly built on the principle that the less includes the greater—a principle obnoxious to all true science—and was no doubt read with closed eye and tongue in cheek by the framers of the amendment. What are the ceremonials to the substance? The visible signs, they know, are of small importance if they hav got the true inward grace! The mint and cummin can be dispensed with, if all are compelled to bow to the weightier matters of the law! But well-intentioned people will find, if this amendment ever becomes law, that the less does not include the greater, and that the ceremonials of the Christian religion would shortly follow the introduction into our schools of its principles. Tailing on after the principles would come the doctrins, tenets, beliefs, and observances without which Christianity is but a skeleton of no great beauty or vitality. It has to be clothed and animated with ceremonial life before it can be taken into the parlor. Given the right to drag the skeleton into the schools, for very decency's sake the garb must be brought along too.

If there is no sectarianism in the bill why did not its promoters stop at the word morality? Are not knowledge, virtue, and morality sufficient for the children? Is it not plain, from the wording of the bill, that it is desired that they also become Christian, in addition to being wise and virtuous and moral? Can Mr. Brown not readily perceive that the whole thing is a scheme to make this a Christian country, officially and in fact? Supposing there are no doctrins taught, except those taught by all Christians in common; who is to decide what the principles shall be? Will it be the Methodists or the Presbyterians or the Catholics? We shall hav to establish a national council to decide, and this council must inevitably be composed of theological experts, and we shall therefore hav a national and established church whose authority in all matters pertaining to Christianity is supreme and enforced by the nation. We then get our religion from the government, and our children will be obliged to learn it, whatever the wish of the parent may be. As the Advent sect has pointed out so often, it was in this way that Christianity became originally the state church. "Constantine made Christianity the recognized religion of the Roman empire. Then it became at once necessary that there should be an imperial decision as to what form of Christianity should be the imperial religion. To effect this an imperial council was necessary to formulate that phase of Christianity which was common to all. The council of Nice was convened by imperial command, and an imperial creed was established, which was enforced by imperial power. That establishment of an imperial religion ended only in the imperious despotism of the papacy. And just so surely as the complete establishment of the papacy followed, and grew out of, that imperial recognition of Christianity in the fourth century, just so surely will the complete establishment of a religious despotism after the living likeness of the papacy follow, and grow out of, this national recognition of Christianity provided for in the constitutional amendment proposed by SenatorBlair."

As Felix Adler said of the Manual of the "unsectarian" House of Refuge, this Blair amendment is scarlet and crimson with the sectarian spirit. If we are to hav sectarian teaching at all, let us place all religions on an equal basis. If we teach Christianity, to be fair we must also teach Rationalism; if we teach Theism, we must also teach Atheism. If we teach the doctrin of personal immortality, Materialism and Positivism must also be given hearings. Let us then hav a Christian service, a Mohammedan service, a Buddhist service, a Jewish service, and all the other services that the cosmopolitan character of our population makes necessary. Giv all a chance, or giv none a chance. And as it is utterly impossible to giv all a chance, it follows that in justice and fair play, no religion should ever be taught in the schools or in any other institution supported by the taxation of all people.

We trust that Mr. Brown will now see that Mr. Blair's proposed educational amendment is not just the kind of an amendment that the country needs, and cease circulating and advocating it.

No National Law Wanted.

Every now and then the marriage and divorce question comes up and is discussed with all the vigor of a new subject. The preachers of course all want a law making marriage a sacrament, and divorce an impossibility, except for "biblical" reasons. This would bring prestige and money to them. Happily there are a few persons who see that marriage is a social partnership, which should not be enforced when it has become irksome to one or both parties. The Herald of a recent date printed a symposium on the question. The following are a few sample opinions:

Speaker Carlisle: "The laws should be made as nearly uniform as possible."

Senator Sherman: "The marriage relation should not be dissolved except on the clearest and strongest proof of a breach of the duty imposed."

Kate Field: "Legislators had better beware how they put a premium on vice by forging the marital chains so tight as to make a separation too difficult."

Dr. Howard Crosby: "Easy divorce breaks up families and leads inevitably to a low standard of morality."

Marion Harland: "Neither of the divorced parties should be permitted to marry again."

Frances E. Willard: "Divorce is easier than marriage. There should be a national law."

Joseph Cook: "Loose divorce is becoming a vast mischief. A national law is needed."

Bishop Newman: "The difference between Utah and some states is that in the former plural wives are simultaneous, while in the latter they are successiv."

President De Costa, of the White Cross Society: "We ask for a national marriage law, in accordance with which a woman legally married in one state would find herself legally married in every state."

Annie Jenness Miller: "Make the gateway of escape as wide as possible."

Congressman McAdoo: "Make divorces odious; no national law wanted; let states manage their own business."

Mayor Hart of Boston: "Let us all blush for our marriage and divorce laws."

Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota: "Marriage is a divine institution which is desecrated by divorce."

Sarah K. Bolton: "Having worked in benevolent and Christian societies all my life, and seen women and little children made dependent on charity through intemperance and failure to support, I cannot think that infidelity should be the only cause for divorce."

Bishop Whitehead: "Heartily in favor of a national law."

William S. Holman: "Marriage belongs exclusivly to the field of state legislation."

Supposing Senator Sherman, or Howard Crosby, or Joe Cook, or Congressman McAdoo, or Bishop Whipple should find themselvs married to a woman who did not love them, and whom they did not love—would they desire to remain in marital relations with her all their lives? We do not believe they would, and do not believe that any sensible man or woman can honestly answer the question affirmativly. Yet, to be consistent, they must do so.

The most sensible answers in the Herald are given by women—Kate Field, Annie Jenness Miller, and Sarah K. Bolton. Make divorce easy and you remedy most of the ills that afflict matrimony. The ills resulting from separation, too, can be more easily cured than those springing from a continuity of marriage enforced by law.

It is encouraging to reformers to note that the prospects of the preachers in getting a national law are not bright. A national law would be a retrogressiv step.

A Specimen Missionary.

Mr. Clark P. Streeter has been exploring the West India islands in search of new species of birds for a Boston taxidermist. On his way home he passed through New York and was interviewed by a Herald reporter. Mr. Streeter first visited Kingston, Jamaica, and then went to the three Cayman islands, a group lying west of Jamaica, in the Caribbean sea, about three hundred miles from Kingston. It was on these islands that he found a typical Protestant missionary. His description is of interest:

"There are probably three thousand people on the entire group, which is owned by Great Britain, though John Bull takes very little notice of it. Jamaica is supposed to look after these islands. There is no governor, but a sort of magistrate who holds court when necessary in his own house.

"The people are all Protestants, and they hav schools, though the education obtainable at one of them would hardly fit one for a college professorship. The first missionary who ever went there started a rum-shop. This was a few years ago. He preached on Sunday and sold rum during the week. The one there now, a Mr. Rutty, believes thoroughly in the doctrin of eternal punishment. He does not fail to impress upon his parishioners the idea that if they do not come down liberally in the support of the church, they will be held to a strict account at the final judgment.

"Cayman Brack, on which Pastor Rutty is now living, is the most prosperous of the three islands. Probably the total annual income would reach $9,000, and the pastor gets about half of it. The people are very ignorant and superstitious, and the pastor has a great deal of influence. He has established a number of offices, apparently as a source of revenue. For instance, there is an office for the registration of births and deaths, and an English shilling is charged for each registration. He also performs all the marriage ceremonies and charges for them.

"Three times a week he preaches, and he has succeeded in getting three small churches—small huts without doors or windows—built in different parts of the island. He goes about Cayman Brack on a sorry-looking nag, whose ribs can be counted as easily at ten yards as the pickets on a fence. Rutty often brings the people in from the fields to hold a prayer-meeting, and they are now getting a little tired of it, though they do not dare to grumble. Rutty never fails to pass the contribution-box, and though the people are very poor it never comes back to him empty."

Probably nine of every ten missionaries sent out by the church are of the class of men of which Pastor Rutty is so enterprising a member. Their greed for wealth is greater than their desire to civilize the people among whom they liv. They are speculators and despots, and do not hesitate at all to use the terrors of their faith as means to compel the converts to giv them a large share of their wealth. It is a lazy and unenterprising missionary indeed who can not in a few years scare and force enough money from his dupes to enable him to return to this country and liv for the remainder of his days in comparativ luxury. By standing in with the officials they are allowed to do pretty much as they please, and when church and state combine the servants of the Lord are rarely left in the division of the spoil of the people. Pastor Rutty is a good sample of missionary stuff, and the theological manufactory here has a large stock of him on hand.

Another One.

We learn from the San Antonio Daily Express of the existence of another converted Infidel. He is lecturing in San Antonio, and the following is the opening paragraph of his speech as reported by the Express:

"I was an Infidel for twenty years and taught disbelief in the Christian religion under the auspices of the central organization. I hav been the friend and follower of Ingersoll. I hav been in the prize-ring, and it was for an offense against the laws of Canada that I was imprisoned. It was in that jail in Canada that I realized the wrong of my past life. I was changed, and the change was brought about through the influence of the little tear-stained, thumb-marked Bible which my mother sent me."

He goes under the name of J. S. Merriman, and now makes a specialty of preaching to the poor. We havn't the slightest doubt that he has been in jail, and if lying were a criminal offense we hav no more doubt that he would be there again. When and where did the central organization of Freethought employ him, and when and where did he enjoy the high honor of possessing the friendship of Colonel Ingersoll? Places and dates are quite important in conversions of this sort.

Letters from Friends.

RICHMOND, HALIFAX, N. S., March 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2, and be good enough to send me the three named pamphlets, and please giv $1 to the statue of that wonderful man, Bruno. I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for over twelve years, and I am glad to hav so many of the works of D. M. Bennett.

Please send me a copy of the catalog of THE TRUTH SEEKER books and pamphlets. WILLIAM JOHNSTON.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., March 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I send you to-day some items in the "Kicker's Kolumn" of the St. Joseph Herald, to show you how "the skunk is stirred up" in our city. This (on the surface) is a priest-ridden place, abounding in convents, brothers' colleges, little sisters and big sisters, with their white caps and black caps, long-tailed robes and short-tailed, and God only knows what a'l of styles to produce effect on ignorant and superstitious minds. The whole gang are as one, however, when it comes to begging. Our business men, almost without exception, are afraid to refuse the meek-looking sisters when called on for aid. Under the hypocritical guise of charity priests are adopting the devil's own cunning to build up Catholicism. Oh, how strange it is that Americans will fold their arms and take "a little more sleep, a little more slumber," while this old hydra-headed monster is gnawing out the very vitals of this nation! *

FREDERICTON, N. B., March 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for the books mentioned in list inclosed.

I had the pleasure of reading your paper for a year when I was a subscriber at Brockton, Me., but since that time I hav been traveling so much that I hav had no settled address at which to get it. I sent for two copies lately, however, which I received all right, and the matter was very refreshing after reading so much religious intelligence and Talmage's sermons, which comprises the bulk of the reading matter in the country hereabout.

There are a few Liberals in Fredericton, but they are of the quiet and scared kind, who will take you into a back room and make sure that the door is locked before expressing their sentiments. They are afraid to assail the pet superstitions of the day for fear of losing caste. If you could send a good lecturer here to heave a bombshell into the ranks of the clergy, it might open their eyes. If I remain here this summer, I shall certainly subscribe, and perhaps get you some new names. MARTIN BUTLER.

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In reading an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 20th, by Mr. A. J. Mogyorosi, answering Mr. Jeremiah O'Brien, I was much impressed by what seemed to me the writer's sound logic and uncommonly clear and simple style. It was my idea that I could quite conclusivly answer Mr. O'Brien, and for my own satisfaction I wrote my answer, well knowing that there would be one in some early issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER with which to compare it. I find from reading Mr. Mogyorosi's article that on some points I was insufficient, though not so much so as to be discouraging. If it is not asking too much, I would like you through your valuable paper, for the benefit of others as well as myself, to publish the name of the manual of which Mr. Mogyorosi so earnestly spoke, as well as a few others on rhetoric, etc., if he will kindly advise.

You will please excuse this prolix way of asking so simple a question. I do it to make my motiv perfectly clear. I am ntensely interested in Liberalism, and hope to become a writer on the subject, which to me seems the essence of truth.

Very respectfully, J. A. WILBUR.

MONTE VISTA, COL., March 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5, which place to my credit. I called on the Methodist minister to-day, and offered to sell him a copy of the Field-Ingersoll discussion. He said that he had no time to read it; that his studies for the ministry occupied all his spare time; that oft-times he saw some works which he thought he would like to read, but the question would arise in his mind, "Had I better not attend to my studies?" Four long years, he said, it took to complete his studies. Thus you see the craft exercised by religious institutions to prevent their apostles from learning that Christianity is not true. Doubtless, most preachers believe those infamous dogmas are a matter of course. He said he had Father Lambert's "Notes," and implied that they were sufficient without the aid of Mr. Field. I remarked that Lambert's style (?) was savage, and would do but little good. He retorted that they needed something savage to cope with Mr. Ingersoll.

Is it possible, that in this age of religious liberty, with eighty thousand preachers, with all their Bibles and Bible houses, with reason almost eclipsed by superstition, and with all their vast wealth, they are forced to resort to savagery to answer one honest man who has attacked a religion which their master said "the gates of hell should not prevail against?"

Such tactics shall enjoy my loathing and contempt, and I shall do all I can with tongue and pen to expose the falseness of a system which produces no better influence over its devotees.

Poor man! Does he not think with me that, had Lambert the power, he would cheerfully giv orders to hav the Methodists' throats cut? Is there not now some poor Protestant languishing in a Catholic dungeon?

"A few more such good men might drive calumny from the lips of faith, and render the pulpit worthy of esteem;" again, "This good man made me his friend by being mine" (R. G. Ingersoll's tribute to a Methodist divine). Compare this with our minister's declaration. JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

102 E. 6TH ST., KANSAS CITY, MO., March 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Observing the wide scope of territory over which your list of correspondents are scattered, and the unusual amount of interest and intelligence manifested in every question that relates to this life and the next, from the egg problem to eternity, I venture to ask a favor of this ever alertful corps. I would like to learn if there is any desirable agricultural land owned by the government and open to homestead or preëmption claims. I hav vainly endeavored to gain some information on this subject from other sources, but hav failed so far. Now, the reason for such results, I dare say, is well known to all who hav been in my position. It is so difficult to get trustworthy information from any source other than a conscientious truth seeker, as nearly all seem to be actuated by pecuniary motivs, and they do not scruple to resort to the most palpable exaggeration of the desirability of one place and a like depreciation of another. So, you see, these conflicting reports are so contradictory in their nature that it is extremely bewildering, at least to me. Now, if any reader of this paper will grant the desired information through these columns or to the subscribed address, he will not only confer a favor on a party of Freethinkers, but will be compensated for his trouble in a more effectiv manner. JOHN HARVEY

WAMEGO, KAN., March 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Jas. H. Walker inquires of you where to find evidence in holy writ that the earth stands upon pillars. The references you giv him are right to the point, and there is at least one more place where direct evidence is given on this question, namely, 1 Sam. ii, 8: "For the pillars of the earth are the Lord's, and he hath set the world upon them." In verse 10 we are told, among other important things, that "the Lord shall judge the ends of the earth." Now, cannot we hav a correct picture of the earth in THE TRUTH SEEKER, by Watson Heston? He is well posted in the mysteries of godliness. We know that the earth has ends, and that there is a firmament and waters above the earth and pillars below, and that these pillars are the "Lord's;" also, that there are waters under the earth (see Second Commandment); but there are many of your readers who would like to know the approximate size and shape of the footstool on which we liv, as well as the strength and number of the pillars. It cannot be denied that these are important questions.

Is there a reliable translation of the Old Testament in existence? If so, I hav never been able to learn of it. I believe it would be a severe blow to superstition just at this time to publish a correct translation of the Old Testament, and that the sale of the book would pay for the labor involved. Next in order, in my opinion, would be to place the ancient Bibles, containing the originals of many of our beautiful Bible stories, before the public at low prices. A. T. MCMILLAN.

FAIRMONT, MINN., March 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: During the past week there has been held a teacher's institute in Fairmont for the instruction of school-teachers in the various branches of study requisit for teaching. The instructors gave notice that any question that might be asked would be answered. All questions were to be written on a slip of paper and put into a question box, and when the proper time came would be taken out and dealt with. There being some of the teachers stopping at our place, I said I would write a question or two and giv them to put into the box, if they would agree to it. They did so, and I gave them the following: "Who was Thomas Paine? Of what value were his services to America during the Revolution?"

The questions were placed in the box, and when taken out by the professor were squelched right there. The paper was mashed together in his hand and thrown away. I was asked to write another one, and told they would continue putting it every day until answered. It was taken the second day, and this time it was answered with the excuse that he had not time to answer it before. He told considerable about Paine, but wound up, with his head down, that he was regarded by some as an Infidel. This was probably the first time that Mr. Paine's name was ever brought in a prominent manner before any school in our country, and I am not sorry that I hav been instrumental in having it done.

I received the pamphlets containing the discussion between Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Coudert, and Mr. Woodford, and hav distributed them. They are neat in form, nice large print, and interesting alike to Jew or gentile. I hope they will be largely circulated. JOHN MERRITT, JR.

SALEM, O., March 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav never as yet written a word of praise on the cartoons of Heston, I thought that it had now come to my turn. After reading one of Talmage's sermons—the one he delivered last Sunday, March 24th, in which he explains some of the tough things of the Bible—I think that Heston and Talmage are both doing a good work on the aforesaid tough things. The preacher, in speaking of the loading up of the ark, supposes Noah saw vermin, and the like, crawling in. Well, that is bad for Noah. And how are we going to forgiv him for not sweeping off his gang-plank such vermin as rats, mice, roaches, and bedbugs, etc? Of course, we believe he saw them, for did he not hav an Ethiopian holding his nose with one hand, while shoving along a box with the other marked "skunk." See cartoon. A man so particular about loading up a skunk would naturally be careless about the vermin, thinking that he had the essence of all trouble in the box.

He next reaches out into the shooting-star business. "He heard his father tell of the heavenly bodies being in motion—thousands of stars shooting—and that no astronomer has ever been able to explain that star-shooting." Well, I hav, for the first time, yet to find any of our modern astronomers who plead ignorance as to the cause of a meteoric shower. All appear to agree that it is caused by the earth passing through the orbits of comets. And for the proof of this I would refer to the American Encyclopedia, vol. xi, p. 429 (and one will find that stars do not shoot), also Proctor's "Other Worlds Than Ours," p. 202. Talmage settles the big fish story with a grand flourish. Having seen the skeleton of a whale with a mouth plenty large enough to hold a man, he admits of some large fish that could take a man into his stomach; then all a man would hav to do would be to trot around lively to keep the gastric juices from acting upon and destroying him. And in his anxiety to hav Jonah overcome this juice, he forgets to pump in fresh air enough for the three days' trot, leaving us to think that perhaps he might die for the want of it before the juice would begin to work. But then, I am willing to wait awhile, and by the time Heston gets around to Jonah and the whale, we can then take up the sermon, and, between the two, we may hav things explained in a better way. J. H. MCDOWELL.

FRANKFORD, MO., March 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: We (wife and I) feel greatly encouraged. "The meetings will continue." We had a talk last evening with a neighbor who has been raised in the blessed hard-shell faith. He is honest, intelligent, benevolent, etc., and a good citizen. We hav been trying for several years to get some expression from him in regard to the fallacies in the Bible. Once we asked him what he thought of the barren fig-tree business. He merely said: "I don't know whether there were any figs on the tree or not." Similar evasiv answers hav been his forte until the present. We gave him our TRUTH SEEKERS, hoping to get his opinion on the Nine Demands—but not a word. Next we gave him the Blair bill and what has been said of it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which opened his eyes, and mouth, too, and we found him in line with us—bitterly opposed to any meddling with the Constitution. "Such a thing [the bill] would destroy our liberties and finally end in bloodshed. It would be getting back to the old Blue laws [TRUTH SEEKER information]. Thought we had a right to think, speak, and act, so it did not interfere," etc. We told him he was a "way-up" Liberal and considerable Infidel, to which he replied, "If what I hav said makes one, I am one." So we mark him down as our third intelligent, thoughtful convert. He told us of his brother in Texas who is, I believe, a "pulpit-pounder," who has been excommunicated from his church for talking against the Sunday law. A "doubting Thomas" soon finds reason to exclaim, "My Lord and my God!" This same Thomas was the first who gave the title of God to Jesus. It is worthy of remark that from this time forward the whole of the disciples treated our Lord with the utmost respect (Dr. Clark's Commentary). Don't think I shall be able to get even one more subscriber, but I am "dead sure" of renewals from those obtained last year. The often repeated words are true, "We cannot get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER."

In "Letters from Friends" I see one from Granada, Col., dated Jan. 28, 1889. Will "Mugwump" please address me, as I would like to stop over somewhere in his country?

Very truly, F. D. HUTCHINSON.

CLEVELAND, O., March 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Underwood-Bates debate at Cleveland took place at Case Hall, one of the largest in the city, on the evenings of March 21st, 22d, and 23d, and attracted a great deal of local attention. The two leading dailies gave a two to three column report of each night's proceedings. One of them, which has strong orthodox tendencies, and never reports Liberal meetings, tried to make it appear that the disputants were about evenly matched, but it did not seem so to disinterested listeners. The subject the first evening was the proposition, "Some of the Teachings of Christianity are Detrimental to the Welfare of Mankind," which was affirmed by Mr. Underwood, while Dr. Bates endeavored to disprove the claim. The second evening Dr. Bates affirmed, "The Bible Contains Special Revelations from God to Man," and on the third night took the affirmativ that "The Miraculous is Both Possible and Probable."

Mr. Underwood is too well known as a writer, lecturer, and debater to make it necessary for me here to say anything in his praise. His well-earned reputation, reaching back through a quarter of a century of public life, does that much more effectivly. Rev. C. S. Bates, D.D., is pastor of St. Paul's Episcopal church, this city, and is regarded as one of our ablest local ministers.

The audience was comprised very largely of the thinking people of the city, all schools and shades of thought being represented. In brief, it was a notable gathering. Gen. Ed. S. Meyer, one of Cleveland's prominent lawyers, presided in an admirable manner during the debate.

The divergent styles of the speakers was one of the noticeable features of the controversy. Dr. Bates is a very fluent talker, eloquent at times, and appealed directly to the sympathies of his hearers, apparently directing his efforts to those in accord with his own views. Mr. Underwood, on the contrary, made no attempts at oratorical flights or catchy phrases, but talked to the reason, and appealed to the common sense and every-day experience of the listeners' lives, suggesting it was more probable in the biblical accounts of the miraculous that the writers were either deceived or deceiving than that the things actually happened. The results of this method were apparent in the expressions of the faces of those who, for the first time, perhaps, saw their idols crumbling under such a practical test. It would be strange if the opponents of Liberalism gained anything by this discussion, yet stranger still if some hav not been started a step along the road toward Rationalism. Dr. Bates undoubtedly maintained his position as well as any clergyman could, but joint public discussion is a losing game for them, and I think Dr. Bates recognized this before the close of the discussion. Cleveland Freethinkers are well pleased with the outcome, believing that the local car of moral progress has made another hitch onward.

Sunday afternoon, following the debate, Mr. Underwood lectured before the Secular Union on "Evolution, and What It Implies in Regard to Religion," edifying the audience with the fruits of his learning and study. In the evening he spoke before the same body, at their pleasant rooms in the city hall, on "The Necessity of Maintaining a Rational Sunday, and the Secularization of the State," demonstrating the truth of the proposition in his usual logical way, and to the satis faction of all. For modes of faith let quarreling Christians fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is always right.

MR. EDITOR: On making my initial bow as one of your would-be future correspondents, allow me to say that I take a very lively interest in the noble cause with which you are identified, and of which your paper is so able an exponent.

The cause you advocate and plead for is the elevation and the welfare of humanity, but the latter will never reach its normal point of greatness till the human mind becomes free from the shackles of mental slavery and superstition. Then, and only then, can he whose brow alone fronts the heavens stand erect and noble in the greatness and glory of his dignity and manhood.

It goes without asking among those who know me that I am an Atheist of the wickedest stripe. I confess to the truth of the last sentence, all but the only adjectiv contained in it. Yes, I hav been a disbeliever in the existence of a god of humbug since I mastered Euclid's pons asinorum, or became acquainted with his axioms, i.e., about sixty years ago..

Now, in philosophy there are axioms as plain as those of Euclid, one of which is the indestructibility of matter, which proves that matter is uncreated and eternal, and supplementing this by another axiomatic argument, viz., de nihilo nihil fit, i.e., something can never be an outcome from nothing, any man—every man—of unbiased, unprejudiced judgment must reach the same "wicked" conclusion that I did.

I shall now giv my reason for refusing assent to what theologians call "original sin"—the sin of "man's first disobedience in eating the forbidden fruit of that tree whose mortal taste brought death into the world," etc. Now, Mr. Editor, the best way to prove or disprove anything is the simplest and shortest, since "brevity is the soul of wit." Here the reductio ad absurdum comes to my aid.

The Irish landlords are a bad lot, and the worst among the crowd is Lord Lansdowne. Yet, notwithstanding his hellish cruelty and avarice, he never ejected any of his numerous tenants except for non-payment of rent. Now we are told of another landlord, in reality "monarch of all he surveyed, and whose right there was none to dispute." Well, this Lord Lordalmighty, by nature kind, loving, and forbearing, had but one tenant, by name Mr. Adam, yet this kind, loving, and forbearing landlord fired him out for the terrible crime of eating an apple—in fact, it was a sour, bitter crab! Now, who believes this pure and unadulterated lie? Who, to-day, believes that God applied the top of his patent-leather to Adam's caudal appendage and fired him out? Echo answers, Who?

Now, when the pueril dogma of "original sin" goes by "the board," it carries the crucifixion and atonement with it (I suggest an improvement in orthography, viz., cruci-"fiction"), and the phantom ship of Christianity becomes submerged—wrecked in the black sea of superstition. Down, down she goes engulfed in the seething waters, and "like the baseless fabric of a vision, leaves not a wreck behind."

Of the cruci-"fiction" I will only say, on behalf of our common humanity, that such an atrocious and damnable crime never occurred of making the just and innocent suffer for the unjust and the wicked, unless by mistake. The learned rabbi, Solomon Schendler, of Boston, observes that the infliction of death by crucifixion was not in vogue among the Jews at the time Christ is supposed to hav lived. He says it was by stoning. He indignantly repudiates the vile slander that the Jews put any such man as Christ to death.

In conclusion, I will say that Christianity is as dead as an Egyptian mummy. I shall not refer to it again. The body of a defunct corpse can never be reanimated.

Fraternally yours, I. W. COX.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., March 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $2 for eight months' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. My delay in sending this is owing to the fact that within the last few weeks I hav had charge of thirty cases of small-pox and varioloid at the Onondaga county house. Our buildings were under quarantine, and it was impossible to send letters out. The epidemic broke out among us when the hospitals and asylums were crowded to their utmost capacity with three hundred and fifty inmates, consisting of maniacs, cripples, vagrants, paupers, and ex-convicts. No prayers to God cleared the house of this scourge. The work was done by the vaccine point, corrosiv sublimate, carbolic acid, sulphuric acid, blue vitriol, green vitriol, and white vitriol. Walls, floors, furniture, clothing, everything, was saturated with these death-dealing agents.

In daily contact myself with the very virus of the disease, handling the patients as though they were sick with some non-contagious malady, I hav passed through these days of imprisonment unscathed by the germ of variola.

Words can hardly depict the terror that prevailed in the villages of Onondaga. Farmers even feared that the smoke from our bonfires of clothing would convey the disease to them. A Sunday-school superintendent in the village called a mass meeting with the endeavor to find some one of the officials to whom to attach blame. There was quite an activ White-Cap spirit manifest at this meeting, particularly by church-members, among whom the Sunday-school superintendent was the leading spirit.

Now, if there is any man for whom I hav a minimum of respect it is the man who, in a common calamity, is sneaking around to find somebody to thump for it. It reminds me of the days of witchcraft, when in times of epidemics, earthquakes, etc., the fathers of the church pounced upon innocent people, accused them of occult practices, and executed them per order of Jehovah.

Now, for a physician of eight months' practice, I hav had a fair experience in dealing with the most dreaded epidemic of this latitude. I am feeling triumphant in the success we hav had in staying this disease, and feel quite willing to cross swords with yellow fever or anything else in the midst of which men fortified with the "grace of God" often tremble.

Some years ago a relativ of mine, a man well known to many Liberals, was crossing, during a furious storm, from Isle Royal to the coast of Michigan. In the boat with him was one of the officials of the Canadian government, and some half-dozen oarsmen who were Catholics. When it seemed that the boat must submerge, the oarsmen dropped their oars and crossed themselvs. Thereat my uncle swore a terrible oath, leveled a revolver in their midst, and commanded them to pull or die. They pulled; the boat was landed on the Lake state shore, and years afterward the man whose oaths seemed to the poor Catholics more terrible than the storm was introduced by the Canadian officer to an assemblage of his distinguished friends with these words: "Gentlemen, I hav heard of much being accomplished by the efficacy of prayer, but here is a man who, in the face of shipwreck upon Lake Superior, demonstrated to me the efficacy of 'sware.'"

Show me a man that in a place of danger can thunder out a blood-curdling oath, and he will be the man that will flinch the least when his energy is most required. In school and college, during years of travel and "roughing it," I hav observed that the dude, the Christian young man, and the debauchee are not removed many degrees from each other. Acquaintance with criminals of all varieties has emphasized the fact that it is rare to find an unbeliever among them.

But meaner in my eyes than the criminal is the man who, under the banner of the church, daring not to overstep the bounds of law, attempts to bibleize science, fetter the liberty of thought, and make the law of this free land the ally of bigotry.

I remain an admirer of that valuable journal THE TRUTH SEEKER, and shall probably continue to be a subscriber as long as it is a social medium to the Freethinking public.

CHAS. E. BOYNTON, B.S., M.D.

HAMILTON, ONT., March 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: When of the age of seven years I was put to liv with an uncle until I was of the age of twenty-one years. This uncle was a warm member of the Presbyterian church, and one of its leading ones. While living in this family I had an opportunity to become familiar with the Bible, being present and assisting in reading three chapters every day during the family devotions, reading the book in its order; and in so reading it was read through by us a number of times, consequently all of its miracles and all are fresh in my memory. I also was taught to believe it was the duty of every living person to pray to God, that God did exist, and that he was a personal God, having the attributes of man, as well as a supreme being—a being beyond the comprehension of mortals on earth, a God greatly to be feared and greatly to be adored. And under such teachings I grew to manhood. I was always watchful to see some evidence of the existence of this superior being, and when I heard Christian people praying to this individual being, asking of him favors for themselvs or others—favors that they were in need of, and favors that God could with propriety grant, I never could see that any of those prayers were answered, any more than if they were never offered. I hav seen events occur that were prayed for, and was satisfied they would occur if not prayed for. But I never did or could discover a special answer to prayer. I am seventy-five years old, and hav listened to as much prayer as almost anyone has, and during all these years I am unable to recall an instance wherein a special answer was the result.

It is nearly or quite sixty years since the cholera raged terribly in Europe and Asia, proving fatal to most of its victims. And it was found the plague in some way might reach America, and Christian people in this country were earnest in their prayer that God would keep the plague from us. And so earnest were those prayers—not only by the clergy, whose vocation was to pray, but all who believed in the offering of prayer united in the same request. It was but a few months after the commencement of the following year the Asiatic cholera, as it was then called, crossed the Atlantic and made its first appearance in New York city. The disease was terribly contagious and very fatal, scarcely one ever recovering, and people of New York fled from their homes for the country. At this moment prayers were offered to the Lord that he would stay this awful scourge. So alarmed were people at the ravages of the cholera, that a day was set as a day for a national fasting and prayer that the Lord would stay the plague. At the time set all Christian people in America were supposed to be united in prayer for just one thing and no other. And many believed the unnumbered prayers offered on that day would cause a check to the spread of the dreadful epidemic, but it made no perceptible difference, the disease following the watercourse from New York to Albany, on to Utica, up the Erie canal, to Rochester, Buffalo, up the lakes, up and down the rivers of the West, and sweeping from the face of the earth many thousands. The thought occurred to many, Why is it that all the Christian people in the country are on their knees begging of the Lord for but one thing, that he stop the spread of the cholera plague, and yet he pays no attention to them, for the plague continues until the season puts an end to it? During my observation I hav on six different occasions seen all the Christian people of this country who believe in the efficacy of prayer all united in prayer for one special favor, and in not one of those cases was their prayer answered—no, not in the remotest degree. The last notable instance is of recent occurrence, when about all the ministers in the United States, in company with churches and all who had faith in prayer, were united as one individual, asking the Lord for just one thing, and that one thing was claimed to be for his own benefit and his deceased son's more than for the benefit of the suppliants. And in this as well as in all the others those prayers ended in nothing.

This last effort was the most vehement of all I witnessed, embracing ministers, Young Men's Christian Associations, the Women's Christian Temperance Unions, Christian Endeavor associations, as well as all the Christian churches, all laboring and praying with this one request, a request they all wanted answered. But, as usual in such cases, their prayers were only wasted efforts. By this latter case I mean the recent political effort engineered and led on by ministers of the different churches of the land, in their efforts to create and establish a religious political party called Prohibitionist, instituted for the promotion of temperance ostensibly. And what is most notable in this defeat is, the Prohibition party in not having had their prayers heard, were badly defeated, and the temperance cause was so badly shattered it will take years of judicious nursing to put it where it was a few years since.

Now the question comes up: If God is a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God, why does he not manifest it? Prayers are constantly being offered and no response is ever made, and yet they keep on praying, and will so continue as long as there are people to hear them and pray for them. Few prayers are made in private. They are all made to entertain the hearers. And from upward of sixty years of close observation I am compelled to believe there is no such thing as a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering being. If there is, I am desirous of knowing it. It is a matter that concerns all living persons, and I know of but one way to ascertain the important fact. I will be one of five hundred persons who will pay $500 each, making $250,000, all to be paid as agreed, upon the discovery of the existence of a personal living God, Jehovah, as he represents himself in what is called the "holy Bible," and let the test be something like the following: Hav the believers in the existence of a personal God raise a like amount as the doubters. Place the money in the hands of those selected. And those who believe in the existence of God, Jehovah, ask that he manifest his existence in a manner he was in the habit of hundreds, thousands of years since, and if he sees fit to do so, then all the money those doubters hav raised shall be paid over to those who hav prevailed upon God to manifest himself. And if he fails to giv proof of his existence and power, and a failure is made on the part of his believers, in a manifestation, then the believers are to forfeit their money to the doubters. Hav the thing done something in the same way it was done as recorded in 1 Kings xviii, 18-40. Or, if God cannot or will not do as he then did, ask him to show a miracle, as he would often do all along for thousands of years, as is revealed in his recorded word. Hav him raise to life one dead person, or turn a human and living person into a lump of salt. Or, if that cannot be repeated, hav him appear as he did to Moses—in a burning bush—and talk audibly, as he then did. And if that cannot be done over again, hav an animal open his mouth and talk intelligently, as in the case of Balaam. But not hav the same kind of animal as did Balaam. We hav too many jackasses now, with their mouths open, preaching what they nor no one else believes. If this challenge is accepted, let it be done at once. The doubters will do well to commit the preliminaries and management of their part to the Secular Union. The believers will make their own arrangements, and if this suggestion or plan gets even a faint manifestation of the existence of the being so much boasted of, the party who lose their money need not grudge it. The discovery is worth the cost.

When the Christian believers make known their willingness to perform what is asked of them, let each party agree upon the amount of money needed to call forth the evidence of the existence of the living Jehovah, Hebrew God. Then the doubting ones will at once commence to raise the amount necessary on their part, for no others are more desirous to ascertain the existence and power of this concealed being than are the class called Infidels, and this class numbers three-fourths of the intelligent people.

From the fact this supreme being is usually present on the occasion of burnt offerings, there would be more prospect of a success on the part of the believers if this test were to be held on the occasion of a burnt offering. If so, hav this test conducted just as it was at a trial test when Elijah conducted it on the part of the believers, as recorded in 1 Kings, where a conclusiv test was obtained. And if the believers in the existence of this supreme being are willing to risk their money for his discovery, here is a chance for them. And if they say they want the wager larger, the unbelievers will double it as far as the believers will meet them. If those who so believe in this supernatural being will not notice this honest proposition, then let them cease their efforts to get our national government to make laws for the benefit of this unknown being.

I hope others will express their views on this subject, and when the preliminaries are arranged my $500 will be ready. And if a discovery of this supreme being is obtained by this means, the Infidels who hav been the means of this discovery can well afford to part with the forfeiture of their money, for the believers in the existence of this being hav never attempted to call him out. And if they neglect or refuse to meet this challenge, it is sure evidence they hav no faith in the existence of the being they so worship. CARLTON RICE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"Like John."

"How much a kindly word can do!"
Shall I tell you what two did,
And how the story of one lad's life
In two little words was hid?

Now, Mike was only a poor street boy,
And hungry, too, I ween,
When the sorrowful look of his soft brown eyes
By dear little Kittie was seen.
"Here's bread for you, you poor, poor boy,
And a cake with sugar on;
And I think perhaps I'll giv you a kiss,
For you're so like my brother John.
And John the bestest boy, you know,
That ever could be, and I love him so."

Mike's eyes shone out. Of the village lads—
And he knew them every one—
The veriest hero among them all,
He thought, was this "brother John."
"Am I like you—like a boy who livs
In a great house on the hill?
I would giv my life to be like you!"
John laughed, "You can, if you will."

So John, with his tutor grand and grim,
Studied from day to day;
And little Mike kept pace with him
In the school-house dark and gray.
Then John, as a business man to be,
Entered his father's store;
And Mike went, too, the chores to do,
Run errands and tend the door.

Then Jack went forward to sell the goods,
And Mike had letters to write,
Till side by side, with courage high,
They worked from morn till night.
Forever and aye what Jack would do
There Mike must follow on,
For dearer and dearer the motto grew,
"I must always be 'like John.'"

Yes, boys, a hero is what we want—
A hero good and true,
Who knows the path and will light the way
And show us what to do.
Some day, when Mike is a merchant prince,
And is asked how success is won,
He will smile and say, "I found the way
By trying to be 'like John.'"

The Story of American Literature.

Name over a dozen great writers with whom we are all familiar, whose names are on every tongue.

Dickens, Macaulay, Thackeray, Shakspere, Pope, George Eliot, Byron, Carlyle, Burns, Walter Scott, Hume, Gibbon, and Johnson.

Indeed, among the great writers of our language, we find scarce mention of an American. It is, in truth, distinctivly "English literature."

Looking over our history, which extends over less than three centuries, we cannot but find justification for this in our struggles for life and liberty.

Our annals read more of action—less of thought.

Battles against every conceivable obstacle—a very struggle for existence—do not tend to ripen the genius of the class who wield the pen.

Few countries can show two such fearful wars within less than a hundred years—pure, ennobling thoughts are not fostered by strife and bloodshed.

Our short history of literature, American literature, is divided into three parts—the colonial period; that is, when our population was scattered here and there along the Atlantic coast, when we were the thirteen colonies, under English rule.

Next, the Revolutionary period, embracing the eight years of the war for Independence.

Then, the national period, from July 4, 1776, to the present time.

The leading lights of the first period were undoubtedly Jonathan Edwards and Benjamin Franklin.

The aim of both was to benefit their fellowmen, but each took his own way to accomplish it.

Jonathan Edwards gave a minor importance to this life, ever aiming to fit his readers for a life to come.

Franklin started a penny paper to diffuse general knowledge among the poor and middle classes. He proved by his renowned experiment that lightning is electricity. He represented his country so well at the French court that he, perhaps, made the Revolutionary war the success it was; for it was untold aid we received from France during our great struggle. He taught his brothers how to liv well when, in "Poor Richard's Almanac," he embodied the principles of thrift, honesty, and economy.

The man whose name is on every tongue—who is living one after-life, at least, in all our hearts—is the one of these two who best succeeded in his life work.

The Revolutionary period was a time of quick, decisiv action. There was time only for the men to fight, and for the women to plow and mold bullets and teach their children patriotism and love for the country their elders were fighting for.

The statesmen were the writers of the day, and political papers and pamphlets their work.

Now, the national period.

Perhaps it was the flush of victory at having freed themselvs from tyranny of government that caused the theological "war of words" that ensued.

Some of the pioneers of American Freethought probably thought the time was ripe to free themselvs from the toils of superstition.

And here, towering above his opponents, appears the man of whom we are all proud, Thomas Paine, with his "Age of Reason" and "Rights of Man."

The reaction following this excitement is represented by the easy-going essayists, full of fancy and imagination, with a vein of humor through it all.

Washington Irving stands at the head of this class—he who has done nearly as much for the Hudson as nature herself! Why, the Catskills are only a group of hills until you people them with the "Ninepin crew," "the wicked flagon," and old Rip Van Winkle himself!

The "Sketch Book," in which this quaint story of Rip Van Winkle is told, is probably his most interesting work.

Then follow two of our first poets, Drake and Halleck, the latter mostly famed for the popular poem, "Marco Bozzaris."

Now our first famous novelist, James Fenimore Cooper. He was a very voluminous writer, producing over thirty different books.

Many of the historical events described are very inaccurate, and it is sometimes said that his work, more than all else, led Europeans into the belief that Americans were a mixture of Indians and adventurers.

His most noted character was "Leather-stocking," a backwoodsman, who was one of "nature's noblemen," and who figured in many of Cooper's stories.

Next come our great poets Dana, Bryant, Longfellow, Whittier, and Holmes.

"Thanatopsis," meaning a view of death, is probably Bryant's prodigy, for although it is the perfect work of a great man, it was written when he was but seventeen.

This poet's style, in which he combines vividness with quiet, may be well illustrated by this couplet from "The Death of the Flowers:"

When the sound of dropping nuts is heard,
Though all the woods are still,
And twinkle in the smoky light the waters of the rill.

Longfellow has many times been rightly called the "poet of the people," and Whittier, too, the great poet of antislavery, we all know.

Holmes is as much noted for his prose work, "Autocrat at the Breakfast Table," as for his poems, and has sometimes been called the "poet-laureate of America."

At this period come in the sister poets, Alice and Phebe Cary. Also Edgar Allen Poe—a grand life wasted.

In 1804 was born America's greatest novelist, Nathaniel Hawthorne. His three greatest books are "Marble Faun," the scene of which is laid in Italy, and "House of Seven Gables" and "Scarlet Letter," New England stories.

All of these stories—all his works, in fact, hav a weirdness of style combined with their great elegance of finish. Perhaps a part of their fascination lies there.

Then come Bancroft and Motley, our greatest historians, and James Russell Lowell, who is critic, prose and poetry writer, editor, and statesman.

Now comes Emerson.

Concord, Massachusetts, is ever famed for the first battle of the Revolutionary war, but that fame is outdone, in the estimation of some, by the fact that, at one time or another, it has been the home of Louisa M. Alcott, and Bronson Alcott, her father, of Henry D. Thoreau, one of our greatest naturalists, of Nathaniel Hawthorne, and of Emerson, the American philosopher, also a famous poet and essayist.

Among the latter's work is "Representativ Men," which was a series of lectures that he delivered in England.

Margaret Fuller is also of this time, and the scientists Audubon and Agassiz, and Noah Webster of dictionary fame.

Now come a series of very modern names the owners of whom are mostly living at present, and of whom all of us know more or less.

These are J. G. Holland, E. E. Hale, Marion Harland, and E. P. Roe. Bayard Taylor, novelist, writer of travels and of poetry; E. C. Stedman, the banker-poet; and Celia Thaxter and "Gail Hamilton," whom we often meet in print.

Poets, Bret Harte and Walt Whitman; John Hay, who is enjoying at present the fame derived from the Century war article; Mrs. Stowe of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" renown; Howells and James, the every-day novelists.

Perhaps the most talked of "about town" at present is Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy," than which no more charming child's story was ever put on paper.

After all, we may be quite proud of our literature of America.

LAURA PRICE STEWART.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

A Sunday-school and Band-of-Mercy male infant, after hearing the Bible passage read, "The young lions do lack and suffer hunger," feelingly inquired, "But, teacher, if they are real good little lions, won't God help the old lion catch a man for them to eat?"

Bennie, four years old, comes to visit for the first time his grandparents, who are still on the sunny side of life. "This little fellow," said his mother, introducing the stranger, "is Benjamin Franklin, named for his grandpa, and these people, Bennie, are your grandpa and grandma." The little fellow looks from one to the other and exclaims: "H'm! They're a sham. Real grandpas and grandmas hav white hair."

Eight-year-old Alice came to the table in so dreadfully boisterous a manner that her brother, who is preparing for a missionary, asked if she were a heathen, her father seconded the reproof, Aunt Sarah stared at her over her spectacles, and to cap the climax her mother quietly ordered her to the small table in the corner, there to dine by herself. The little offender promptly obeyed, and now fancy the scene when with closed eyes and clasped hands she said: "O Lord, help me to say grace in the midst of my enemies."—Sturdy Oak.

Correspondence.

LEBO, KAN., March 10, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will write to you for the first time. I am eight years old, and in the third reader. I study spelling, reading, arithmetic, and geography. I go to school to Miss Shortland. I like her very well for a teacher. I hav lots of schoolmates, George Brown, George Phillips, and others. My teacher livs out in the country. I once lived with her. She doesn't believe in the church. We hav two weeks' vacation; I hav lots of fun then. I hav three brothers and two sisters. Clara and Mary are the names of the girls.

Yours truly, WILLIE PENFIELD.

LEBO, KAN., March 10, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will write to you for the second time. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. He gets it every week, and I always spend a little time reading it. There were only six letters in the Children's Corner this week. I am well. There are three different schools here in Lebo. I worked on a farm last summer for a man, and I did not get anything for it. I plowed, harrowed, cultivated, raked hay, and did almost everything a man could do, and I like to work very much. The man I worked for is named F. B. King. They are both Christians. I go to Sunday-school, but papa does not make me. I just go to get pretty cards and papers to read. My Sunday-school teacher's name is Miss Swindler; the name of the superintendent of the Sunday-school is Mr. Colwell. Most of the people here go to church and believe in it.

Yours truly, ELBERT EDWARD PENFIELD.

GRANT FORK, ILL., April 3, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my third letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. You hav been kind enough to publish my other letters, and I hope that you are kind enough to publish this. I would be very much pleased if some of the children would write to me. I mean boys. I would like to get a letter from Stephie Marshall, and other boys, as soon as possible. Stephie said that he took great pleasure in reading the letters. I hope he will come across mine. We had a young coon for a few weeks, but one night he got away. How do you think he got away? I will tell you. He jumped through the collar, and that was the last we saw of him. It was like what the man said of his horse—the man said that he had to push on the lines so that his horse wouldn't swallow the bit. As I hav nothing more to tell, I will close. Hoping to hear from the boys as soon as possible, Your true friend, JOHN KRAFT.

THE

FIELD-INGERSOLL DISCUSSION.

FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

—o—

Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Dr. Field is one of the exceedingly few Christians who hav opposed Colonel Ingersoll kindly and courteously, and the Great Agnostic has used him accordingly. Dr. Field's arguments, however, are broken in pieces.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

At Seventy.

I lie becalmed in sight of home;
The low sun lights the glinting foam
With many an iridescent gleam,
That glimmers like life's morning dream.
At peace within this quiet bay,
Soft with the lapping tide I sway;
But heart and thoughts go wavering back
Across the storm-swept, sun-touched track
I sailed through many days.

Ah, me! the sunny morns I knew!
My white sails shimmered bright with dew,
And sea-birds' snowy wings flashed by
Like pearls set in the sapphire sky.
And, oh, the black nights tempest-tossed!
My torn sails drenched, my compass lost;
The bitter, cold foam swept my brow,
As mighty waves broke o'er me—now
The harbor-bar I've crossed.

And while I sit 'neath idle sail,
And listless wait the coming hail,
I idly grieve to think 'tis o'er—
That I so soon must touch the shore.
For life was sweet—ay, bitter sweet!
And though I'd not sail back to meet
The brightest day I knew of bliss,
I fain would know, beyond the mist,
What waits my tired feet.

South Bend, Ind. MAUD WHEELER.

New Publications.

Admirers of Paine will be glad to get a copy of the new edition of "Paine: The Religious and Political Reformer," by B. F. Underwood. Published by the Truth Seeker Company. Price, 10 cents.

Admirers of the bright and charming style of Voltairine de Cleyre may obtain for 10 cents a late production of her pen, "The Drama of the Nineteenth Century." It was originally delivered before the Pittsburgh Secular Society, Dec. 16, 1888.

Watts & Co. publish at 25 cents "The Curse of Conventionalism," a Remonstrance by a Priest of the Church of England. It is a well-argued and earnest protest against the horrors and monstrosities of present creeds, and the harmful, repressiv influence of organized orthodoxy.

August Buesing, Jacksonville, Fla., publishes "Is Yellow Fever an Imaginary Disease?" We are by no means prepared to accept his view of the nature of yellow fever; but anything in the way of self-assertiv judgment and challenge of authority and tradition sets a good example. This is a method of which we cannot hav too much, and for which we always hav a word of praise.

A book called "Ingersoll and The Deist" has been written by "A Nativ Tar Heel," and is kept for sale by Doane Herring, Wilson, N. C. Many objections to the affirmations of Colonel Ingersoll are set forth with acuteness and in clear and scholarly language. But whether the arguments are at bottom logical and valid, every reader must judge for himself. Any followers of the colonel who hav the least doubt of the ground on which they stand, and wish to examin it, will find in this book adverse criticisms that will help in the process of conscientiously viewing their position from all sides. Price, 25 cents.

Among the English Freethought papers there is one that we weekly feel impelled to single out for especial admiring praise. This is the Radical; it is one of the very best journals ever published, and its editor, Geo. Standring, is one of the very best editors that ever led a division of the Freethought ranks. The main purpose of the Radical, at its first publication, was the propagation of republicanism in England; now that doctrin is beginning to obtain sufficient support from the Liberal parliamentary and other parties, and this journal, we are pleased to see, is turning its efforts to the noble work of Freethought.

"Stepping-Stones to Agnosticism" is the title given by Watts & Co., London, to a series of Antichristian pamphlets. The first one, "Ecce Deus," proposes "A New God." Here is a sample objection to the old one:

The Christian believes in God and hell; a startling and impossible contradiction. Every lost soul that passes through hell-gates is an additional proof of God's incapacity to rule the world. The God of the Bible asserts his authority by pointing to hell. It is as if a physician should endeavor to convince us of his medical skill by showing us the graves of his patients. If God can do nothing more for the reformation of the wicked, it would be better to blot them out of existence altogether than permit them to remain as tokens of his moral feebleness. Singular God! while men wish to forget their failures, he takes pleasure in their contemplation.

Price, 10 cents.

Cynthia Leonard, the lady who lately ran for mayor of New York at the head of the Equal Rights, or woman's rights, party, is the author of a charming book entitled, "Pen Pictures." Even the most extreme contemners of the female intellect hav allowed that in certain qualities of literary style—grace, sprightliness, and delicacy of taste—women surpass men. All of these qualities are present in "Pen Pictures." And the airy structures of wit and fancy and tenderness reared in these sketches everywhere rest on a basis of logic sound and sensible. The book is a marvel of fine printing and binding. Any who are tired of the monotonous plodding of us males through leagues of dull argumentation may with relief turn to Mrs. Leonard's writings and see how a woman does it.

"Arguments Against the Use of the Bible in the Public Schools. By J. B. Stallo, George Hoadly, and Stanley Matthews, counsel for the Defendants, in the Case of John D. Minor, et als, vs. the Board of Education of the City of Cincinnati, et als. In the Superior Court of Cincinnati." This is a paper-covered volume of 178 large pages. There is a companion volume giving the arguments for, as presented by W. M. Ramsey, George R. Sage, and Rufus King. The two books constitute an encyclopedia of information and argument upon the matter of the use of the Bible in schools. They cover the whole ground and deal with every detail, and from each point of view. They will be of value to all interested in this special branch of the fight of Secularism against the church, and may be obtained from Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati, O. Price, 50 cents each.

"Life of Albert R. Parsons, with a Brief History of the Labor Movement in America." This book we hav received from Mrs. Lucy Parsons, Chicago, the publisher. The book is bound in cloth, and contains 254 large pages, with several illustrations. Says the writer: "It has been the endeavor of the author to make the present work not only biographical but historical—a work which might be relied upon as an authority by all future writers upon the matters contained in it. Hence nothing has been admitted to its pages that is not absolutely correct, so far as it was possible for me to verify it by close scrutiny of all matter treated." The first few chapters sketch the life of the subject and its incidents in chronological order, the most important chapter being from Parsons's own hands, written while in jail awaiting execution. A number of chapters follow, containing Mr. Parsons's correspondence, speeches, and travels in furtherance of the cause of labor reform. These are annotated with comments supporting the constitutionality and lawful character of his words and acts. More than half the book is occupied by the details of the Haymarket incident from the beginning of the eight-hour movement in the spring of 1886 to the death of the subject of the biography in the fall of 1887. This includes the Haymarket meeting and Parsons's speech thereat; the trial, and Parsons's speech in remonstrance to the sentence of death. "What human judge," it is asked, "can determin that there is such a necessary connection between one man's advice and another man's action as to make the former the cause of the latter?" $1.50.

The company publishing the American Sentinel, Adventist, Oakland, Cal., is doing noble work against the attempted religious usurpation of the Blair bill. It issues excellent tracts upon the matter, which will be mailed in packages of thirteen for 20 cents. From one, "The United States Constitution—Shall It be Preserved as It Is?" we copy a significant parallel between the present movement and the one that established Christianity at its beginning:

Under this Blair amendment the teachers in the public schools will hav to inculcate the principles of the Christian religion. Who are to compose the examining board that shall pass upon the qualifications and orthodoxy of the teachers? Assuredly none but the leading theologians in the churches. This will require that such a board shall be statedly convened to deal out what shall hav been decided by each successiv council to be the principles of the Christian religion. It was in this way precisely that the thing was worked in the fourth century and onward. Constantine made Christianity the recognized religion of the Roman empire. Then it became at once necessary that there should be an imperial decision as to what form of Christianity should be the imperial religion. To effect this an imperial council was necessary to formulate that phase of Christianity which was common to all. The council of Nice was convened by imperial command, and an imperial creed was established, which was enforced by imperial power. That establishment of an imperial religion ended only in the imperious despotism of the papacy. As surely as the complete establishment of the papacy followed and grew out of that imperial recognition of Christianity in the fourth century, just so surely will the complete establishment of a religious despotism after the living likeness of the papacy follow and grow out of this national recognition of Christianity provided for in the constitutional amendment proposed by Senator Blair, and which is now pending in Congress.

"Spiritualism from a Materialistic Standpoint," by B. F. Underwood, has always been a favorit with those opposed to the Spiritual philosophy. However, after all his arguments against the genuinness of the manifestations, Mr. Underwood has to conclude:

Without doubt, Spiritualism has assisted very largely to destroy faith in the authoritativ character of the Bible. Many hav been emancipated from the thraldom of the orthodox superstition who could hav escaped in no other way. They found in Spiritualism a field for the exercise of that marvelousness which before was fed by the fables of the Bible; and while the pleasant belief in immortal life was increased, it was divested of the horrors of the old faith. Spiritualism has gone among a class that Materialism could not reach, and done a work that Materialism could not do, except by a long period of education and experience. It could be shown that modern Spiritualism, by destroying old standards, and familiarizing the people with the discussion of sacred subjects, has encouraged freedom of thought and liberality of sentiment.

I can only add in conclusion that while I am no Spiritualist, I think that Spiritualism in the present transitional stage of thought is doing a work that is much needed, the value of which, however, would be increased, if through its press and its influential advocates it could be brought to oppose with "righteous indignation" the frauds and corruptions which now hav protection under its wing. There is so much in the theory and history of modern Spiritualism that is in marked contrast to the popular theology; its teachings in many respects are so far in advance of those of the churches; its literature so much more Liberal and in keeping with the spirit of the century; its press and its platform so comparativly free, and the intelligent and informed among its adherents so much more courteous and generous in the treatment of its opponents, that it has required from me something of a sacrifice of personal feeling to offer the criticisms which I hav uttered, and which I believe justice and impartiality demand.

Published by the Truth Seeker Company. Price, 10 cents.

"The Coming Creed of the World. Is There not a Faith more Sublime and Blissful than Christianity?" By Frederick Gerhard. This is a voluminous work of 526 pages. It is Antichristian, absolutely rejecting scripture, with creeds, ceremonies, miracles, and the whole paraphernalia of revelation. In its extensiv space it is enabled to present such a multitude of facts and arguments against Christianity, and historical instances of the evil character of the church, as make it a perfect treasure-house for a propagandistic Freethinker. We could name few books more suitable for a Freethinker to lend his Christian neighbors. The Antichristian evidence is exhaustiv and irresistible, the style so clear and simple as to be understood by a child, and the tone earnest, respectful, and sure of securing good will. Mr. Gerhard speaks of his work as "not the result of hasty labor, but the fruit of forty years of reflection and research." This may be well believed by one when viewing its comprehensivness, and the extent of scholarly research of its author evinced by quotations from a very large number of thinkers and scientists of the most various schools. What Mr. Gerhard proposes to giv us in place of Christianity is Deism, with a high devotion to humanity and morality. We will quote a paragraph from the work as a specimen of its style:

The youngest schoolboy is taught to consider those miracles which abound in the history of ancient nations as fables, but the miracles related in the Bible he must accept as facts and believe in them. When he reads of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, he is told that it is a fable, but the intended sacrifice of Isaac he is told is a truth. If he reads of Titans who attempted to storm the heavens, he is told it is mythology, and that Titans hav never existed; but giants, as reported in IV. Moses xiii. 33, and V. Moses ii. 11 and iii. 13, he is told hav existed, and even men, who are believed to hav existed, attempted to build a tower which was to reach into heaven, in which they did not succeed, because God descended from heaven and prevented them. If a schoolboy were told that Lycurgus, Numa, Buddha, Mohammed, or any other lawgiver had received his laws from heaven, he would not believe it; but he believes, and is compelled to believe, that Moses received his laws, which God himself had written on two tablets of stone, from God's own hand.

All the admiration that Freethinkers can ever giv to Rousseau will hardly pay the debt of gratitude they owe that father of modern religious and political liberty. We should never tire in study of the works of that great man. In Rousseau, says Carlyle, there is "a spark of real heavenly fire. With all his drawbacks, and they are many, he has the first and chief characteristic of a hero—he is heartily in earnest. In earnest, if ever man was; as none of these French philosophers were. He could be cooped into garrets, laughed at as a maniac, left to starve like a wild beast in a cage, but he could not be hindered from setting the world on fire." His "Profession of Faith of a Savoyard Vicar" has been translated and is published by Peter Eckler, New York. It contains Deistical views presented with great clearness and force. Here we hav the origin of the credulous beliefs in the countless fantastic "revealed" religions:

I conceived that the weakness of the human understanding was the first cause of the prodigious variety I found in their sentiments, and that pride was the second. We hav no standard with which to measure this immense machine; we cannot calculate its various relations; we neither know the first cause nor the final effects; we are ignorant even of ourselvs; we neither know our own nature nor principle of action; nay, we hardly know whether man be a simple or compound being. Impenetrable mysteries surround us on every side; they extend beyond the region of sense; we imagin ourselvs possessed of understanding to penetrate them, and we hav only imagination. Everyone strikes out a way of his own across this imaginary world; but no one knows whether it will lead him to the point he aims at. We are yet desirous to penetrate, to know everything. The only thing we know not is to contentedly remain ignorant of what it is impossible for us to know. We had much rather determin at random, and believe the thing which is not, than to confess that none of us is capable of seeing the thing that is. Being ourselvs but a small part of the great whole, whose limits surpass our most extensiv views, and concerning which its creator leaves us to make our idle conjectures, we are vain enough to decide what that whole is in itself, and what we are in relation to it.

Here is a conversation that represents very well the dialog usually held between the average dogmatical Christian and the Rationalist:

Dogmatist: Your reason tells you that the whole is greater than a part, but I tell you from God, that a part is greater than the whole.

Rationalist: And who are you, that dare to tell me God contradicts himself? In whom shall I rather believe; in him who instructs me in the knowledge of eternal truths by means of reason, or in you who in his name would impose on me the greatest absurdities?

Dogmatist: In me, for my instructions are more positiv, and I will prove to you incontestibly that he hath sent me.

Rationalist: How! will you prove that God hath sent you to depose against himself? What sort of proofs can you bring to convince me it is more certain that God speaks by your mouth, than by the understanding he hath given me?

Dogmatist: The understanding he hath given you! Ridiculous and contemptible man! You talk as if you were the first Infidel who was ever misled by an understanding depraved by sin.

Rationalist: Nor may you, man of God, be the first knave whose impudence hath been the only proof he could giv of his divine mission.

Dogmatist: How! can philosophers be thus abusiv?

Rationalist: Sometimes, when saints set them the example.

Dogmatist: Oh! but I am authorized to abuse you. I speak on the part of God almighty.

Rationalist: It would not be improper, however, to produce your credentials before you assume your privileges. . . . To tell me that my reason is fallacious, is to refute whatever it may say in your favor. Whoever refuses to abide by the dictates of reason, ought to be able to convince without making use of it. For, supposing that in the course of your arguments you should convince me, how shall I know whether it be not through the fallacy of reason depraved by sin, that I acquiesce in what you affirm? . . .

Dogmatist: My proofs admit of no reply; they are of a supernatural kind.

Rationalist: Supernatural! What is the meaning of that term? I do not understand it?

Dogmatist: Contraventions of the order of nature; prophecies, miracles, and prodigies of every kind.

Rationalist: Prodigies and miracles! I hav never seen any of these things.

Dogmatist: No matter; others hav seen them for you. We can bring clouds of witnesses—the testimony of whole nations——

Rationalist: The testimony of whole nations! Is that a proof of the supernatural kind? . . .

Dogmatist: What do you say to prophecies?

Rationalist: As to prophecies; I say, in the first place, I hav heard as few of them as I hav seen miracles; and in the second, I say that no prophecy bears any weight with me.

Dogmatist: Thou disciple of Satan! And why hav prophecies no weight with you?

Rationalist: Because, to giv them such weight requires three things, the concurrence of which is impossible. These are, that I should, in the first place, be a witness to the delivery of the prophecy; next, that I should be witness also to the event; lastly, that it should be clearly demonstrated to me that such event could not hav occurred by accident. For, though a prophecy were as precise, clear, and determinate as an axiom of geometry, yet as the perspicuity of a prediction made at random does not render the accomplishment of it impossible, that accomplishment when it happens proves nothing in fact concerning the foreknowledge of him who predicted it. You see, therefore, to what your pretended supernatural proofs, your miracles, and your prophecies reduce us—to the folly of believing them all on the credit of others, and of submitting the authority of God speaking to our reason, to that of man. If those eternal truths, of which my understanding forms the strongest conceptions, can possibly be false, I can hav no hope of ever arriving at certitude; and so far from being capable of being assured that you speak to me from God, I cannot even be assured of his existence.

The testimony given by the Jewish nation contradictory of the divinity of Christ is well made use of:

Do you know many Christians who hav taken the pains to examin carefully into what the Jews hav alleged against us? If there are a few who know something of them, it is from what they hav met with in the writings of Christians; a very strange manner indeed of instructing themselvs in the arguments of their opponents! But what can be done? If anyone should dare to publish among us such books as openly espouse the cause of Judaism, we should punish the author, the editor, and the bookseller. This policy is very convenient, and very sure to make us always in the right. We can refute at pleasure those who are afraid to speak.

Those among us, also, who hav an opportunity to converse with the Jews, hav but little advantage. These unhappy people know that they are at our mercy. The tyranny we exercise over them, renders them justly timid and reserved. They know how far cruelty and injustice are compatible with Christian charity. What, therefore, can they venture to say to us, without running the risk of incurring the charge of blasphemy? Avarice inspires us with zeal, and they are too rich not to be ever in the wrong. The most sensible and learned among them are the most circumspect and reserved. We make a convert, perhaps, of some wretched hireling, to calumniate his sect; we set a parcel of pitiful brokers disputing, who giv up the point merely to gratify us; but while we triumph over the ignorance or meanness of such wretched opponents, the learned among them smile in contemptuous silence at our folly. But do you think that in places where they might write and speak securely, we should hav so much the advantage of them? Among the doctors of the Sorbonne, it is as clear as daylight, that the predictions concerning the messiah relate to Jesus Christ. Among the rabbins at Amsterdam, it is just as evident that they hav no relation whatever to him. I shall never believe that I hav acquired a sufficient acquaintance with the arguments of the Jews, till they compose a free and independent state, and hav their schools and universities, where they may talk and dispute with freedom and impunity. Till then we can never really know what arguments they hav to offer.

To this work is appended a short allegory entitled, "A Search for Truth," by Olive Schreiner, a real gem in its way. The volume contains as frontispiece one of the best portraits of Rousseau that we hav ever seen. Price, 50 cents.

Paine Vindicated!

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

ARGUMENT

BY

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Gems of Thought.

NOTHING but pride could persuade those Jews that they were, to the exclusion of all others, the people cherished by providence. Blinded by their vanity, they did not perceive that his universal and infinit goodness was belied by supposing him capable of giving a preference to some particular men, or some particular nations, all of whom ought to be equal in his eyes, if it be true that they are equally the work of his hands. Nevertheless, on particular revelations are founded all the religions of the world. As each man has the vanity to think himself the most important being in the universe, so is each nation persuaded that to the exclusion of all others it ought to enjoy the tenderness of the sovereign of nature.—D'Holbach.

COULD we permit ourselvs to suppose that the almighty would distinguish any nation of people by the name of his chosen people, we must suppose that people to hav been an example to all the rest of the world of the purest piety and humanity, and not such a nation of ruffians and cutthroats as the ancient Jews were; a people who, corrupted by and copying after such monsters and impostors as Moses and Aaron, Joshua, Samuel, and David, had distinguished themselvs above all others, on the face of the known earth, for barbarity and wickedness. If we will not stubbornly shut our eyes and steel our hearts, it is impossible not to see, in spite of all that long-established superstition imposes upon the mind, that that flattering appellation of his chosen people is no other than a lie the priests and leaders of the Jews had invented, to cover the baseness of their own characters; and which Christian priests, sometimes as corrupt, and often as cruel, hav professed to believe.—Paine.

FOR every shooting-star he claimed a kiss,
She, seeming coy, at first demurred to this;
But he, persisting, would not be denied,
When he, at length, a flying meteor spied.
And so, as evening grew apace, their eyes
Oft scanned the glittering aspect of the skies;
And when a darting star caught either's sight
A sound of kissing broke upon the night.
And so it came to pass, anon, that she Looked for a shooting-star as much as he.
Nay, if by chance a star escaped his view,
She called his wandering fancy to it, too.
When intervals seemed long between each hug,
She called him on a passing lightning-bug;
And, ever taxing her ingenious mind,
Her ready wit enabled her to find
More shooting-stars in three short fleeting hours
Than would compose whole meteoric showers.
But when she did her last pretext exhaust,
And was about to yield her cause as lost,
She saw a switchman's lantern circling swing
And got the youth down to a steady thing.

"NEVER let a customer go away without making a purchase," said Mr. Threads to a newly engaged clerk; "talk the goods up in a clever, forcible way, and you'll be certain to make a sale every time." "All right," replied W. Fearless Gall, the new clerk, who had been an auctioneer for a year out West; "I think I know just what you mean, sir, and you can rely upon me. I know the tricks of the trade." Ten minutes later he was going on in this fashion to Mrs. Marshalle-Neale, one of the wealthiest and most aristocratic patrons of the house: "Damask towels, is it, madam? Well, I should smile! If you can't get damask towels here, there's no place in the city where you can get 'em. Look at that towel, my friend! Doesn't it fairly warm your heart to look at it, eh? And just glance at this pair, marked down from four dollars to a dollar and ten cents! Doesn't it fairly make you feel young again to gaze on a bargain like that? And supposing you just concentrate your intellectual capacity on this towel for a second! A-ha! makes you fairly hold your breath to gaze on it, doesn't it? Did you ever see anything more perfectly irresistible since you was born into this world of sin and sorrow? Of course, you never did! Oh, it's a cold day when this firm gets left on damask towels! Look at this one—look at it, woman; it won't bite you; now tell me, tell me if you ever bought a towel like that for less than two dollars? Of course you didn't! You've paid that for dish-towels, and thanked heaven for the privilege of doing so, havn't you? Course you hav, sweet friend of my childhood days!" Mr. Threads happened along just in time to hav his blood curdled by this last remark, and also in time to assist the gasping and livid Mrs. Marshalle-Neale to her carriage, where she bade him adieu forever, and two minutes later he was going through the same ceremony with Mr. W. Fearless Gall.—Puck.

THE pride of every Jew is interested to believe, that it is not his detestable politics, his ignorance of the arts, his rudeness, that has destroyed him; but that it is the anger of God that punishes him; he reflects with satisfaction that miracles hav been necessary to depress him, and that his nation is always the beloved of God, who chastises it. Let a preacher ascend the pulpit, and say to the French, "You are a set of wretches that hav neither courage nor conduct; you hav been beat at Hockstet and Ramilies, because you did not know how to defend yourselvs," he would get himself pelted. But if he were to say, "You are Catholics cherished by God; your sins hav irritated the eternal being, who delivered you into the hands of the heretics at Hockstet and Ramilies; but when you return to the Lord he will prosper your courage at Denain," these words would gain respect and esteem from his audience.—Voltaire.

THE reformer labors for the future. His ruling passion is duty. He is not perplexed with the corroding calculations of interest or popularity. The statesman is necessarily a trimmer and a temporizer. He labors for the present, and secures the honors and huzzas of the hour.—Joseph Cowen.

THOMAS PAINE lived a long, laborious, and useful life. The world is better for his having lived. For the sake of truth he accepted hatred and reproach for his portion. He ate the bitter bread of sorrow. His friends were untrue to him because he was true to himself, and true to them. He lost the respect of what is called society, but kept his own. His life is what the world calls failure and what history calls success.—Ingersoll.

PRIESTCRAFT cannot be put down, till man obtains his "being's end and aim," or is satisfied that it is attainable, in this material, this perceptible, this sense-world. To desire must be to possess. Mankind will, with few exceptions, scorn reason, so long as it arrays itself against human instinct. And until science and art giv man (or assure him that they can giv him) the perfect and sufficiently lasting happiness which he instinctivly knows that the power which created him owes him and stands pledged to giv him or turn out to be an almighty failure, he will pursue that happiness even beyond the grave; with priestcraft for his guide, of course.—Calvin Blanchard.

COMMON sense joins with universal experience to proclaim that unbelief in the finality of old customs or established opinions is essential to all advance. When asked, What hav unbelievers done for the world? we may fitly answer, They hav shown that all improvement arises from unbelief in revelation upon any topic. Where revelation begins, inquiry ends. A man who believed that God had revealed the true system of road-making, or ship-building, or science, or religion, would never dare to think of improving either. But the skeptic would not be deterred from advance. The theory that the Bible or the church hav final knowledge upon any subject has been the greatest drawback to progress. The forward march of the world follows the vanguard of unbelief.—Robert C. Adams, in Pioneer Pith.

THE heretics hav not thought and suffered and died in vain. Every heretic has been, and is, a ray of light.—Ingersoll.

A KING is a non-producing thief, sitting on a throne, surrounded by vermin.—Ingersoll.

WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE WITH SAM JONES.

Notes and Clippings.

It is probable that the trustees of the British Museum will throw it open on Sundays during the current year.

A large majority of our state assemblymen hav voted in favor of the bill authorizing the common council of this city to expend $300,000 in providing suitable quarters for a zoological museum in Central park. There are reports that Governor Hill disapproves of this appropriation of public money and will veto the bill.

Mr. Anthony Comstock, says the Philadelphia Record, appears to hav carried terror into the peaceful town of Summit, N. J., by insisting on the enforcement of obsolete Blue laws which prevent Sunday comfort. The good people of Summit are afraid to ride abroad, or buy a newspaper or a cigar, or get shaved, on Sunday. The Record suggests to the Summit yeomen that they look into the Blue laws for themselvs, and see what statutory use there may be for horse ponds. They will no doubt find such connection between Comstockery and horse ponds as may prove very suggestiv and refreshing.

The great body of the clergymen of the United States receive salaries of $1,000 or less a year. There are many, of course, in the larger cities who are paid $2,000, $3,000, $4,000, and $5,000, and in Philadelphia there are several who are paid from $6,000 to $10,000, Dr. Harper, for instance. New York and Brooklyn are most generous with their preachers. Dr. John Hall is paid $20,000 by his church; he receives $5,000 more as chancellor of the University of New York, and probably makes from $2,000 to $3,000 more a year from his writings. Dr. Talmage does quite as well; Dr. William M. Taylor's salary is $15,000; Dr. Lyman Abbott's, $10,000, and Drs. C. H. Parkhurst and Morgan Dix's from $2,500 to $5,000 more.

Colonel Shepard, the pious politician, has hitherto preserved a determined silence on the much-mooted subject of his appointment to a foreign diplomatic post. Not all the discussion that has been going on in the press of this city in regard to the matter has induced him to say a word about it. But now that the Norwalk, O., Chronicle expresses the hope that the nation will not be deprived of his services abroad, the colonel feels that he can no longer hide his modest head. He publicly thanks that journal for its solicitude, but tells it firmly that it cannot be. "We will not take any office either at home or abroad," he says. This is another evidence, grimly remarks the World, of the fidelity with which Colonel Shepard indorses the policy and purposes of the president.

A distinguished functionary of the Chinese government, the minister of punishments, has arrived here from Pekin. He has come to the United States for the purpose of examining the American method of dealing with crime and criminals, and the penalties to which violators of the law are subject. In China the punishment of prisoners, who are caged like wild beasts, is cruel in the extreme. They are tortured, flogged, banished, enslaved at hard labor, held in hideous dungeons, and for capital offenses are decapitated or strangled. The minister of punishments will be able to ascertain while here that we hav in this country a far better system than that which has been enforced for ages in China; and, as he is alleged to be a philosopher, he may profit by the knowledge thus acquired.

The new collection of mummies now lying in state in the Metropolitan Museum are as neatly wrapped and tied up as so many bundles of modern merchandise. We are not aware, says the Sun, that scientific curiosity has led to tampering with any of these interesting packages, but some of their esteemed contemporaries recently exhumed in Egypt hav been subjected to a rather searching examination. Among them hav been found blue-eyed and light-haired people who antedated Solomon, swarthy, dark-haired Egyptians, red-bearded Semitic people, the irrepressible negro, and representativs of a brown race of whom nothing is now known. The most interesting fact shown in these investigations is that the Aryan stock, from which we sprung, spread through Asia and appeared in Egypt at a much earlier period than has hitherto been supposed. We are learning about our ancient friends in many curious ways, and when, for instance, experts are discovering what their favorit articles of food were by examining their teeth, we may conclude that the sources of prehistoric information are rapidly multiplying.

Sam Jones writes to the Nashville Christian Advocate concerning his verbal circus in California as follows: "I find the longer I work in California that the great trouble in bringing about a moral reformation in this country is that the thoroughly religious people are in such a minority; nor hav they the strength or weight to stand successfully against the surging tides of evil. There is no Sabbath here. Last Sabbath one of the great attractions at the City park was a competitiv beef-killing, with valuable prizes to those who were most expert in the killing and skinning of the beeves; and to-day the butchers' shops hang the beeves out in the front of the stores placarded 'prize beef.' Baseball is another wonderfully attractiv Sabbath game—in fact, whatever will draw men together, without much regard to the laws of God or man, is adopted. I suppose if you were to multiply the godless element of Nashville a hundred fold, and minify the godly element there a hundred fold, and abolish all Sunday laws, you would hav some conception of a San Francisco Sabbath. I giv you some statistics handed me by the secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association here: On Sunday, Aug. 19, 1888, there were 3,600 saloons wide open; all theaters, concert and billiard halls, and places of amusement had 17,933 young men in them; a baseball match was witnessed by 5,000 young men, and the 3,000 places of unhallowed influence which could not be visited by committees on that day had at least 15,000 young men in them between sixteen and thirty-five years of age; the theaters had over 1,000 young men in each, and one had 1,200. The largest number in any one church was 411; the smallest was 6. Not 50,000 of a population of 350,000 ever enter a church, and those who do not go hav very little sympathy with the church; and to preach the Ten Commandments in San Francisco means that you are a narrow-minded bigot, unworthy the attention of intelligent people."

A Search for Truth.

AN ALLEGORY.

In certain valleys there was a hunter. Day by day he went to hunt for wild-fowl in the woods; and it chanced that once he stood on the shores of a large lake. While he stood waiting in the rushes for the coming of the birds, a great shadow fell on him, and in the water he saw a reflection. He looked up to the sky; but the thing was gone. Then a burning desire came over him to see once again that reflection in the water, and all day long he watched and waited; but night came and it had not returned. Then he went home with his empty bag, moody and silent. His comrades came questioning about him to know the reason, but he answered them nothing—he sat alone and brooded. Then his friend came to him, and to him he spoke.

"I hav seen to day," he said, "that which I never saw before—a vast white bird, with silver wings outstretched, sailing in the everlasting blue. And now it is as though a great fire burnt within my breast. It was but a sheen, a shimmer, a reflection in the water; but now I desire nothing more on earth than to hold her."

His friend laughed.

"It was but a beam playing on the water, or the shadow of your own head. To-morrow you will forget her," he said.

But to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow the hunter walked alone. He sought in the forest and in the woods, by the lakes and among the rushes, but he could not find her. He shot no more wild-fowl; what were they to him?

"What ails him?" said his comrades.

"He is mad," said one.

"No; but he is worse," said another; "he would see that which none of us hav seen, and make himself a wonder."

"Come, let us forswear his company," said all.

So the hunter walked alone.

One night, as he wandered in the shade, very heartsore and weeping, an old man stood before him, grander and taller than the sons of men.

"Who are you?" asked the hunter.

"I am Wisdom," answered the old man; "but some call me Knowledge. All my life I hav grown in these valleys; but no man sees me till he has sorrowed much. The eyes must be washed with tears that are to behold me; and, according as a man has suffered, I speak."

And the hunter cried: "Oh, you who hav lived here so long, tell me, what is that great wild bird I hav seen sailing in the blue? They would hav me believe she is a dream—the shadow of my own head."

The old man smiled.

"Her name is Truth. He who has once seen her never rests again. Till death he desires her."

And the hunter cried: "Oh, tell me where I may find her."

But the man said: "You hav not suffered enough," and went his way.

Then the hunter took from his breast the shuttle of Imagination, and wound on it the thread of his Wishes; and all night long he sat and wove a net.

In the morning he spread the golden net open on the ground, and into it he threw a few grains of Credulity, which his father had left him, and which he kept in his breast-pocket. They were like white puff-balls, and when you trod on them a brown dust flew out. Then he sat by to see what would happen.

The first that came into the net was a snow-white bird, with dove's eyes, and he sung a beautiful song. "A human-God! a human-God! a human-God!" it sung.

The second that came was black and mystical, with dark, lovely eyes, that looked into the depths of your soul, and he sung only this: "Immortality! Immortality!"

And the hunter took them both in his arms, for he said: "They are surely of the beautiful family of Truth."

Then came another, green and gold, who sung in a shrill voice, like one crying in the market-place: "Reward after death! Reward after death!"

And he said: "You are not so fair; but you are fair, too," and he took it.

And others came, brightly colored, singing pleasant songs, till all the grains were finished. And the hunter gathered all his birds together, and built a strong iron cage called, "A New Creed!" and he put all his birds in it.

Then the people came dancing about and singing.

"O happy hunter!" they cried. "O wonderful man! O delightful birds! O lovely songs!"

No one asked where the birds had come from, nor how they had been caught; but they danced and sung before them. And the hunter, too, was glad, for he said: "Surely, Truth is among them. In time she will moult her feathers, and I shall see her snow-white form."

But the time passed, and the people danced and sung; but the hunter's heart grew heavy. He crept alone, as of old, to weep. The terrible desire had awakened again in his breast. One day, as he sat alone weeping, it chanced that Wisdom met him. He told the old man what he had done.

And Wisdom smiled sadly.

"Many men," he said, "hav spread that net for Truth; but they hav never found her. On the grains of Credulity she will not feed; in the net of Wishes her feet cannot be held; in the air of these valleys she will not breathe. The birds you hav caught are of the brood of Lies. Lovely and beautiful, but still lies. Truth knows them not."

And the hunter cried out, in bitterness: "And must I then sit still, to be devoured of this great burning?"

And the old man said: "Listen, and in that you hav suffered much and wept much, I will tell you what I know. He who sets out to search for Truth must leave these valleys of Superstition forever, taking with him not one shred that has belonged to them. Alone he must wander down into the Land of Absolute Negation and Denial. He must abide there. He must resist temptation. When the light breaks he must arise and follow it into the country of dry sunshine. The mountains of stern Reality will rise before him. He must climb them. Beyond them lies Truth."

"And he will hold her fast! he will hold her in his hands!" the hunter cried.

Wisdom shook his head.

"He will never see her, never hold her. The time is not yet."

"Then there is no hope?" cried the hunter.

"There is this," said Wisdom. "Some men hav climbed on those mountains. Circle above circle of bare rock they hav scaled; and, wandering there in those high regions, some hav chanced to pick up on the ground one white, silver feather dropped from the wing of Truth. And it shall come to pass," said the old man, raising himself and pointing prophetically with his finger to the sky, "it shall come to pass, when enough of those silver feathers shall hav been gathered by the hands of men, and shall hav been woven into a cord, and the cord into a net, that in that net Truth may be captured. Nothing but Truth can hold Truth."

The hunter arose. "I will go," he said.

But Wisdom detained him.

"Mark you well—who leaves these valleys never returns to them. Though he should weep tears of blood seven days and nights upon the confines, he can never put his foot across them. Left—they are left forever. Upon the road which you would travel there is no reward offered. Who goes, goes freely—for the great love that is in him. The work is his reward."

"I will go," said the hunter; "but upon the mountains, tell me, which path shall I take?"

"I am the child of The-Accumulated-Knowledge-of-Ages," said the man, "I can walk only where many men hav trodden. On those mountains few feet hav passed. Each man strikes out a path for himself. He goes at his own peril; my voice he hears no more. I may follow after him, but I cannot go before him."

Then Knowledge vanished.

And the hunter turned. He went to his cage and with his hands broke down the bars, and the jagged iron tore his flesh. It is sometimes easier to build than to break.

One by one he took his plumed birds and set them free. But when he came to his dark-plumed bird he held it and looked into its beautiful eyes, and the bird uttered its low, deep cry, "Immortality!"

And he said, quickly: "I cannot part with it. It is not heavy; it eats no food. I will hide it in my breast; I will take it with me." And he pressed it there, and covered it over with his cloak.

But the thing he had hidden grew heavier, heavier, heavier, till it lay on his breast like lead. He could not move with it. He could not leave those valleys with it. Then again he took it out and looked at it.

"O my beautiful, my heart's own!" he cried, "may I not keep you?"

He opened his hands sadly.

"Go," he said. "It may happen that in Truth's song one note is like to yours, but I shall never hear it."

Sadly he opened his hand, and the bird flew from him forever.

Then from the shuttle of Imagination he took the thread of his Wishes, and threw it on the ground; and the empty shuttle he put into his breast, for the thread was made in those valleys, but the shuttle came from an unknown country. He turned to go, but now the people came about him, howling.

"Fool, hound, demented lunatic!" they cried. "How dared you break your cage and let the birds fly?"

The hunter spoke, but they would not hear him.

"Truth! who is she? Can you eat her? can you drink her? Who has ever seen her? Your birds were real—all could hear them sing. O fool! vile reptil! Atheist!" they cried, "you pollute the air."

"Come, let us take up stones and stone him," cried some.

"What affair is it of ours?" said others. "Let the idiot go," and went away. But the rest gathered up stones and mud and threw at him.

At last, when he was bruised and cut, the hunter crept away into the woods. And it was evening about him.

He wandered on and on, and the shade grew deeper. He was on the borders now of the land where it is always night. Then he stepped into it, and there was no light there. With his hands he groped; but each branch as he touched it broke off, and the earth was covered with cinders. At every step his foot sunk in, and a fine cloud of impalpable ashes flew up into his face, and it was dark. So he sat down upon a stone and buried his face in his hands, to wait in that Land of Negation and Denial till the light came.

And it was night in his heart also.

Then from the marshes to his right and left cold mists arose and closed about him. A fine, imperceptible rain fell in the dark, and great drops gathered on his hair and clothes. His heart beat slowly, and a numbness crept through all his limbs. Then, looking up, two merry whisp lights came dancing. He lifted his head to look at them. Nearer, nearer they came. So warm, so bright, they danced like stars of fire. They stood before him at last. From the center of the radiating flame in one looked out a woman's face, laughing, dimpled, with streaming yellow hair. In the center of the other were merry, laughing ripples, like the bubbles on a glass of wine. They danced before him.

"Who are you?" asked the hunter, "who alone come to me in my solitude and darkness?"

"We are the twins Sensuality," they cried. "Our father's name is Human Nature, and our mother's name is Excess. We are as old as the hills and rivers, as old as the first man; but we never die," they laughed.

"Oh, let me wrap my arms about you!" cried the first; "they are soft and warm. Your heart is frozen now, but I will make it beat. Oh, come to me!"

"I will pour my hot life into you," said the second; "your brain is numb, and your limbs are dead now; but they shall liv with a fierce, free life. Oh, let me pour it in!"

"Oh, follow us," they cried, "and liv with us. Nobler hearts than yours hav sat here in this darkness to wait, and they hav come to us and we to them; and they never left us, never. All else is a delusion, but we are real, we are real. Truth is a shadow; the valleys of Superstition are a farce; the earth is of ashes, the trees all rotten; but we—feel us—we liv! You cannot doubt us. Feel us, how warm we are! Oh, come to us! Come with us!"

Nearer and nearer round his head they hovered, and the cold drops melted on his forehead. The bright light shot into his eyes, dazzling him, and the frozen blood began to run. And he said: "Yes; why should I die here in this awful darkness? They are warm, they melt my frozen blood!" And he stretched out his hands to take them.

Then in a moment there arose before him the image of the thing he had loved, and his hands dropped to his side.

"Oh, come to us!" they cried.

But he buried his face.

"You dazzle my eyes," he cried, "you make my heart warm, but you cannot giv me what I desire. I will wait here—wait till I die. Go!"

He covered his face with his hands and would not listen, and when he looked up again they were two twinkling stars that vanished in the distance.

And the long, long night rolled on.

All who leave the valley of Superstition pass through that dark land; but some go through it in a few days, some linger there for months, some for years, and some die there.

At last for the hunter a faint light played along the horizon, and he rose to follow it; and he reached that light at last, and stepped into the broad sunshine. Then before him arose the almighty mountains of Dry Facts and Realities. The clear sunshine played on them, and the tops were lost in the clouds. At the foot many paths ran up. An exultant cry burst from the hunter. He chose the straightest path and began to climb, and the rocks and ridges resounded with his song. They had exaggerated: after all, it was not so very high, nor was the road so steep! A few days, a few weeks, a few months at most, and then the top! Not one feather only would he pick up; he would gather all that other men had found—weave the net—capture Truth—hold her fast—touch her with his hands—clasp her!

He laughed in the merry sunshine, and sung loud. Victory was very near. Nevertheless, after a while the path grew steeper. He needed all his breath for climbing, and the singing died away. On the right and left rose huge rocks, devoid of lichen or moss, and in the larva-like earth chasms yawned. Here and there he saw a sheen of white bones. Now, too, the path began to grow less and less marked; then it became a mere trace, with a foot-mark here and there; then it ceased altogether. He sung no more, but struck forth a path for himself until he reached a mighty wall of rock, smooth and without break, stretching as far as the eye could see.

"I will rear a stair against it; and, once this wall climbed, I shall be almost there," he said bravely; and worked.

With his shuttle of Imagination he dug out stones; but half of them would not fit, and half a month's work would roll down because those below were ill chosen. But the hunter worked on, saying always to himself: "Once this wall climbed, I shall be almost there, and this great work be ended."

At last he came out upon the top, and looked about him. Far below rolled the white mist over the valleys of Superstition, and above him towered the mountains. They had seemed low before, they were of an immeasurable hight now; from crown to foundation surrounded by walls of rock, that rose tier above tier in mighty circles. Upon them played the eternal sunshine. He uttered a wild cry. He bowed himself down to the earth, and when he rose his face was white. In absolute silence he walked on. He was very silent now. In those high regions the rarefied air is hard to breathe by those born in the valleys; every breath he drew hurt him, and the blood oozed out from the tips of his fingers. Before the next wall of rock he began to work. The hight of this seemed infinit, and he said nothing. The sound of his tool rang night and day upon the iron-rocks into which he cut steps. Years passed over him, yet he worked on; but the wall towered up always above him to heaven. Sometimes he prayed that a little moss or lichen might spring up on those bare walls to be a companion to him; but it never came.

And the years rolled on; he counted them by the steps he had cut—a few for a year—only a few. He sung no more; he said no more, "I will do this or that"—he only worked. And at night when the twilight settled down, there looked out at him from the holes and crevices in the rocks many strange, wild faces.

"Stop your work, you lonely man, and speak to us," they cried.

"My salvation is in work. If I should stop but for one moment you would creep down upon me," he replied.

And they put out their long necks further.

"Look down into the crevice at your feet," they said. "See what lie there—white bones! As brave and strong a man as you climbed to these rocks. He looked up; he saw there was no use in striving; he would never hold Truth, never see her, never find her. So he lay down here, for he was very tired. He went to sleep forever. He put himself to sleep. Sleep is very tranquil. You are not lonely when you are asleep, neither do your hands ache, nor your heart."

And the hunter laughed between his teeth.

"Hav I torn from my heart all that was dearest; hav I wandered alone in the land of Night; hav I resisted temptation; hav I dwelt where the voice of my kind is never heard, and labored alone, to lie down and be food for you, ye harpies?"

He laughed fiercely; and the Echoes of Despair slunk away, for the laugh of a brave, strong heart is as a death-blow to them.

Nevertheless, they crept out again and looked at him.

"Do you know that your hair is white?" they said, "that your hands begin to tremble like a child's? Do you see that the point of your shuttle is gone?—it is cracked already. If you should ever climb this stair," they said, "it will be your last. You will never climb another."

And he answered: "I know it!" and worked on.

The old, thin hands cut the stones ill and jaggedly, for the fingers were stiff and bent. The beauty and the strength of the man were gone.

At last, an old, wizened, shrunken face looked out above the rocks. It saw the eternal mountains rise with walls to the white clouds; but its work was done.

The old hunter folded his tired hands and lay down by the precipice where he had worked away his life. It was the sleeping time at last. Below him over the valleys rolled the thick white mist. Once it broke; and through the gap the dying eyes looked down on the trees and fields of their childhood. From afar seemed borne to him the cry of his own wild birds, and he heard the noise of people singing as they danced. And he thought he heard among them the voices of his old comrades; and he saw afar off the sunlight shine on his early home. And great tears gathered in the hunter's eyes.

"Ah! they who die there do not die alone," he cried.

Then the mists rolled together again; and he turned his eyes away.

"I hav sought Truth," he said; "for many long years I hav labored; but I hav not found her. I hav not rested, I hav not repined, and I hav not seen her. Now my strength is gone. Where I lie down worn out, other men will stand, young and fresh. By the steps that I hav cut they will climb; by the stairs that I hav built they will mount. They will never know the name of the man who made them. At the clumsy work they will laugh—when the stones roll down they will blame me. But they will mount, and on my work; they will climb, and by my stair! They will find Truth, and through me! And no man liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself."

The tears rolled from beneath the shriveled eyelids. If Truth had appeared above him in the clouds now, he could not hav seen her; the mist of death was in his eyes.

"My soul hears their glad step coming in," he said; "and they shall mount! they shall mount!" He raised his shriveled hand to his eyes.

Then slowly from the bright sky above, through the still air, came something falling, falling, falling. Softly it fluttered down, and dropped on the breast of the dying man. He felt it with his hands. It was a feather. He died holding it.

OLIVE SCHREINER.

Christianity.

When an honest man believes he has discovered truth he invites inquiry. Not so with the Christian church, she shuts her doors against investigation and debate. If the position of religionists is tenable, their arguments based on truth, they should hav no fear of investigation. Not satisfied with forbidding inquiry and frowning down honest doubt, they invoke the aid of the law to enforce their religious opinions and dogmas upon those who cannot agree with them. If God reigns, surely he needs no assistance for his religion from the laws of men. If their arguments are unreasonable, they are not right; if not right, they are wrong, and if wrong they should be abandoned. The religion that cannot be sustained by reasonable argument should be dropped out of the world.

The church asserts that she is the mainstay of morality in the world, but the experience of the whole world proves that man can be made moral neither by religions nor by the enactment of penal laws. If this were not true, vice and immorality would hav ceased long, long ago, and there would be no longer any necessity for either law or religion.

The New Testament teaches us that in order to secure our salvation we must overcome human nature. That the carnal man is enmity to God. Had the writers of this book been skilled in the science of phrenology, such teaching would hav been omitted. Every faculty of man is for his good, and is necessary for his protection, his happiness, and his continuance. What man needs is direction, not restraint; education, not punishment.

In the Old Testament man is taught to labor for his living. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground." This is laid down as a punishment for his sins. But we know that labor (except the excessiv and unrequited toil, the result of the unwise laws of man) is not a punishment, but a pleasure. Labor elevates the world. Idleness and inactivity would ruin the race. In the New Testament we are taught a very different precept. Christ taught men not to labor but to pray for their living. "Giv us this day our daily bread." "Lay not up for yourselvs treasure upon earth." "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap nor gather into barns, for your heavenly father feedeth them; are ye not much better than they?" "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow, they toil not neither do they spin. . . . Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." "Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you?" "Therefore, take no thought saying, What shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed?" "Take therefore no thought for the morrow." Put this teaching into practice and what would be the condition of society? How long would the human race exist? Christians professing to believe in this book enact laws for the suppression of tramps. But the tramp may turn to this very book for his defense, his encouragement, and his justification. And men, reasonable in other things, accept these contradictory, unreasonable, impracticable teachings as the word of God. If it is the word of God, then so much the worse for God, for it is no credit to God or to man.

Thomas Paine and other great and good men hav shown by unanswerable arguments that there is no evidence of the divine origin of the Bible. Where are the two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God, and given to Moses upon Mount Sinai? What if they were broken, as it is written, where are the fragments? In proving accounts between men, the law compels the production of the original books of entry. Christians think we must be content to accept such evidence as they happen to hav. The manuscript of God! Why, it should hav been protected and preserved as the most sacred thing in all the wide, wide world. The reason the evidence is not on exhibition to-day is because the story is a fabrication.

Where are the dividing lines between right and wrong, good and bad, truth and falsehood? Who can tell? What is the criterion? When Pilate said unto Christ, What is truth? he got no answer, and yet it is written in the book, "God shall send a strong delusion that they all might be damned who believed not the truth." The criterion is not Bible, not faith, not religions. It is reason. The civil and criminal law of the land, laying down the rules of human conduct, uncertain and conflicting as they are, are evidences of man's best efforts to find this criterion, and the basis of these laws is reason. Let reason reign. If man is to be judged by his acts, he ought to exercise the right of private judgment. Religions, as well as laws, change, as men's customs and opinions change. To deny endless punishment in a literal hell half a century ago, was to arouse the fiercest antagonism of the church. Preach it to-day to an intelligent audience and you will only excite a smile of derision. In the revisions of the Bible we see not only the Christians' lack of faith, but their desperate efforts to keep that old book dragged up somewhere within sight of the advance of human development. If it was the infallible word of God before the revision, what was it after the alteration? Christians solemnly and confidently proclaim the existence of a personal God, yet many of them deny the existence of a personal devil. But there is as much proof of the existence of one as of the other. To deny the existence of the devil is as much a denial of the Bible as to deny the existence of God; and as there is no proof of God outside of the Bible, what advantage can the Christian, who denies the devil, maintain over the Atheist?

We ought not to judge others by their beliefs, because we do not know how they hav been brought about. We know that we cannot change our opinions at will; and that our minds are as different as our faces. Had these same Christians, who would compel by rigorous laws all others to conform to their opinions, been brought up under different religious influences, they would hav had different religious opinions. Good character is formed, not by the observance of religious dogmas, tenets, and ceremonials, but by developing that moral principle that exists in every heart. It is a thing of slow growth, formed by habits, and cannot be developed in the last few hours of life.

The Christian religion teaches that, though a man may lead a long life of wickedness, offer the deadliest injuries and insults to others, he may, without atoning for these injuries, set his own time for repentance and salvation. Can this be conduciv to morality? The doctrin of Christ's atonement for the sins of mankind has, for centuries, been a fruitful source of vice and immorality. As we sow so shall we reap; this is the rule. The only way to secure our happiness in this life, as well as in the future, is by right doing—practicing justice. Religions are antagonistic to intellectual liberty, to freedom of thought, and the battle between religion and Rationalism will end only in the extermination of one or the other. In this country the line of division seems to be forming between Roman Catholicism and Secularism. The strength of Catholicism lies in its unity; the weakness of Protestantism in its division. The middle ground will soon be swept away, and Protestants be compelled to stand within the lines of intellectual freedom, or to fall into the arms of the pope of Rome.

LEMUEL J. POTTS.

A Theological Absurdity.

Without devoting time to a useless discussion regarding the constituent beliefs of Christianity, or to a disputing of any of the doctrins and practices that hav characterized it at various periods, or are peculiar to the different denominations of the present day, let us examin that fundamental tenet, held in common by the most antagonistic sects, and which, though its attendant religious forms hav been ever changing consequently upon the evolution of civilization, has remained the constant principle of Christianity.

Simply stated, it is a belief in an almighty God, and the sacrifice of his son for the redemption of sinners. It is upon this that Christianity, with all its sectarian superstructure, is based; and this foundation being logically false, the truth of the religion cannot withstand the force of reason.

Paradoxically, Christianity refutes itself; for does it not rest upon a contradiction? Aside from the ridiculous incongruity of the almighty's humiliating himself before his own creatures in an attempt to palliate the evil for which he alone must hav been responsible, there could hav been no necessity for a savior of the world, without admitting the subordination of the absolute, supreme being, in his having had to submit, in the first place, to the creation and existence of sin, contrary to his will; an absurdity too patent for a moment's consideration.

We might as well endeavor to conceive of the existence of darkness and light in the same place at the same time, when we know that the presence of the one is dependent upon the absence of the other. Consequently, a belief in an almighty being must preclude a belief in Christ; and, e convêrso, a belief in Christ is incompatible with a belief in an omnipotent God, Christ being the exemplification of the finiteness of his "father."

However, Christianity professes the absurdity of reconciling these contradictions, or, in other words, of upholding a theology in which the deity is divided against himself; wherefore, in subservience to the logical reasoning, which we are told this God himself expounded, how can he exist? And "if a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand."

Washington's Inaugural.

The approaching centennial of the inauguration of the first president of the United States is to be conducted, according to the proclamation of a Presbyterian president—who perverts his high office to insult the historical intelligence of the people and slur the memory of those famous Freethinkers who were most prominent in founding a state without a church—by religious observance. Secularists should take this occasion to make an emphatic protest against this part of the program, and show that Washington, as president of the constitutional convention, took special pains not to let Christianity engraft itself in law—that he was so much of a statesman as to be a thorough Secularist.

The Union League Club, of Chicago, hav issued a circular calling upon the people to celebrate this occasion by public worship, and the document might easily be mistaken for a missionary leaflet of the Young Men's Christian Association, so sanctified is its piety. It is signed by its president and treasurer. The latter is known to hold opinions derogatory to Christianity, but, like so many hypocritical Liberals, lacks the manhood to assert himself. A millionaire can seldom afford to be a man.

The reverend advocates of "truth and righteousness" in Chicago are industriously distorting the facts of history and filling the air with falsehood, cant, and misrepresentation in their endeavor to giv Christianity a "boom" by this celebration. They seek by this commemoration of the inauguration of a constitutional government recognizing religious freedom to gain momentum to overthrow the Constitution itself and accomplish by the Blair bill and other treacherous and suppressiv measures what they cannot accomplish by moral suasion or logic. This is surely evidence that faith is dying, for the moral force of a religion must hav reached a low ebb when it seeks the support and maintenance of law. Law is the last prop of a tottering creed, though the prop may effectually retain the form when its vitality has fled.

At a recent meeting of ministers in this city one clergyman is reported to hav remarked that the only reliance this republic now has for its progress and perpetuity rests in the adoption of the Christian religion. Such a person is a traitor to American principles and an insulter of Washington's memory.

Another reverend claimed that the founders of the American republic were not only great patriots but also good Christians. Such a man is a hypocritical fraud.

It is now as ever in history, the religious teachers endeavor to gain the ascendency in government, as they hav over the minds of the people. The Persian idols, the German oracles, the Roman augurs, and the modern priesthood hav all in their turn become subjects of popular adulation and the agents of political deception for the avowed purpose of abrogating the rights of conscience.

To protest against this perversion of facts and to uphold and maintain the Secular foundation of our national Constitution the Chicago Secular Union will hold a memorial service, Tuesday, April 30th, at which the president will deliver an address on "The Secular and Freethinking Founders of the American Republic."

BRUNO MONUMENT FUND.

N. F. Griswold, Meriden, Conn	$100 00
N. Eggleston, Aurora, O	100 00
Drs. E. B. Foote, N. Y	20 00
R. B. and H. P. Westbrook, Philadelphia	10 00
E. A. Stevens, Chicago	10 00
Otto Wettstein, Rochelle, Ill	6 00
F. A. Day, Castana, Ia	5 00
Mrs. S. L. Dingess, Chicago	1 00
Converse Close, Grattan, Mich	1 00
F. P. Spencer, Evansville, Wis	1 00
Unknown, Chicago	1 00
Total	$255 00

Our appeal in behalf of the Bruno fund, published only in THE TRUTH SEEKER, has not been in vain—in fact, it has borne rich fruit, proving the nobility and liberality of its readers; for never hav they been importuned for a worthy purpose and the petition been unheeded. But the greatest regret we feel is that the bulk of its subscribers allow the practical work and effort of Liberalism to fall on the shoulders of that grand old guard—"the thin red line" who stand immovable in the ranks of the Secular Union—its honored life members.

With gratitude indescribable I received the following as the first response, from as true a patriot as our cause can boast:

MERIDEN, CONN., March 31.

E. A. STEVENS, Chicago, Ill., Dear Secretary: Since the time is not quite ripe to lance the orthodox Christian carbuncle growing on Girard College, I herewith hand you my check for $100, which I propose to giv for the purpose of helping make up the $1,000 for the Bruno Monument fund. Let us honor the martyr who gave his life to remove the sixteenth-century inspired flat-earth holy-Bible myth from the brain of man. Yours truly, N. F. GRISWOLD.

Hardly had I recovered from the startling effect which Friend Griswold's letter gave—for I could not help ruminating how a little while ago a hundred dollar donation would hav created quite a sensation—when another life member and generous helper, whose letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER are like visits of an old and valued friend, sent the following, which is as admirable as his generosity, partaking as it does of the hero he would honor:

AURORA, O., March 31, 1889.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary, Dear Sir: Find inclosed a draft for $100, to aid in uplifting the Bruno monument.

The memory of Bruno makes safe the sleep of Darwin in Westminster abbey. Indeed, it helps us all to rest. It will be a standing caution to humanity against Christianity.

It may save us from the Blair bill, which is now inviting our cabinet and Congress to do for America what Constantine and his councils did for Europe—inaugurate and repeat another Christian millennium of more than a thousand years of Dark Ages. To reverse such religion, and restore life, liberty, and civilization again to the Western world, the eloquent and loving Bruno suffered seven years in dungeons and finally death at the stake.

Up with the glorious shaft by the side of St. Peter, on the spot where he was burnt. Let us hav no more such Christian stakes or church recreations. Truth is enough to furnish one good and complete religion. To that I belong.

Yours in its faith, N. EGGLESTON.

Two hundred dollars! Now verily "is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer by" these two noble sons of Secularism! Who shall say that Liberals lack the fervor we denominate soul? Who shall dare accuse them of indifference and lukewarmness when their sympathies are aroused in a worthy cause? Still, we must admit that even two swallows do not make a summer last. And while the noble donations of Brothers Griswold and Eggleston are commendable in the highest degree and deserving of our gratitude and an imperishable chaplet—for in honoring Bruno they honor themselvs, the American Secular Union, and humanity—after all, it is but a little cloud on the Secular horizon, and we need to see such liberality expand, increase, and develop till it covers the face of the firmament and bursts forth in torrents of generosity and munificence from which drenched superstition shall slink away appalled. We must drown out ecclesiasticism in the state, and the erection of the Bruno monument in papal Rome should only inspire our efforts in establishing the dominion of science and justice, instead of being dominated by the crafty cohorts of superstition, remembering that

> Not a truth unto science
> Or art hath been given,
> But brows hav ached for it,
> And souls toiled and striven.

Although these aching brows hav ceased their throbbing and found rest in "the sleep that knows no waking," and these dauntless souls whose lives were spent in unselfish devotion to imperishable truth hav gone down to their graves

> Unwept, unhonored, and unsung,

the Liberals—their particular posterity—who realize the fruits of their labors, are rescuing their glorious names from obscurity, and placing on their brows

> The chaplet of bay
> And laurel crown.

A portion of the mission of Secularism should be to atone for the criminal negligence of its contemporaries; to erect a monument—not necessarily in marble or bronze—to every martyr in the cause of science, to vindicate the memory of all who in every age of the world's history hav remained loyal to their convictions in the midst of opposition, persecution, danger, and death. Secularism means much more than superficial thinkers dream of, and while we realize our numerical insignificance and the seemingly insurmountable obstacles which lie in our onward path, we find our consolation in the thought that "the race is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong." The Bruno monument marks the first milestone in our race-course. En evant, who knows but in the march of progress Rome may become the Mecca of Secularists, as it has been, not the Eternal, but the Infernal City of priestcraft? Thanks, Brothers Griswold and Eggleston.

There is no good work going on in which the Drs. E. B. Foote do not become participants, and although they are solicited daily, if not hourly, for some bequest, a worthy cause finds in them generous friends. The junior editor of the Health Monthly is a great wit if the adage that brevity is wit's soul holds good, as the chairman of the executiv committee uses the fewest possible words, and the smallest number of letters to express those words. His communication inclosing a check for $20 if spelled out would occupy about a line. May his shadow never be abbreviated. From the senior, a few days after, I received the following both gratifying and encouraging letter:

OFFICE OF HEALTH MONTHLY,
NEW YORK CITY, April 2, 1889.

MY DEAR MR. STEVENS: On Saturday, when very busy, the junior came to me, remarking that he was going to write you, and he wanted to send a contribution for the Bruno monument and desired to hav me join him in doing so; so we each sent $10. Yesterday I picked up THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 30th ult., and after reading your eloquent appeal for contributions, I thought I saw at once what had awakened Dr. Ned. I think it is only just to express my appreciation of that article. It contains facts in regard to Bruno which I did not know myself, although I hav read considerably about him. It is really a very interesting sketch of Bruno's life boiled down into the fewest possible words, and those words most effectiv. I am quite sure that Ned and I hav contributed before to that monument, but feel very glad that he gave me the opportunity to join with him in making a further contribution. The same issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER contains an excellent article from our friend, Mr. Wakeman, on the same subject. Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE.

Our honored president and, I presume, his amiable spouse, who hav also previously contributed to the Monument fund, forward $10 to swell the new American Secular Union subscription, as evidence of their hope that in Italy the pope shall no longer hold supreme sway, their desire that freedom of the mind and liberty through law may be the heritage of the future sons of that sunny clime, and that soon they shall sever the last ecclesiastical fetters and break the bonds of priestly tyranny. Hail to the chief!

Otto Wettstein feels that this monument somehow makes his badge-pin legend more appropriate, and his torch of reason blaze more luminous, so he also contributes to the fund.

F. A. Day, of Castana, Ia., forwarded $5 for the monument, and a like amount to the Union fund. A man of few words, but generous deeds. May the light of Day never be dimmed.

Mrs. R. L. Dingess, of Chicago, desires to contribute a dollar to so noble a project. A lady now thoroughly Liberal, she has evolved out of orthodoxy by the careful study of the facts which Bruno proclaimed.

Converse Close, an invalid of seventeen years, rises to express his sympathy with this move, and sends his contribution. When invalids are roused to enthusiasm, we hav hopes the healthy will be profoundly stirred.

GRATTAN, MICH., April 4, 1889.

E. A. STEVENS, Secretary of the American Secular Union, Dear Sir: I hav just read your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 30th, "Giordano Bruno." It is a grand appeal for what all Secularists should deem a worthy object.

I look upon this as an exception. It is cosmopolitan, for Bruno, in the hearts of all true Liberals, should stand as the representativ martyr of religious freedom in all ages, and throughout the world. And Rome, above all others, is the place where such a monument should be erected as a world-wide landmark, to warn Christian bigots that such acts will not be tolerated, and must not be repeated.

And now, Mr. Stevens, please allow a few words personal to you and myself.

When you were first elected secretary, I must admit that you were not my choice. I had some doubts as to your sentiments and the course you would pursue, especially in regard to the question of "Anarchy," which at that time was a prominent topic of discussion among our people generally, and, as it seemed to me, threatened the harmony and unity of Freethinkers generally, and of the Secular Union especially. But now I am pleased to say that your course has been to me very satisfactory and a happy disappointment, and the zeal, energy, and ability you hav manifested under discouraging circumstances hav been remarkable.

As for myself, I cannot do much. An invalid for seventeen years, shut in from the outside world of business and social life, never possessed of much wealth, this dollar is my mite. CONVERSE CLOSE.

P. F. Spencer, a venerable friend of eighty-two, a contributor to the Bennett monument, certainly was pleased to be placed in the above list. His inspiration for twelve years has been THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it will be to the last. He promises that whatever he can spare shall go to the cause. Thanks, Brother Spencer.

A person paid $1 to our local Union secretary, whose name was mislaid, so I cannot thank him properly, but the money "will get there all the same."

GOOD FRIDAY.

Notwithstanding that there are several Freethinkers on the board of education, the public schools are closed to-day, as has been the custom for some time, out of deference to the holy Roman church—a church which is plotting in every way to destroy the public school system itself. The Episcopalians are so small a minority in the community that it cannot be considered their wishes would hav any effect. When the supposed day of Christ's crucifixion is officially observed by closing the public schools, it can be seen that we are rapidly approaching a state religion.

IN THE APPELLATE COURT.

The case of the secretary of the American Secular Union against the St. Mary's Training School is nearing its conclusion. The "abstract" and "brief" which were prepared by Judge Russell, fully outlining the proceedings, were printed and filed in the above court on the first day of April. The brief was replied to, strange as it may seem, not by the county attorney, who appeared and argued before Judge Horton on the injunction, but by Smith and Pence, attorneys for the Training School. What a twist this case has taken! A question involving the county finances and the official action of the county board is answered by the attorneys for Archbishop Feehan. General Smith is a Protestant apostate to the Romish church and enjoys the lucrativ practice of legal adviser to the archbishop. The reply of Smith & Pence was nothing but subterfuge, yet it was as much as could be expected on that side. In the brief replying to their allegations Judge Russel has knocked the pins from under every point they raised, and in a clear-cut speech of one hour before the court on Monday last submitted the question to the decision of the judges. The senior member of the court, Judge Moran, is a faithful son of the church of Rome, and he showed what he would do regardless of the law or the Constitution. Judge Russell tried to pacify him with the remark that this was not aimed at the Catholic Church specially but pronounced on the broad principle of the Constitution, and that this decision would affect other denominations, which would receive attention in due time.

Judge Moran blurted out, "Well, I notice the Catholic church is the one that is always hit." If the case is decided from a legal point of view, we hav already won. But judges are fallible beings, swayed by interest, passion, and prejudice, and one has already so strongly betrayed his animus as to be considered unsafe. Another of the trio is Judge Gary, not counted among my personal friends, as his ruling in the celebrated Anarchist trial was, in my humble judgment, little to his credit.

The appellees made no oral argument.

E. A. Stevens, Sec. A. S. U.

Does Colonel Ingersoll Know?

Colonel Ingersoll is not Agnostic on one point at least. Hear him: "No person has come back from the unseen world. No authentic message has been delivered. Through all the centuries not one whisper has broken the silence that lies beyond the grave. Countless millions hav sought for evidence, hav listened in vain for some word."

What an assertion for a man to make in this age, when in every city, town, and hamlet of the civilized world are to be found those that will testify to the contrary—that they hav communicated and do communicate with those that hav passed the borderland, and that they can furnish the most undeniable evidence of this fact, evidence such as would make a case in any court of justice were it upon any other subject!

Had Mr. Ingersoll said, "I hav received no evidence; no person has come back to me," he would hav been justified in the statement. For we are bound, in common justice, to take a man's word, unless there is evidence of its falsity. But when he assumes to contradict the statements of men and women of unquestioned integrity, of sound critical judgment on all other matters, of patient, earnest investigation, who, while they were trying to disprove it, were compelled to admit that the so-called dead are alive, and, under favorable circumstances, do giv authentic messages—that not only one, but myriads of whispers hav broken the silence, and countless millions seeking hav found evidence and heard words from beyond the grave—this unqualified denial of claimed facts shows a spirit of arrogant assumption much in keeping with the spirit of orthodoxy which he is so valiantly fighting.

All knowledge comes through the senses. In a court of justice, if reliable witnesses swear to what they hav seen or heard or felt, a multitude, testifying that they did never see, hear, or feel the same, would not in the least invalidate their testimony. If Mr. Ingersoll has never had the evidence others hav, or claim to hav had, he would at least show more good sense in saying, as he does of God, "I don't know," for he certainly cannot know that no one has received an authentic message.

Much that we call knowledge comes from our belief in the knowledge others claim to hav acquired. A wise person requires good, substantial evidence before he can accept any disputed theory or fact. If such an array of evidence is adduced, he can but believe. If sufficient evidence cannot be furnished upon which to base his belief, he is simply Agnostic—does not know. To disbelieve or deny any claimed fact or theory should require just as sound evidence against it as would be required in its favor to be believed.

There are, no doubt, among the personal friends of Mr. Ingersoll those that would tell him they had received messages from some departed friend, the identity being proved by precisely the same evidence as would be required to establish the identity of some one in a foreign country, as knowledge of family affairs, certain circumstances known only to the parties communicating in regard to past conditions, etc. Such identifications, unmistakable, hav been received and proved over and over again, and yet every now and then some person, wise in his own conceit, will make the same wholesale denial that is made by the colonel, knowing, as he must, that just as able men as himself claim to hav seen, heard, and felt just what he says no one ever did.

Agnosticism, in these days of great discoveries, is more becoming than arrogant, unqualified denial.

A few years ago, before that wonderful invention, the microscope, the new world of life it disclosed to the inquirers might hav been denied with as much truthfulness; it could not be seen, and only a few at the present time know of the existence of what it reveals. I hope some time humanity will hav developed its seeing power so as to be able to take cognizance of all these beauties without artificial aids. So I hope, also, that the time will come that the spiritual vision, and other faculties, will evolve so that all may take cognizance of spiritual things without any effort on their part.

To-day phenomena are occurring claimed by some, who hav carefully investigated the matter, to be of spirit origin, and to prove a continued individual existence.

No person, thus far, has been able to satisfactorily explain said phenomena on any more rational basis than the one claimed for it. Wholesale denials and assertions like the above are not in keeping with a broad spirit of inquiry that cares only to know the truth, no matter what that truth may be.

A scientific thinker will take any phenomenon that presents itself, carefully examin it, and will not pronounce upon it until he can explain its causes and prove his explanation correct.

A large and growing class of people, embracing many learned and scientific minds, claim to hav had demonstrated to them by unmistakable evidence that the so-called dead still liv and return to their friends. For one to unqualifiedly deny their claim, without being able to satisfactorily explain the phenomena upon which it is based, upon any other hypothesis, shows the person making such denial is afflicted with compound ignorance—i.e., he is ignorant of the subject, and ignorant of his ignorance.

An Open Letter to the Governor of Pennsylvania.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN PROTESTS AGAINST HANGING AN INSANE WOMAN.

To His Excellency, James A. Beaver, Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, Sir: I earnestly and urgently protest against the threatened hanging of Mrs. Sarah J. Whiteling, appointed to take place in your commonwealth, April 24th inst., and call your attention to the following considerations:

Scientific observation and experience hav long recognized a class of cases of derangement known as climacteric insanity. Of this class of cases, Ray, in his "Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity," section 248, says: "Another curious form of homicidal insanity occurs in women, and seems to be connected with those changes in the system produced by menstruation and lactation. It is a little remarkable that, with few exceptions, the victim selected by the patient is always her own or some other young child."

Mr. Ray follows this summing up with the recital of a number of cases of recognized insanity illustrativ of his proposition, no one of which cases exhibits so many of the conditions or indicia of insanity as does the case of Mrs. Whiteling.

Mrs. Whiteling was surrounded with all the conditions required to produce insanity, and the periodical murders she committed indicate strongly not only that she was insane, but the cause of her derangement. When we combine all these causes, her low grade of mentality, syphilitic taint, abject poverty, fatigue, and overwork in nursing through a long illness her husband, whom she afterward killed, the pressure of responsibility for the care of her family, which fell entirely upon her, the change of life and consequent menstrual derangement, and when we see, as a result, three murders of those she was drawn to by the closest ties of affection, with intervals of a month between each murder, with no intelligent motiv for her act, and when we find strongly corroborativ evidence in a marked symptom of insanity disclosed by means of the opthalmoscope, there can be no doubt of her irresponsibility.

I understand that an examination has been made, recently, of Mrs. Whiteling by the prison physicians, and that their report thereon shows that she is now sane. This is little to the purpose. The question is, What was her mental condition at the time of committing the murders? Her present sanity is not inconsistent with violent insanity a year ago. The feelings of the patient in such a case are graphically described by Dr. Oxner thus: "A worthy neighbor told me, during treatment for a 'change of life,' that sometimes when things went wrong with her she felt as if she could tear God from his throne, but this is so long ago she has forgotten it." And he further says: "While thousands go over safely amid comparativly happy surroundings, now and again one dies, oftener they become broken in health, while some under constant domestic bickerings become insane and never recover; others, under like unhappy circumstances, become desperately insane and their mania spends its force in some desperate deed, to their eternal regret."

I am told that in cases where the law has, very improperly as I consider, withheld from the governor the power to pardon or commute, a beneficent purpose is accomplished by the governor's withholding his signature from the death-warrant. It is still within your power to prevent the official murder of this insane woman by granting her a respit until such time as her death may be brought about by the operation of the laws of nature, and having this means of escape from a very unfortunate situation, I sincerely and respectfully implore you that you will not deliberately and in cold blood sanction the very kind of act which she is condemned for having done in her insane frenzy. Very respectfully,

Ed. W. Chamberlain.

What the Bigots Are Doing.

From the Official Organ of the American Sabbath Union.

Rutland, Vt., demands a more general observance of Sunday laws in that city.

The question of prohibiting by law Sunday baseball games is now being discussed in several of the state legislatures.

The decision having been by the court in Kansas City that the Missouri state law prohibits Sunday baseball games, the question is now to be taken to the supreme court.

The citizens of Santa Rosa, Cal., hav resolved that Sunday excursions from San Francisco, that hav occasioned so much annoyance in their midst, shall henceforth be prohibited.

At a mass convention in Richmond, Va., on April 17th, attended by friends of the Sabbath from all parts of the state, the Virginia Sabbath Association, auxiliary to the American Sabbath Union, was organized. W. E. Hatcher, D.D., was elected president, and William H. Preston first vice-president. The field secretary of the Union, the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, was present and aided in the committee work, and also made an address. The states organized up to this time (all except the two first named within two years) are New Jersey, Maryland, Illinois, Dakota, Iowa, Kentucky, Ohio, and Virginia. Other states are expected to organize soon.

The American Sabbath Union recommends that resolutions be adopted by all religious bodies similar to the following, which were voted by the Worcester Congregational Club on April 15th, resolutions of like import having been passed at an earlier hour of the day in the same city by the Methodist New England Conference.

Resolved, That we approve the proposal to organize a Massachusetts Sabbath association auxiliary to the American Sabbath Union.

Resolved, That we also approve the suggestion that a Massachusetts convention be held for this purpose in this city next October, immediately preceding or following the Congregational Council.

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed by this club to co-operate with committees appointed by other religious bodies in arranging for such a convention.

Resolved, That we petition Congress to make the day of inauguration the first Wednesday of March or the last Wednesday of April, to avoid the serious occasion for Sabbath-breaking and law-breaking that arises from having inauguration occur at or near the beginning of the week.

Resolved, That we indorse the petition to Congress for a law against Sunday work, except works of necessity and mercy, so far as the jurisdiction of the general government extends.

A mass meeting in the interest of Sabbath observance was held in the court house at Lancaster, Pa., on Sunday, March 24th, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Sabbath Association, the large court room being crowded. Judge Patterson presided, and remarked that the meeting was held under the auspices of an association that was formed fifty years ago. Its labors were at first confined to Philadelphia; they were next extended to the canals and public works, and now to the whole state. It does not aim at the passage of new laws; it looks only to the enforcement of those existing. Another object of the association is in behalf of the wage-men—those who toil. Many of these laborers are compelled to work seven days in the week, and this association endeavors to prevent this In the evening a similar meeting was held in the First Presbyterian church, Lancaster. Bishop Merrill presided, and addresses were delivered to an overflowing congregation by Judge Ashman, the Rev. T. A. Fernley, and the Rev. T. B. Neely.

A Generous Gift Rejected.

From San Francisco Freethought.

A dispatch from Petaluma, published in the daily press of San Francisco, says:

William H. Pepper, a wealthy nurseryman, offered recently to donate to the city a lot worth $5 00), providing the city trustees would erect upon it a building for kindergarten purposes to cost at least $3.500, the school to be under charge of the board of education. It is understood that a wealthy gentleman of this city offered to erect the building and giv $3,500 more for the support of the school. The board of education presented the matter to the board of city trustees and requested it to submit to the people the question of accepting it and voting the necessary funds at the coming city election. The trustees refused to do this, and in consequence Petaluma will lose the donation.

Mr. Pepper is a well-known Freethinker, one of whose cherished plans is the founding of a school where useful knowledge may be imparted unmixed with superstition. We are not acquainted with the conditions upon which the above gift was offered, but the purely secular character of the education to be given was doubtless one of them. No one can believe that the city trustees hav acted wisely, but they were much more honest in rejecting the trust than they would hav been in accepting and then violating it, like the trustees of Girard College.

Mr. Pepper deserves the greatest credit for his good intent, but it will not take the Christian world long to forget his generous offer and to declare that Freethinkers hav never done anything for charity.

Will Our Missionaries Be Sent Back?

From the New York Herald.

There is a feeling in Canton that a policy of retaliation should be adopted toward the United States. The arguments that the Chinese residents in America are law-abiding, that the action of Congress is arbitrary, that the restriction was initiated to further party interests, that the government has shown a thorough disregard of treaties, are well founded and not to be contradicted. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that the idea is being adopted gradually but steadily that the American missionaries, merchants, and residents should be requested to return to other congenial climes, and that the resolution is gaining ground that no United States citizen should be allowed to settle in Chinese territory.

But the Colonel is the Steadier Tipper.

From the New York Sun.

The Tribune announces that "Colonel Ingersoll has the reprehensible reputation of giving more fees to waiters, etc., than any other man in this country." This is an error. Philip H. Armour, of Chicago, never givs less than $5 as a tip when he travels, on which occasions he givs that sum to everyone on the train, from the engineer to the newsboy. Here and in Chicago his fees are in like proportion.

The Church—Its Moral Status.

The history of the church from the fourth up to the sixteenth century is a history of bigotry, injustice, outrage, cruelty, and murder. Its scenes are only the sickening, revolting events described in the book of Joshua, reënacted. No people within the range of the historic period ever proved so utterly lost to every sense of justice, love, and piety, and manifested such inhuman cruelty, as the Christians did during this long reign of terror that hung over the Eastern world like a deadly nightmare for over twelve hundred years. Dr. Dick, a celebrated Christian writer, states that one hundred thousand of Germany's best men and women were burnt at the stake alive during the fourteenth century alone. What an army of victims thus sacrificed! And for what terrible offenses were these best men and women thus tortured in such a fiendish and inhuman manner? Their offense was that they could not believe that a "son was as old as his father," and that "one was three and that three were one, and yet one was not three and three were not one." It was their unbelief in this Christian mathematical paradox that sealed their fate. But from whence derived the church its authority to thus burn people alive for a simple difference of opinion about God and other incomprehensible Christian dogmas? The authority for all this sickening and revolting cruelty was derived by the Christians from their Bible. Moses, a brutal old freebooter and red-handed pirate, commanded in the name of his remorseless God that if thy father, mother, brother, sister, or bosom friend enticed thee to go and worship other gods (accept different religious opinions), thou shouldst not consent, neither pity nor spare them, but kill them; "thy hand shall be first against them to put them to death." This command of a vile old bloodthirsty wretch afforded satisfactory authority to the churchmen for ages to cruelly torture and murder their fellow-men simply for entertaining a difference in religious opinion. In reading the story of Moses in the bulrushes, we often think, What a pity that a big, hungry crocodile did not come along and utilize him by making a breakfast on him, and thus save the coming ages the terrible suffering and outrage his examples and precepts visited upon them!

Reasoning from cause to effect, we realize that the teachings of the Bible are directly responsible for the cruelty and meanness of the Christian church in the present as well as in the past ages.

Battlegrounds on our maps are marked by a little flag, and if you will examin the maps of the different nations you will find that there are over twenty battlegrounds marked on the maps of Christian nations to one marked on the maps of the pagan or heathen nations. This fact is significant. The church from its inception has been a prolific disturber of the peace and a copious blood-letter. The cross as an instrument of torture, and the sword as an instrument of murder, were fit emblems of the church in every age. The religious wars inaugurated and prosecuted by the church in every period of its existence form a foul blot on the history of the race. The Crusades stand alone and unrivaled for extent and cruelty, and were conducted under the banner of the cross and in the name of the Christian religion.

And giv to the church the power to-day, and we shall experience a reënactment of the tragedies of the Dark Ages with all their revolting features.

The doctrins of the church must be exposed, and its dark and damning deeds revealed to the masses, before the human race can be considered safe from danger at its hands. Its doctrins are a standing menace to the safety and morality of society. Like causes produce like effects. It takes a standing military force of over three million of armed men to keep the peace of Christian Europe to-day. So frequently do Christian armies engage in murdering one another, that the blood scarcely dries on one field of carnage ere it is copiously shed upon another. As a pointer, I would say that the heathen nation of Japan, with its forty million inhabitants, had enjoyed an unbroken peace for three hundred and fifty years previous to opening her ports to the vessels of Christian nations. Since that time Christians hav introduced within her borders missionaries, whisky, Bibles, gunpowder, and firearms, and Japan has been subject to distressing insurrections ever since.

But why are Christian nations more cruel and warlike than other nations? The sole reason is that the children in Christian nations, through the Sunday-school and church, become victims to the damnable heresies against the human race taught in the Bible. They are taught to worship a "God of battles," who is a "man of war," and who doeth his will in the armies of heaven and on the earth, and none can stay his hand and say, What doest thou? They are further taught that by "nature" they "are children of wrath sold under sin" and with "a heart desperately wicked above all things." Surcharged with a belief of this kind, is it a matter of surprise that the devotees of the church are derelict to the claims of morality and decency?

In virtue of the vicious and pernicious teachings of the church, we deem it to be a sad calamity for a child to be born of Christian parentage, and trained in Christian families with their vitiating adjunct the Christian Sunday-school. We feel that statements of this kind are shocking to Christian ears, but truth is always unpalatable to those who liv in contradiction to its requirements.

Corroborativ of this last statement stands some very strong Christian evidence. In a sermon preached March 3, 1886, in Chicago, Sam Jones, the famous evangelist, said: "Nine gamblers out of ten are raised in Christian families, and statistics prove it." As to lying and hypocrisy, he said he "would not expose the church, as there were too many sinners present and it would hav a bad effect." Now, we presume Sam ought to know; besides, we hav never heard that anyone ever disputed this statement, so damaging to the moral character of the church. Hence we reiterate that a Christian birth and a Christian education is veritably a calamity; and this statement cannot be truthfully gainsaid. W. S.

Nashville, Tenn., March 27, 289.

The Crime of Unbelief.

We liv in an age of religious thaw; and all the creeds appear to be in a general condition of sloshiness—having no coherence. Less than twenty years ago Christianity had a definit creed; and all Christians, however ignorant, were able to say what it was they believed.

To-day, however, it is only the ignorant who hav any real faith, for, among the learned, the Christian name remains but all that it once connoted has disappeared.

Years ago people believed in a God—in the jealous, vengeful, and brutal God of the Bible—Jahveh; a god who not only punished unbelievers in this world, but reserved a precious hot quarter for them in the next.

People believed in a God who created the world out of nothing, and your first parents out of dirt; who placed them in an orchard, and forbade them to eat some fruit, at the same time placing an intelligent, talkativ serpent there, with the infallible foreknowledge that the newly formed and inexperienced creatures of his manufacture would be induced by this subtle animal to disobey. They believed in the story of the fall, and had implicit faith in the doctrin of the atonement.

But science came and destroyed the one, and modern criticism demonstrated the folly and immorality of the other.

Soon we saw that the story of the fall was the prolog of a mythical drama with the atonement as its epilog. Without the fall the raison d'etre of the Christian faith was gone forever.

One by one the old teachings changed; now it was said the Bible was written in an unscientific age for an unscientific people; then some of its narrativs were said to be allegories, or poetry, or at least, so unimportant that good Christians need not trouble themselvs about them.

But when modern criticism had done its worst with the Old Testament, it was discovered by those who were best able to judge that very little of it could be relied upon as imparting either scientific, historical, or moral truths.

It was then pretended that Christianity was contained in the New Testament; in the life and teachings of Jesus.

Let the Rationalist laugh at the story of the flood; let him chuckle over Balaam's journey upon a pious ass; let him giggle and guffaw over Jonah's dive into a whale's stomach; let him laugh such stories to very scorn, and turn into derision and contempt many another story from holy writ, and what then? Do not the gospels remain? Does not Christ remain? Are his words of no account? Are his wonderful performances of no value? Did he not die to save the world? And was it not he who said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned?"

"Of course it was," the Christians triumphantly replied; and they knew also that the man who dared to openly oppose the New Testament, to call in question the godhead of Christ, was liable to be prosecuted for blasphemy and consigned like a felon to jail.

They knew it; and when later modern criticism showed that there was no real ground for belief in a Jesus who was miraculously born, and who, being crucified, rose again from the dead, the Christians did nothing toward repealing those obnoxious laws against the unbeliever, which were and are a standing disgrace to modern civilization.

The blasphemy laws are still unrepealed. True, Mr. Bradlaugh has taken up the question, and with characteristic courage means to press it to an issue; but I doubt very much whether the present House of Commons contains a sufficient number of liberal-minded persons to repeal the laws against heresy in all its manifold forms. Time alone will show; but should the common sense of a majority of the members rise above their creed, mankind will soon feel the benefit. Personally I hav suffered a good deal of persecution during my fourteen years' experience as a Freethinker. I hav also been grossly misrepresented by persons who fancied they were doing real service in the cause of religion.

What folly!

As though I could destroy anything that was good in Christianity or any other religion. Whatever is good is certain to survive. My object has always been to destroy the false; to ridicule the absurd; to condemn the cruel.

It is untrue to affirm that I hav ever said that the "man Jesus was an impostor." On the contrary, I hav always said that if such a person as Jesus ever lived, and the gospels contain an account of his life, he was a noble, unselfish, heroic man—a Freethinker in his day—and who was maligned, and ultimately crucified, as a blasphemer.

On the other hand, I hav said that for the God Jesus I hav no respect. He taught nothing fresh; he made no new discoveries in science; did nothing for the advancement of art, nothing to improve society. He abolished neither slavery nor polygamy nor barbarity of any sort.

In short, he was impotent to effect reforms which were achieved by men long after his alleged resurrection to a world above the clouds.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Notes of Travel by W. S. Bell.

April 6th I left Chicago on my lecture tour of the West, and after seventeen hours' ride over the Chicago & Alton railroad I arrived at Kansas City. I had scarcely stepped off the train before I was greeted by name by our good Liberal friend Mr. John Larsen, who, though he had never seen me, knew me by the pictures seen in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and in the Freethinkers' Magazine. After an hour spent in breakfasting together we went to his home, where I was introduced to his wife and family, all Freethinkers. Mr. Larsen thought so highly of my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER on "Justice," that he translated it into Swedish, for a Swedish paper. About the time we were to start for the hall in the evening the rain began to pour down, accompanied by flash upon flash of lightning and crash after crash of thunder. It is needless to say that our audience was small. I hope to hav an opportunity to do my first work over again in Kansas City when I return eastward.

From Kansas City I went to Lawrence, on my way to Bond, where I was engaged for two lectures. I was delightfully entertained by Mr. Palm and family. The Freethinkers who hav the good fortune to enjoy the hospitality of this family go away with pleasant memories of their visit.

I had a long ride of twelve miles over rough and muddy roads to Bond, a hamlet which I did not see. Mr. F. O. Hellstrom, a young man, made all the arrangements for my lectures, which were the first of the kind ever heard in that place. Quite a number came a long distance to see and hear an "Infidel." The house was crowded, and the only complaint made about the lecture was that it was too short, although I had spoken an hour and a half. The second it rained, but the house was full, and the audience seemed reluctant to leave after I had finished my lecture. I was unable to get any subscribers for the Liberal papers. Mr. F. O. Hellstrom will try to bring the Liberals to repentance and persuade them to take the papers. We want to modernize an old song, "What is Home without a Mother?" and sing, if we can, "What is Home without a Liberal paper?" And yet there are thousands of men abundantly able to pay for a paper who would consider themselvs insulted if you questioned their soundness as genuin Freethinkers. Such people do not feel any moral obligation to sustain the editors and publishers of our Freethought papers.

If our good brother Heston ever gets round to making cartoons of the seamy side of Infidelity, I hope he will cartoon the man who never takes a Liberal paper and yet boasts himself a Freethinker from away back—a man who borrows other people's papers, when he should help the publishers keep up their great work.

At Emporia, Kan., I was met at the depot by a gentleman who greeted me by name, although he had never seen me before. It was Mr. Mason Welsh, an intelligent and whole-souled Liberal, who conducted me to the home of Mr. John M. Hyde, another of our sort of people. I had been seated but a few minutes when I took up a book lying on the table at my elbow. It was a school history of the United States, published by Barnes & Co. In glancing over its index to see what it had to say about Thos. Paine, I found his name was not there. I did not expect to find it. For in all the many school histories published within the past twenty years, with exceeding rare exceptions, the name of the author-hero is not mentioned. I called the attention of the daughter of Mr. Hyde, Miss Mary, to this great wrong done Paine by almost all historians. Her reply was sharp and full of good sense. "Well," said she, "it is not necessary to write up his deeds in the books; they all know what he has done."

I was delighted with this bright answer, and if I lecture in Emporia again, I shall certainly invite this young lady to introduce me to the audience. How true it is that Paine has written his own ideas in the life of his country—he has embellished liberty in its brightest colors, and, as a man, has laid the foundation of immortal gratitude in the hearts of all genuin freemen who liv, and are yet to liv, in this country, and in all other countries where liberty thrills human hearts. One gentleman, Mr. Stoddard, came thirty-four miles to hear my lecture, and was so greatly pleased that he tried to persuade me to stay and giv another lecture, but my time being engaged I could not remain.

I came to this place yesterday and lectured last night. I met a niece whom I had not seen for twenty years. How time flies! She was a young girl then, and now she is the mother of a daughter as old as she was then. "Thus runs the world away."

Travel for the Millions.

"The railroads are getting desperate." Such is the news as telegraphed over the land. They are embarrassed and are running into bankruptcy.

Now, there is probably no more important question than that of the railways, because it necessarily is complicated with some others. The road-managers contend they must charge more. My opinion is that they must charge so much less that all the people can use them, and that billions of tons of freight that is now not carried can be transferred.

Why are the Pullman companies so prosperous? We never hear of their embarrassment. They charged, in the start, about one-fourth as much as the roads, were at much more expense, had to pay the roads for hauling the cars, and yet grew rich. Moreover, they were never more than half filled. Just study that a little.

About two-thirds of all the profits of the roads come from freight. It is certain that countless millions of tons of material that should be valuable at some places are left unmoved because the charges for carriage are too much. In the region where this is written, millions of bushels of apples are left to perish, and two hundred miles south the same may be said of peaches, simply because the railroad charges are a little higher than it justified to pay. Two hundred miles north, no fruit of the kind is ever raised. Millions on millions of tons of rock, brick, sand, fertilizer, ice, etc., might be transferred were freights low enough to permit. The question simply is this—if the roads are prepared to carry twenty times more than they now carry, could they afford to do so at rates low enough to justify and induce that increased patronage? It seems impossible to convince a few managers of public business that the lowest possible profit in the public service is the true policy. Remember the difficulty about getting penny postage, and then ponder over the mighty consequences standing behind that "simple, ridiculous fool's proposition," as it was stigmatized when proposed by Rowland Hill. Think how many obstacles were thrown in the way after the bill passed, to prevent its operation. Think of the street cars at first charging twenty-five cents and making trips every half-hour, and what a fool he seemed who first suggested three cents per trip and starting a car every minute each way! Perfectly wild! But the competition of the legs of the public forced the car companies to adopt the cheaper rates. And if it were possible to devise some competition of the kind as against the railway companies, their rates would be reduced so low that all the world would go traveling, and the railway question would solve itself. But just so long as a few individuals hav it in their power to "charge all that the traffic will bear," at the expenditure of the least possible capital, the monopoly policy will be pursued.

As behind the "fool's proposition of penny postage" stood all the tremendous consequences of cheap literature, daily papers, universal diffusion of knowledge and news, the promotion of inventions and discoveries, encouragement of immigrations, and of rapid exchanges and communications, so behind this other "wild, crazy idea," entitled, "Overland for one dollar," or unrestricted travel for the millions, stand more than was ever dreamed of. Just imagin that all the millions of people who are now bound to their localities can take long pleasure excursions as well as the rich—that the poor laborer can take his wife and "wee ones" wherever he chooses because he can get work at one place as well as at another and cost of travel is but a trifle. What wondrous influence in national life and thought! What an education and expansion of the popular mind! Amazing thought! We can not trace all the consequences to their splendid terminations. Terminations? There could be no end to the beneficent results. Never in the world were such opportunities given to mankind as hav been offered by the genius of invention in this century; but monopoly has interfered to sweep from mankind into the possession of the few many of the most glorious privileges. How shall the millions enjoy easily the grandest of all inventions? is the question.

Not long ago during a rate war the roads charged $10 from the Missouri river to San Francisco. The writer went on a train that had over eighteen hundred passengers when it left Topeka. To prevent way passengers taking advantage of the terms a deposit of $30 was required, and returned at the end of the route. This prevented thousands on thousands from traveling; yet so great was the uprising of people living along the Missouri to take this trip that the railroad officials were alarmed. Now, it does not cost more than ten dollars extra to haul a car additional, once the train is made up, from the Missouri to the Pacific, and at $5 per head the receipts would be nearly $300. It has been proved to a demonstration that the roads could make more money by hauling passengers as freight, provided enough people traveled. Here is what the railroad managers overlook—that is, that their rates are prohibitory on the great masses. Five-sixths of the masses are women, minors, and very poor men, none of whom ever travel, yet all of whom would be often journeying if they could afford it.

I confidently assert that if the roads would charge not exceeding twenty cents per head per hundred miles or less, they would make very much more than they do now. Does not the same law as to profits apply to railroad service that does to other business? Is not the rule of the enterprising merchant generally applicable—"Quick sales at small profits?" The railways hav another advantage, too. They can giv a more luxurious and exclusiv service to the wealthy who prefer to pay for it, and realize just what they do to-day; and they can in addition add millions of dollars to their daily receipts by carrying the masses of our people at rates they can afford. But to do this they must bear in mind that even the lowest rates ever yet offered are out of the reach of the great masses. Surely, as has been said, if they can carry a hog from the Missouri to the Pacific for $2, on a slow freight train, load and unload, feed and water him, and giv him exercise every thirty-six hours, they can carry a man equally as cheap. Undoubtedly they could; but they will not until compelled.

One word more. It is objected to government ownership of the roads that government becomes a common carrier. Oh, how they are trembling lest government become the owner of the Union Pacific for the debt due! How they are prevaricating and deceiving! Let government accept the proposition made by that road (not in good faith, however), and once begin to operate it, and the question will reach a rapid solution. For then it will be seen what is the real truth, that the train-dispatcher is necessarily master of the situation; that while a hundred different men or companies may own the train and running stock and all the other trains on the road, all must obey one mind while on the track. It will then disclose itself that all the government need do is keep the road bed in order and hire the train-dispatcher, and that is all the company can properly do as regards the road. Often the running property belongs to several firms. Here is a solution of what has seemed a great objection to government ownership.

This is the grandest question of the hour because its solution settles many others, or aids to do so, namely, How shall the great masses, the five-sixths of us, easily enjoy the privileges of railway journeying? What harmony, what quiet, what satisfaction it will giv, and above all what intelligence to the masses for the settlement of vexations! For "the voice of the people is the voice of the people is the voice of God." Who said it spoke wiser than he knew. But that voice must be free, unrestrained, unmuffled—the utterance of the people's enlightened intellect.

Freethought and Christianity.

It ought to be apparent to theologians, and to every intelligent person whether in the church or out of it, that Freethought or Liberalism is rapidly gaining ground in this country. It is probable, however, that ministers hav no adequate conception of the depth and force of this Agnostic undercurrent, nor of the extent to which the doubting spirit has entered into the minds of men. There are a great many more avowed Freethinkers in this country than there are popularly supposed to be. And in addition to these there is a very large class by whom Agnosticism is manifested only by their general indifference to religion. Many of these persons are so situated that it is not politic for them to boldly avow their sentiments. At present it is popular to be identified with the church, or at least to be considered as a nominal adherent to Christianity. If it were quite as popular to be a Freethinker as to be an adherent of the church, what a surprising falling off there would soon be in the numerical strength of the church? Freethinkers as a rule are intelligent. They are what they are from honest conviction, the result of fair and unprejudiced investigation. They are not unbelievers from choice or desire, but because they cannot be otherwise. Many of them hav been members of the church, perhaps ministers or officers, noted for zeal and piety, but a time came in their experience when they could no longer accept nor assent to the doctrins believed and taught by their church. When doubts invaded their minds they put them away as the devices of Satan, but the doubts would come again and again. They searched the scriptures. They consulted the pastor. They read many standards of the church. They appealed to God time and again in earnest and agonizing prayer. But their wavering faith was not strengthened. Such was their distress of mind that they found no peace either day or night. What could they do? Here they were, feeling their own helplessness, distrustful of human reason, crying out to God for help and strength and guidance. Why did they not get it?

Had they not a right to expect it? Is not the Bible full of promises for persons in their condition? Yet when these promises were not fulfilled, how could they help doubting? Being convinced then that they had been believing in a delusion, the only honorable course open to them was to confess their error and to withdraw from the church. Is it likely that a man would do this, knowing what it involved in many ways, unless he felt it to be his solemn duty? Whenever anyone takes a step of this kind it proves that he is honest, and that he is no hypocrit. Otherwise he would remain in the church and pretend to a faith he did not possess, as perhaps many are doing. Christianity teaches that we are saved by faith. If we hav not this faith, then certainly we cannot exercise it. God has it, and bestows it upon whom he will. Those to whom he does not giv it must be lost. Yet the fault is not theirs.

This is certainly a very inconsistent doctrin, for it makes salvation depend upon the exercising of something we hav not got, and which we cannot get by any act or volition of our own.

"Whosoever believeth shall be saved." How can we believe, or how can we make ourselvs believe, unless we really do believe? We can believe only what we must, and not what would be most pleasant or desirable. My impression of Freethinkers is that they would believe if they could. The fact that they cannot, or do not, seems to indicate that there is some insurmountable difficulty in the way, which the church, with God's help, ought to be able to remove.

KWINTAS.

Flings and Stings.

Even as a young man the prurient had few charms for me, and now as I am verging on fifty it has, if possible, still less. Consequently I shall decline to entertain such a subject, whether started by Mrs. Slenker or anyone else.—McArthur.

It is strange indeed that one finds so few men who will argue a question pro and con and not bring in some fling at sex; especially if talking to a woman. Now, McArthur does not feel satisfied with decrying the intellect of all women—and Elmina's in particular—but he has to question my sense of modesty and decorum. I hav read and reread my articles, and see no word or idea in them that the most prudish could call "prurient." Being a Quaker by training, as well as a school-teacher by profession, I call myself as free from all that is low or degrading as Mr. McArthur himself can possibly be. It is unkind in him to use such an expression as the above. I do not think the whole spirit world—if it really exists—could point to one dark shadow, of a sexual nature, in my life-record.

True, I was a victim of the Comstock clan, but I was completely cleared of all smirch or stain; and Judge Paul, one of the wisest and best of men, sent me a testimonial—January, 1889—in which he says, "Your neighbors from Snowville, Va., where you liv, comprising many of the best people in the community, bore willing and ready testimony to your good character for purity, honesty, and chastity. No woman could hav established a better character for these virtues than you did on that trial."

I think, in the face of this from a United States judge, I hav a right to claim a due meed of respect and honor from even a McArthur.

Recovering Their Senses.

From the Galveston News.

There are a great many people, both in and without Chicago, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat, "who are beginning to believe that Socialism is a bugaboo, used by the police to hoodwink the good people of the Lake City. Whenever the police want more money, or make a mistake, or fail of their duty iu any way, an Anarchist plot and conspiracy is at once discovered. It is an old trick that Louis Napoleon worked very successfully for years in France. A leading Chicago paper has openly asserted that the Socialist scare was worked by prominent members of the Chicago force; that many of the conspiracies which it was pretended existed were invented to fool the citizens, and that the police greatly exaggerated the strength and power of Socialism in Chicago for their own interests. The election largely verifies these charges, for but a hundred and ten Socialists were found in the entire town, the greatest number in any one ward being twelve. This refers to the Socialist ticket, but of course there are some thousands of Socialists in that city. The rest of the opinion is perhaps susceptible of proof. There is temptation to tricks in municipal politics where so much boodle is at stake.

Pass One Bill; Defeat the Other.

It would be a good thing if all the people in this state should write to their Assemblymen and Senators at Albany asking these officials to vote in favor of the bill now before them which makes the commitment of poor children to reformatories reviewable by a supreme court judge. As it is now, children are taken before a police magistrate, committed to some charitable institution, and there is no remedy for the parents or guardians.

Under the present law several gross outrages hav been perpetrated. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children employs officers to look after vagrant children, and in their zeal to earn their salaries they occasionally make mistakes. The meat in the cocoanut is that the two branches of the Christian church, Catholic and Protestant, maintain institutions for the care of children. The chief Protestant mill is the New York Juvenil Asylum; the chief Catholic Mill is the Westchester Protectory. Each of these institutions receives two dollars per week for each truant child committed to it, and that is what they exist for. The Juvenil Asylum gets annually on this basis about $105,000.00 and the Protectory about $250,000.00. The Children's Society is run in the interest of the Protestant concern, and sends to it all the youngsters it can; while the Protectory keeps agents at the various police courts to gather in all the children born of Catholic parents. Of course the Protectory gets more than half of the human spoil.

The outrages that hav been perpetrated were the seizure by the officers of the Children's Society of little ones whose relativs were amply able to care for them and their committal to one of these places by a police magistrate against the wishes and protests of the relativs, and on no evidence but that of the overzealous officers. The present law was procured by the Society and other reformatory institutions for their own purposes, and makes the commitment final. The proposed law makes the law and the facts of the commitment reviewable within thirty days by a supreme court judge. The societies mentioned and others which exist on state money obtained in the same way are opposing the bill; the general sentiment of the New York city public, which is the public chiefly interested, is in its favor.

The bill should pass.

Another bill now before the legislature which should not pass is one allowing the Westchester Protectory and other institutions of its kind to share in the public school fund. The Catholics hav brought this bill up at legislature after legislature, and they seem determined by sheer persistency to force its passage. The bill has been furthered in the Assembly and stands a better chance of passing than ever before, for the reason that the politicians are more than ever afraid of the voting power of the church. If defeated, it must be by members whose constituents are not Catholics. It is the entering wedge of the Roman church's scheme to hav all public school money divided between it and the rest of the religious world. Some Protestants oppose, some favor the measure. It is a most iniquitous plan, and would inevitably destroy our schools. Every Liberal in New York state should write at once to his Assemblyman and Senator urging them to vote against the bill.

The time is short; write at once.

Theories.

In our last issue, in an article entitled "Facts," we gave some Christian theories to the effect that Freethinkers must necessarily be immoral, and that they must necessarily be unhappy. We then showed by reference to the facts that said pleasing results do not come about at all. Yet before showing that these theories do not correspond to the facts, we had spoken of them as "looking well." Is there, then, naturally any antagonism between fact and theory? Let no one get the impression that there is. Of course, no scientific thinker needs the caution, but this paper also falls into the hands of Christians. Only between facts and false theory can there be discrepancy. When a theory has been rightly constructed, it must hav in practical working precisely the correctness that it had in the abstract. It would be well to inquire, Why were these Christian theories so mistaken? What was it that caused their falseness of construction?

Of course, to construct right theories on those matters, it would hav been necessary to start from some right basis, some correct knowledge of things. But Christianity has removed from the minds of the people all such correct bases. It is not alone that she has taught false things in her special creeds, but she has penetrated and perverted all departments of thought. She has set up a false thing, and then when we would essay to reason from the other things around about it, to it, to prove it false, we find that all those others hav been falsified by her too.

For instance. Christians say that we hav no "foundation" for our morality. Reflect upon what is meant by this word, foundation. The idea that will rise into most minds to correspond to this word will be the idea of a command. Most minds, if attentiv to their thoughts, will perceive a vague sense of the necessity of a great ruler, a superior, issuing a command. Why will most hav such an idea? Simply because Christianity has during centuries got man accustomed to the feeling that he must look, for the ultimate source of authority, to some person. This was the tendency of all in the childhood of humanity, and Christianity has kept them in the habit. To look up to some brutal, arbitrary personality, king, priest, or god, and obey his commands—this is all that religion has ever taught mankind. Science has in these later days discovered a different source of moral authority, a different foundation of the moral feeling, and the true one. Evolution, in tracing back the course of man's development from lower orders, has discovered how all the others of man's faculties took their rise; naturally it has also discovered how the moral sense took its rise. The lower animals hav a certain moral sense, and upon this the stronger moral sense of man took its rise through what is called "the association of ideas." Our ideas and feelings all run into one another, one merging into another connected idea or feeling so that when it is present the other is aroused too. Then if a certain class of actions be usually followed by painful outer consequences, it will presently come about that an indissoluble connection will hav been formed, in one's mental associations, between the ideas of those actions and the painful feelings of their consequences. The ideas of those actions will immediately upon rising in the mind produce feelings of pain and abhorrence, whether the consequences follow or not. It only remains to ascertain, then, whether the actions detrimental to others are followed by painful outer consequences, and upon finding that they are, we shall hav found the source of that painful and repugnant feeling that accompanies the ideas of acts detrimental to others. One set of such painful consequences is easily found. It consists of the effects which society has made to follow such acts in punishment by law, in punishment by condemnatory social opinion, and in general hindrance to one's business designs and material prospects. Another set of painful consequences is not so easily found. It lies in the sympathies, in the imagination. The law of association in its simplest form being that: Any state of mind which reproduces an element entering into some previous state, tends to reproduce the whole of that previous state, it follows that upon seeing in a fellow-being outward manifestations of suffering, these being elements which entered into a previous state of suffering in ourselvs, there is a tendency to reproduction of the whole of that previous state of suffering in ourselvs. Such is the nature of sympathy, of pity. It is the mental associations formed upon these two sets of consequences that constitute what we call our moral sense, our conscience. Then when we observe how the development of this sense has been accelerated by the struggle for survival of competing tribes and groups of men, those deficient in it being necessarily deficient in prosperity and in cohesion, and being supplanted by those possessing it in greater strength, we get a hasty view of the causes of the highly developed moral feeling of today. Thus any who hav been accustomed, with Christians, to think in a vague way that moral authority must issue from the command of some personal being, need not be at a loss at the removal of that being. The "foundation" of the moral sense is the same as that of anything else. The "foundation" of any mental faculty is simply, that it is. Christians might as well select any faculty of the intellect that we see working and producing results around us and say that it cannot exist longer, as it "has no foundation." "In a universe of collected facts," say Christians, "there is found no ought." We reply that in a universe of collected facts there is found an ought. That universe of collected facts must include the facts of social science, and when we come to inspect the facts of social science we find among them the fact of a faculty of the human disposition that pronounces oughts and impels man to conform to them, and has through all ages. So when a Christian talks about there being, except as consequent upon divine direction, no moral impelling force, no ought, in the human disposition, the reply to be made when he gets through maundering is simply that, there is. Our purpose in this article was, we said, to point out how theories constructed by most nowadays are likely to be mistaken through the fact that Christianity has suppressed and retarded the diffusion among the multitude of the right bases of reasoning, the right bodies of facts, the right scientific principles, to reason from. So it remains to indicate the scientific knowledge suppressed in this case. It is, general knowledge and science; in particular, mental science and the doctrin of evolution.

Another false theory mentioned is that to the effect that those Freethinkers disbelieving in a future existence must be more unhappy than Christians. Here there is overlooked the following vital consideration. A belief in heaven sufficiently strong to be of any value in supplying happiness can be entertained only by a people very ignorant; a people very ignorant is always in misery through inability to gratify its earthly, every-day wants and through the combativness, injustice, and tyranny inseparable from ignorance. And as what is remote and impalpable makes a less impression upon the mind than what is near and palpable, so the dim expectations of a heaven will in such a case be far overbalanced by the actual felt ills around one every day. So here we hav the two possible conditions of the race in regard to this matter. Ignorant enough to believe in heaven, but unhappy through the troubles invariably accompanying ignorance. Or, with intelligence enough to discredit the heaven and thus losing a slight source of gratification, but by the better conditions of life provided by that intelligence kept in a constant or nearly constant state of happiness. Ignorance and, on the whole, unhappiness. Or, intelligence and, on the whole, happiness. But this is not all. Add to this that not only is the ignorant life unhappy, but it is shorter; not only is the intelligent life happy, but it is longer. At the epoch of the Reformation, estimates Dr. Jarvis, the health officer and statistician, "the average longevity in Geneva was 21.21 years; between 1814 and 1833 it was 40.68; as large a number of persons now liv to seventy years as lived to forty three hundred years ago." "In those days of shrine-cures and ghostly remedies," says Professor Draper, "the death-rate was about one in twenty-three; under the present more material practice it is about one in forty." In the ignorant Christian ages inadequate food, clothing, shelter, and sanitary regulations to obviate epidemics, reduced life to a wretched briefness; now the life-term is steadily increasing. And more. Why may we not continue this lengthening of the life-term indefinitly? Our ability to do much in that line we hav substantiated by actual facts; why doubt our ability to continue what we hav commenced? And if we do so will this not be the securing of what may be called an enduring life, a future life—the very thing the Christians long for? Some think that our knowledge of chemistry and physics generally may presently enable us to control those chemical and physical processes producing what we call life, organization, disorganization, disease, decay, death. To science, they say, nothing is impossible. In that case there would be no assignable limit to life. Without pronouncing upon this opinion, we at least may point triumphantly to the actual facts that Rationalism has already lengthened life, and may confidently be expected to increase its length still more. Another consideration ignored by the getters-up of such theories as the one we are combating, is the fact that when people hav believed in a heaven with a strength enabling them to derive happiness from the anticipation, they hav also believed in a hell with a vividness of realization causing them great misery. And, finally, reflect that the promis of heaven given the people is a cheat, and that keeping them in the belief in it is simply keeping them, for the benefit of a priesthood, under an imposture all of a short, miserable life, cozened and plundered, in the end to receive—nothing at all. To point out in this case, as in the previous one, in what ways Christianity has suppressed the principles of knowledge that would hav led to the formation of the correct theory on this matter, instead of the incorrect one that Christians are happier than Freethinkers, those ways are as follows. Christianity has suppressed the literature calling attention to such facts as the contrast between the longevity produced by Christian systems of living and that produced by Rationalistic systems. It has suppressed in general the literature, scientific and other, which directs attention to the bettering of our lot and the securing of happiness in this life. It endeavors to suppress to-day the scientific and Freethought works that call particular attention to the sufferings caused by belief in hell, the accompaniment of the heaven—to suppress the Rationalistic histories of the Dark Ages that will not let fall into forgetfulness the records of the millions of lives overcast and embittered by the terrors of eternal torment. All these things, which are found in impartially truthful literature, hav been excluded from the ordinary literature that Christians hav permitted the preceding generations. So as most grow up among the books of their fathers, and hav not seen Rationalistic literature, they are in total ignorance of these things—of the true state of affairs. Thus they reason wrongly. As we said, Christianity has not only set up a wrong thing, but has destroyed all things around it whereby we could reason in reference to it and discover its wrongness. "A lie will not fit a fact," and if people could only get the true facts and attempt fitting them together with Christianity, they would meet with a failure in the fitting that would soon convince them of the faultiness of the one or the other. But the trouble is that Christianity has suppressed, destroyed, or perverted all those facts that we would seek to fit.

On the last theory, that Freethinkers are to be unhappy because the scientific way of looking at the world offers no food for the heart, space permits the saying of little. Evolution shows that with the change of the conditions of humanity or any other organism, there follows a readjustment of constitution to the new conditions. Whatever is found necessary or beneficial to the continuance of life, in the end tends to become pleasurable. An African finds the attempt to comprehend the slightest abstraction, to conduct any considerable mental operation, painful and repugnant. The intellectual members of the Caucasian race—and they are increasing in number every day—turn to such activities as their chief delight. The delights of barbarous man hav consisted in great part of exercise of the emotions of wonder, awe, and, in particular, the emotion of satisfaction felt at supposed love and protection by an imagined personality beyond the skies. There is now growing among advanced mankind the set of emotions making it a delight to know, and to do. The Christian repugnance to the scientific view of the world and scientific relations with it, amounts only to an example of the rule that all readjustment of human conditions involves a corresponding readjustment of emotions, and this change is always felt as a deprivation by those partial to the old set of emotions, and is by them denounced as such. In this case, as in the others, we will specify the suppressed knowledge that would hav led to the forming of the right theory. A knowledge of the principles of evolution seems to be all that would hav been required.

A little digest of this and the article to which this refers would amount to something like this: 1. In forming a judgment, it is better to refer to the actual practical facts than to theorize. 2. One reason why theorizing is so often wrong to-day is that it usually starts from misinformation supplied by Christianity, and cannot start from correct knowledge, as that has been suppressed by Christianity. 3. Still, theorizing, if we only take pains to secure as its basis the latest revealed scientific truths, is valuable too; and the concurrence of testimony, upon any point, of the two methods, induction and deduction, affords the strongest proof of which an issue is capable. 4. We chanced to take up, as illustrativ examples, the matters of Freethought morality and Freethought happiness, and upon these we found, by that concurrence of the two methods which is absolutely confirmatory, that Freethought is in production of morality and happiness a thousand times superior to Christianity.

A Converted "Infidel."

In the Elkland, Pa., Journal, in the early part of last month, appeared this letter:

"Infidelity Renounced.

"To you young men who are beginning to entertain skeptical views, let me offer a word of counsel and warning. I assure you that you know not what you are doing. The path upon which you are entering may seem right to you in your present state of mind, but the end thereof is death. You are preparing for yourselvs matter for bitter repentance. I hav trod the dreadful path from beginning to end. I know it all. It is a dark, uncertain, and dismal road, and it leads to ruin. I hav seen the terrible effects which Infidelity produces on man. I hav had proof of its blinding influence in my own experience. Its tendency is to utter moral and spiritual darkness. I hav read and studied both sides, and what is more, I hav tried both; and the result is a full assurance that Infidelity is folly and madness.

"I think of my wanderings in the dark shades of doubt and unbelief with unspeakable sorrow. I would giv much if I could hav my time to liv over again, that I might avoid the dreadful mistake I made in turning my back on Christ and his cause and joining the ranks of his enemies. The only comfort I hav is that I am invited to return while in the fulness of my health and strength, and in the vigor of my mental powers. B. F. MACK.

"Elkland, Feb. 28, 1889."

This is trumpeted abroad as a great gain for Christianity, and as showing how sooner or later all Infidels who are not desperately wicked must come to Jesus. But when the facts are known we imagin the Christians will find they hav not gained much, and that the Infidel loss is correspondingly light.

A friend who has known Mr. Mack personally for five years tells us something about him. He was once a preacher in the Free Will Baptist church. Several years ago he left the church and alleged that he had become a Freethinker. The kind of a Freethinker that he really was may be inferred from the facts that he would never take a Freethought paper, nor assist in procuring Freethought lectures, and that he held and said that Infidelity would do for those who were "up to his level," but that religion was the best for most people, "to keep them out of mischief." It would take about a million such "Freethinkers" as Mr. Mack to turn down the first leaf in Genesis, and then it wouldn't stay down.

But now Mr. Mack comes out with the stereotyped whine about the dreadful path and terrible effects and blinding influence of Infidelity. The whine is all for show, and is cant of the most idiotic and driveling sort. Mr. Mack desires to magnify the importance of his "return" to the church, and so pictures the philosophy which he alleges he once held as a dark and dismal chamber of death. In the expressiv slang of the street, "Rats!" If Mr. Mack had a smaller bump of self-conceit and more front brain, he would not hav bounded back into the pulpit with such a wild whoop!

The truth is, Mr. Mack never was a Freethinker. He imagined perhaps that he was. Possibly he once did not believe the Jonah yarn and the Joshua story and the creation legend and the myths and miracles of the Old Testament. And, too, he may not hav been able to get a call as preacher to a fashionable church with a convincing salary. And in consequence it is quite likely that he thought himself an Infidel. But he never was. He never could hav rejected Christianity because he found upon examination that its claims are unsupported by facts, nor because he saw that the scheme was untrue, unjust, and belittling to the human race and to God if there is one. He mistook a temporary prejudice for a principle. He lost faith for a moment in the education of his childhood, but it is very evident he never found a logical, historical, or scientific fact to which he could anchor his drifting mind. It is plain to be seen that he never comprehended for an instant the broad and eternal principles of truth and justice which underlie the honest adherence to liberty and Freethought. For a moment he toyed with heresy, as a child sometimes questions the ghost stories told by his nurse, and ends in believing them because others believe them. There are thousands just like him, and progress never gained an inch from their efforts. The reason is, that with them Freethought is not a principle at all, but just a new fad, or a whim, or a little passing prejudice against some particular dogma of the church, or perhaps a revolt against some worldly circumstance. Such people are Freethinkers no more than is the man who makes the air blue with profanity and objurgation of the saints.

Editorial Notes.

IT is said that sixty-five Protestant school-teachers hav been removed within the past six weeks by the Chicago school authorities and replaced by Roman Catholics. This is indeed out of the frying-pan into the fire.

THE latest news about the Messrs. Harman and Walker cases to date is that on the 9th inst. they journeyed to Topeka, and after a tedious delay of two days their case was called. Then followed the arguments by counsel upon the demurrer to the indictment. Judge Foster took the matter under advisement and they returned to work, subject to recall at any time.

WE congratulate the editor of our Congregational contemporary, the Independent, upon his frank manliness in stating to the New York and Brooklyn Association of Congregational Churches that "the day of belief in the infallibility of the Bible is past." We hav known and said the same for many, many months, but to be reinforced by so distinguished an authority as Dr. W. H. Ward induces feelings of great elation. We may also congratulate the Presbyterian presbytery of Rochester for declining to reject for office three newly elected deacons who expressed disbelief in the doctrins of foreordination and infant damnation. But did you feel the ground move when Calvin and Edwards turned over in their graves?

MR. A. B. MOSS, our able English contributor, has won in his fight with the London School Board, by which he is employed and which prohibited him by resolution from lecturing on Freethought subjects. As our readers know, the motion to rescind this prohibitory resolution was heard on March 17th, Mrs. Besant appealing for justice and fair play to Mr. Moss, seconded by several liberal-minded members of the Board. The discussion was, however, adjourned for one week. On March 14th it was reopened, and after a long debate the motion was carried by a vote of 30 to 18. And so, says the Radical, Mr. Moss returns to his work of love: the work of emancipating the human mind from superstition; the work of replacing the errors of theology by the truths of science; the work of making this world better worth living in; the work of making people less miserable concerning the future life by making the present life useful and happy, thus promoting the permanent well-being of mankind.

THE picture on the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 16th has been utilized by anti-Jesuits of Canada to point a moral to the statesmen of the Dominion. Labeling the dog Quebec, the Toronto Grip thinks it superfluous to add anything by way of comment to the instructiv series of sketches. The design, it says, speaks for itself, and depicts somewhat graphically, the four acts in the drama of Jesuit aggression as they are likely to develop if Canadian public opinion does not sternly interfere now and settle the matter once for all. It must never be forgotten that the avowed end and aim of Jesuitism will be accomplished only when the church has swallowed the state. If the teachings of the order mean anything at all, they mean this; and, in the province of Quebec, the process has gone at least as far as "Domination," for the tail certainly wags the animal in that neighborhood. The Montreal daily Witness reproduces Grip's pictures without comment, and, we may add, without credit. THE TRUTH SEEKER is quite willing to furnish its Canadian contemporaries with forcible illustrations against the church, even if they do omit to say where they obtained their weapons. We can easily forgiv this in Grip, but that John McDougal, the old Scotch Presbyterian bigot who has so often and so roughly vilified THE TRUTH SEEKER and its founder, should steal from our columns, while not a matter for surprise, we consider a little "cheeky." But the cartoon is a good one, and may it teach the Canadians something.

J. E. REMSBURG will lecture in Kansas, Texas, and Indian Territory during the remainder of the spring.

OWING to the unusual preparations for an outdoor display in this city on April 30th, and the impossibility of getting an audience inside a building, the Liberals hav had to abandon the proposed morning meeting to recall to the public mind the services to our country of our Infidel forefathers. In lieu thereof the Manhattan Liberal Club will devote Friday evening, May 3d, to this purpose, and Mr. T. B. Wakeman will deliver an address on "The Glories and Dangers of Our Republic."

Letters from Friends.

DuBois, Pa., March 29, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I will giv you the answer to the calf question, 233; and giv a question that became practical.

A man made an addition to his building. How many cubic yards would he dig out of his cellar, the sides being as follows: front, 4 feet wide by 2 feet deep; side, 16 feet; back side, 10 feet wide by 4 feet deep? W. J. Kirk.

Innerkip, Ont., April 1, 1889.

Mr. Editor: As the cartoons of Watson Heston hav become so popular with the readers of The Truth Seeker, I would suggest that you print an issue with the picture of Mr. Heston on the first page. I think it would be greatly appreciated by your readers. I, for one, would like to see the man that nature has endowed with so much originality.

R. M. Cowing.

New York City, April 9, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I wish to ask of you information concerning the brilliant light in the sky, in the west, every night. It is asserted that it is an artificial star, or light, made by Edison. Please let me know if such is the case, or if it is a star, and if so, the name of it and why it is so brilliant. My opinion is that it is the evening star, but as I hav been contradicted in that assertion, I wish information from you or some subscriber. Very truly yours, Chas. Dunham.

Sterling, Ill., March 24, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Henry Kauffmann died at my residence on the 19th of this month. He was here visiting, and was taken suddenly sick at my place, which he never left until taken to his grave. He wanted me to send you a notification of his death after he had passed away. He was a very strong, outspoken Liberal, and has been for a great many years. I believe he was a subscriber to your paper ever since it started at Paris, this state. He believed the religion of humanity was superior to all creeds. He was seventy-four years, four months, and fourteen days old at the time of his death. He was a strictly honest and upright man. He leaves a wife and three children in easy circumstances. C. R. Powell.

Coaling, Ala., March 25, 1889.

Mr. Editor: While at Coaling a few days ago after my mail, and doing a little shopping, I felt some one take hold of me by the shoulder, and after shaking me around so as to get my hand, I saw it was K. M. Latham, just back from Bell county, Tex. He had a jug of whisky in one hand, and he whispered, as he can't talk, the question what was it I believed. I gave him a Pulpit and told him to read that, and it would tell him what I believed. He told me he was too drunk to talk to me, but that he was a good friend to me; that six years ago the citizens of Bell whipped a man for teaching my belief, and they would whip me. I asked who would do it. He says, "By God, I will, I'll help do it." He was mistaken as to the time, as I saw the account of it in the Pulpit by Mr. Shaw. It was twelve years ago if I remember aright. W. J. Ward.

Centerville, Utah, March 22, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I must say I admire Mr. Heston's pictures; there is broad meaning in each one. I hav not much to say to you this time, but Uncle Sam is still busy with the Mormon sky-pilots for their beastly propensities.

I hope now we hav a fresh president he will make a clean breast of the infernal Mormon treasonable humbug by wiping the hellish abomination from the realms of this great republic. And I hope some Freethought lecturers will come here and go through the land and show the folly of all humbugging Bibles and priestcraft. I hav got to hate the very name of religion. That word, it seems to me, ought, for the benefit of humanity, to be expunged from the English language. Yes, and from the civilized world. I can hardly hold my temper, at times, when I reflect what priests, with their infernal theology, hav done for humanity. I tell you the history of Christianity is a dark chapter, and this infernal Mormon humbug is only another dark Christian sect that is a sore curse to the welfare of this grand and sublime territory. William Williams.

1,251 Third Street, San Diego, Cal., March 27, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Will you allow me, through your valuable paper, to reply to the many letters which I am daily receiving, concerning the Liberal colony of which I wrote in issue February 23d of The Truth Seeker?

Owing to unforeseen difficulties in the construction of the dam for restraining the water, the work in this enterprise has been delayed. We will not invite people to come in with us until the way is assured to make the colony a success. Without water stored up for the dry season, the cultivation of citrons, and semi-tropical fruits, in this climate is impossible. To secure this water, a trench, three hundred feet in length and over thirty feet in depth, is necessary to begin with. Then a stone wall, thirty feet thick and over a hundred feet high, must be reared on this foundation. Then pipes must be laid to conduct the water on the land. All this will take much money—more than we hav at present. But "there is millions in it," in the grand results anticipated, and, while we are hopeful, we will hav to "possess our souls in patience" for the present.

It is too late now to store up the winter's water. If by next fall we see that things will be in readiness to invite immigrants to come and make homes for their families, where they can enjoy constitutional liberty without the domination of priestly authority, we will gladly announce the fact.

As I expect to travel the coming summer and lecture for constitutional liberty, I hope to see many of the friends who hav so kindly written concerning this enterprise. By going slow and starting right, we hope to make the colony a success. We will not begin at the top of the ladder.

Truly and hopefully, Mary A. White.

March 25, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed find express money order for $5.25, for which continue The Truth Seeker to my address for two years, and send me the Annual for 1889.

Allow me to again express my admiration for The Truth Seeker. I hav been a constant reader of the paper ever since the persecution of the lamented D. M. Bennett. The editorial management is as nearly perfect as fallible man can make it, but it seems to me that if you would advertise the fact of its (The Truth Seeker's) existence, through widely circulated weekly secular and religious journals, its circulation and consequently its influence would increase.

Heston's cartoons are immense. I keep a small barber's shop, and hav always kept The Truth Seeker on my reading-table, but whereas before it was illustrated it was seldom looked at, being evidently mistaken for a religious paper, now it is constantly picked up, and the pictures are read, if not the text.

The greatest land monopolist in the United States is the Roman church. Land monopoly is the crying evil of the times. It can be abolished by a single tax on land values, and in no other way, therefore all Freethinkers should be single-tax men. Henry Walker.

Snowville, Va., April 10, 289.

Mr. Editor: I am here again, and ready to take hold and help the glorious cause of creating free lives wherever I can.

I want to circulate Liberal books and papers as the best means of circulating Liberal thought. I shall be glad of letters from Liberal friends inclosing stamps for circulars of the books and papers which I would like to send out on missionary work.

One alone can do so little, but if we join hands we can accomplish wonders, and also become a band of loving brothers and sisters, each and all doing a little for the common cause, and forming at the same time attractiv, genial, and kindly friendships.

Life is short. Let us work for the good and enjoy reaping a harvest of happiness thereby.

A brighter morn awaits the human day,
When every transfer of earth's natural gifts
Shall be a commerce of good words and works.

Elmina Drake Slenker.

Talent, Ore., March 16, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed find $5 for two years' subscription to The Truth Seeker. I hav been a reader of your paper for three years and I like its Liberal and progressiv spirit, and as long as you open your columns to all questions relating to human welfare I shall support you, and so will all true Liberals. I see by some of the letters from correspondents that they would like to prostitute the grand old paper into "our paper," and "the organ of the American Secular Union." They would like to make the paper as narrow and bigoted as themselvs. The trouble with so many of our so-called Liberals is, when they outgrew the mental corpse of old orthodoxy it took all the strength they had, and that effort stunted them so that they hate growth, progress, and all Liberality to everything else except their own pet ideas, as badly as a mad dog does water.

Every thinker will agree with me that the claims of orthodoxy hav all been refuted by enlightened human reason, and consequently, to those who see the fallacy of the Christian religion, it cannot be any more a factor for progress. I know the church is not dead in a physical way. She cannot sustain her claims by reason, and she must invoke the power of the state to perpetuate her existence. The American Secular Union is necessary to counteract the church's influence by force, and the Nine Demands hav my hearty approval, but, Mr. Editor, would it be impertinent to ask, If the state were not in existence, would we fear the church? My experience with Liberals is, that those of Materialistic tendency are the most intolerant and bigoted to all progressiv, social, political, economical, and religious questions. I wish you unbounded success in making The Truth Seeker a representativ Liberal and progressiv paper. Wm. H. Breese.

Walnut Grove, Kan., March 8, 1889.

Mr. Editor: This burg must be the hardest place in Kansas, for the Lord's agents hav given up in despair of ever converting the sinners of this part of Kansas. They hav sung and prayed to the old gentleman, and even went so far as to ask the old gent to come down and take a part in the business of howling and praying and singing and telling experiences. I think it would shame any sensible man or woman just to sit and see and hear such a powwow until 11 or 12 o'clock at night for weeks at a time. The Methodist Episcopal preacher in charge of the old gent's gospel-shop is a very devout Christian, very pious, for the good reason that he does not know any better. I saw him take the Holy Queer up in both hands and press it to his loving breast and then exclaim, "I know that this book is true; every word is true; and I know that it is divine revelation direct from God!" They do their level best to get a good old-fashioned revival up. But they failed to hav the regular annual dress-parade, as they had one year ago. The dress-parade was a total failure. God did not make his appearance; at least, we did not see anything of him. So they got but one to join; a young girl joined on six months' trial. The first preacher left. The members of the church could not pay him enough to keep him and his family, so he had to hunt better range. Then they got another Bible-pounder. He is a poor, weak brother, both in body and intellect. So you see what a fix we poor wicked sinners are left in. The sheep must stray off from the fold and be left to the mercy of the awful wild Infidel. The membership is very weak, both in members and otherwise—financially and mentally.

There are several Liberals in this part of Kansas, but all are poor and hard run by failure of our crops for two years together. This makes it hard to get along for all, both saint and sinner. The saints are on the beg, and the sinners hav to work and do the very best they can under all circumstances. I hope that times will get better and that we shall get a good crop this year; then we will try and get some new subscribers for The Truth Seeker. But at present I cannot do anything.

I hav delayed writing for some time, expecting to be present at the annual dress-parade, but, alas for human hopes, was sadly disappointed.

I like the paper the best of them all, both paper and cartoons. Yours for humanity, W. H. Noah.

Mr. Editor: W. W. Walker, of New Bedford, sends the sad intelligence that he is called to mourn the death of his youngest daughter, Della Coller, who died on the 16th inst. of erysipelas, after about one week of severe suffering. She was in the morning of life, and a bride less than four months previous to her departure to the land of mystery. She was a lady of intelligence, and highly esteemed by all who knew her, whether orthodox or Infidel, for her many virtues, her kind and genial nature, coupled with a high moral standard, ever aspiring to the true, good, generous, and noble. Mrs. Walker, Della's mother, having died recently, Mr. Walker writes me his home is broken up, and he will move West to liv with other members of his family. Truth Seeker readers should know that Mr. Walker, with his noble wife, were pioneers in reform, having evoluted from Presbyterianism to radical antislavery, thence to Liberalism, more than forty years ago. The Liberal cause has not had a braver, firmer, truer, a more unflinching and devoted advocate in western Pennsylvania than W. W. Walker, who in this his second bereavement will hav the warm sympathy of all Truth Seeker readers. Farewell, dear daughter, who did but liv to bud here! We will hope that you hav just crossed to the other shore to join your mother; there to flower and bloom, anxiously awaiting your father, of now threescore and ten, to come and form the triad. Dear Della, you are now free from sorrow, pain, and trouble; and to your husband, whom the writer never saw, we tender our sincere and heartfelt sympathy. Jerry Brockway.

Kansas City, Mo., March 27, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Please send me the following books: One "Antiprohibition;" one "Bible Inquirer," by Jacobson; one Truth Seeker Almanac or Annual; one "Antiquity of Christianity;" one "Liberalism Is Moral."

If you can giv place in The Truth Seeker for this account of George W. Branham's death and funeral, I hope you will kindly do so. The account is copied from the Kansas City Journal. N. B. Fox.

The funeral of the late Major G. W. Branham took place from Undertaker Welden's, at 4 o'clock, yesterday afternoon, and was well attended by the old residents of Kansas City who were acquaintances of deceased during his residence here.

The pall-bearers were Dr. J. Field, Z. O. Smith, William Holden, Dr. F. B. Noffsinger, R. Salsbury, and Dr. Kellogg.

The remains were interred at Union Cemetery, where Major Warner delivered a short eulogy, and read the following, which was prepared by deceased himself on August 1st, the day of his death:

The man, woman, or child that expects to liv and commit any or all kinds of wickedness, and then hav them atoned for by any Christ or God, will find when they leave this world that somebody has been badly humbugged. There is not, neither can there be, any such thing as atonement other than what we make ourselvs to those whom we hav wronged.

I ask my relativs to hav my body put away. I would prefer some quiet spot in the forest, with nothing to mark the place where the worn-out garments are left. But, whether it be in such a place or some cemetery, that everything shall be cheap and plain, and above and beyond everything that there shall be no religious or funeral ceremony so-called.

If anything further, it is my wish that this my last request and letter to my wife and children be read in public, that all who go to my burial may know the faith in which I die, and that my friends may be exonerated from blame by reason or on account of the peculiarity of my burial.

Cremation would be my absolute request if it were convenient. With charity for all and enmity for none, I go before my God, who created in love and mercy. Good-bye, and all must meet me in the future.

Audubon, Ia., April 6, 112 I.U.S.

Mr. Editor: As this is the day Constantine, one of the most bloodthirsty of emperors, commanded to be kept in place of the Jewish Sabbath, I thought I would tell the friends how God's dear people raise money for the dear preacher.

The Methodist Episcopal church of Audubon had an April fool supper party, with ten cents admission to raise money, on the 1st of April. They had a new convert of about sixty years of age to ask a blessing. The table had been spread and covered up with a table-cloth. When the blessing was asked, he removed the table-cloth and the empty dishes were all that greeted their eye. And some of the naughty people say the church is hard run for funds.

Last Sunday I went to hear a Christian (so-called Campbellite) preacher. He got off some of the most absurd assertions I ever heard—and I hav heard some whoppers, as I am the son of a Campbellite preacher. He said if there was an Infidel in the house he could convince him in five minutes the Bible was true and of divine origin. He began to talk slow and low, but soon he lost his temper and then, when he had convinced no one, he hurled his God-damns at us, and he seemed anxious to help God to damn all that would be guided by reason.

I hav just read Dr. Talmage's March 24th sermon. I just think for pure, unadulterated, egotistical nonsense, it caps the climax. I suppose if the doctor had been consulted he would hav made some changes in Moses's account, but evidently he did not read the first chapter of Genesis. The Christian church is a mighty car of Juggernaut or medieval ignorance, but we Liberals hav got it chained to the wheel of science. Talmage will soon be a natural curiosity; in fact, the enterprising newspaper man considers him so now.

Yours for humanity—heaven on earth and no hell in the future, D. A. MORRISON.

P.S.—In last week's TRUTH SEEKER you gave the Jesuit's oath. Please giv us in a near number of THE TRUTH SEEKER the Orangeman's oath. D. A. M.

[Can any of our readers procure and send us the Orangeman's oath?—ED. T. S.]

SAMOTH, ILL., March 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am a subscriber and constant reader of your invaluable paper, because it instructs us children on the principles of morals. I hav some difficulty with my maternal parent in reading my TRUTH SEEKER. She says positivly I am bound for an eternal damnation. But here I differ widely, and a controversy ensues, ending in my ultimate success of discussion. There is none—no, not one—that can face the music of logic which Freethought hurls over the rampart of orthodoxy. My mother is a member of the Baptist intolerance clique. Liberalism I advocate with all the sincerity of my heart. In deed and in truth may the banner of Freethought be lifted above the cross, and there sustained by the breezes of Deism, until the ungodly bigots of this vicinity cease their polemical strife of calumny and slander. There are some of the most infernal hypocrits residing in our village that nature ever put respiration into. They will not believe science and reason, but adhere to that mystical, superstitious, so-called divine oracle—a fallacious, fictitious work of plagiarism; a work of man, not of inspiration, as those absurd æronaut guides of pulpit stupidity affirm. What we want is temporary felicity while we liv and justice when life is extinct. If we are honest with fidelity in paying all debts incurred in our daily transactions of business, I would not swap my chance to one of those paradise conductors unless boot was given.

I forgot to tell my readers the time of my advent in this mundane sphere of ours. It was made eighteen years ago. I am receiving as many blessings as any fanatic—that is, if I work for them.

Brimstone is pervading the air in this section, but is harmless as phosphorescence. This Sabbath morn as I write this the chiming of the bells of redemption is borne on the breeze, to notify the stupid blockhead auditors: "Time is up; begin the worship of incomprehensibleness!" The last minister that fed taffy at Samoth asserted there was not a single contradiction in the Bible. This surely can be refuted.

My esteemed friend D. L. D'Elyseé is an earnest advocate of Freethought. C. D. MCBRIDE.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., April 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As a Freethinker, outspoken and candid in what I think and say, I desire to contribute my honest views for publication. The great contention between Christianity and Secularism is raging intensely. I like to see all who hav the courage of their convictions diffuse the same. Agitation and diffusion of thought is demanded to bring success to any great reform. Agitation was the beginning of the end of African slavery in this country. Mental slavery is different in this way—African slavery was an institution; mental slavery is not. Every individual has the power to set himself or herself free from the worst of slavery, intellectual bondage. To do so is only a question of intelligence and bravery. Who are free? None but those that are brave in their thoughts. I know that the majority of people are Christians, and nominally believers. They are perfectly satisfied with the revelation they accept as evidence of a living God. Their faith is their comfort and hope. These people are not willing to recognize the right of private judgment, free inquiry, and Freethought. But the truth is mighty and must prevail. Christians and believers preach honesty of the heart, but say nothing of intellectual honesty. A person has no more right to say what he or she cannot prove than they hav to take what does not belong to them. Honesty of the mind, as well as of the heart, must exist. If intellectual honesty was universal, the world would necessarily be full of skepticism. Christians are constantly diffusing supernatural ideas that they are as ignorant of as the babe unborn. A great many are so fanatical and blind that really they are to be pitied more than hated. As positiv evidence is lacking of the truth of Christianity or of any religious teaching of a future existence after death, honest skepticism must necessarily embrace Agnosticism as the only positiv religion free from superstition and mental slavery. Life and death cannot be solved. The truth makes us free, whatever it may be. If there is no hereafter, the sooner all honest inquirers accept this sad, cold fact, the better it is. If nothing supernatural exists, nothing is expected or feared. It's a great pity that if really there is a God he did not reveal to everyone his glorious existence. We are left to our fate, to liv if we can, not that we must. Knowledge must be our savior, truth our religion, experience the true source of morality, utility the correct test of right. Fate rules us; our will is nothing against its decree. Our life is either successful or unsuccessful. If we inherit happiness we can be happy, whether good or bad. If we are good, we are wise. If bad, we are foolish. And it is the survival of the fittest all through.
